REV. C. H. SPURGEON, Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London.

REV. C. H. SPURGEON,

Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London.

A VISITOR to England during his explorations of London may have noticed in that part of the city south of the Thames, known to Londoners as the Surrey side, a place of worship called the Metropolitan Tabernacle — a plain, unornamented building, with no pretensions to architectural beauty, but capable of accommodating a large congregation.

On Sunday morning or evening, a long time before the hour of commencing service, a crowd of people may be seen awaiting admission. After a time the entrance gates are thrown open, a rush is made to secure seats, and in a few minutes every place in the galleries, aisles, even on the platform stairs, is occupied.

Entering with the throng, a most impressive sight meets the eye. There is an area 150 feet long and 80 wide, a gallery running all round the building, and another gallery above that, all densely packed with a congregation reverent and motionless. Some 6500 persons have met in the Tabernacle for worship. The building is an oval, and at one end, on a level with the lower gallery, is a platform with a table and chairs for the preacher and his deacons. Punctually to the minute the platform is occupied, the preacher walks to the railing in front, and in clear, distinct tones opens the service.

We now have an opportunity of seeing what Pastor Spurgeon (as he styles himself) is outwardly like. His appear- ce is by no means prepossessing. Short, stout, and ungainly, he has none of the graces that attract the admiration of the artistic eye. His face in repose is dull and heavy. The lower part of the countenance is hidden by a thick, short beard; his forehead is low, but wide; his head covered with a large quantity of dark hair. As he speaks, however, the attention of an auditor is immediately arrested by the peculiar power of his voice. Rich, clear, and bell-like, it fills that large edifice and penetrates to the most remote pews. Without any apparent effort on Mr. Spurgeon's part, every word is distinctly heard, and even when in uttering something peculiarly solemn and impressive he drops his voice to what appears to be little more than a whisper, the hearer never loses a word, no matter how far he may be from the platform.

he regular seat-holders (who are admit- by ticket) number over 5000, and at in intervals the pastor makes the re- : that as a special favor to himself they bsent themselves from the Tabernacle, ler that on that evening "a strangers' tors' service" may be held. On these ons, although 5000 persons are de- from the regular attendance, the acle is always crowded to its utmost y, and even the lecture-rooms surg it are filled by people listening the open windows to the preacher's

y well be asked, What is the secret xtraordinary popularity? For that a mere transient, evanescent excite- clear from the fact that it has al- sted more than twenty years. The answer is, that in simple, vigorous language, of the purest Saxon English, the preacher tells his hearers how they may be saved. And like his great Master, the common people hear him gladly.

The great preacher, though often solicited to cross the Atlantic and gladden the hearts of his American admirers with the tones of his voice, has never been able to accept the cordial invitation.

Many of our readers are doubtless familiar with the events of his life, but to others the following details will be interesting.

Charles Haddon Spurgeon was born at the little English village of Kelvedon, in Essex, June 19th, 1834. He is descended from an ancient family, who, when the persecutions of Alva raged against the Church of God, fled from Holland and sought a refuge on English shores.

The sturdy, uncompromising religious principles that made them prefer expatriation to submission lived in their descendants, for we find the name of one Job Spurgeon mentioned in a musty old record of the English courts in the year 1677. It appears that Job had got himself into trouble with the civil authorities and was haled before the magistrates. He was charged with the heinous offence of preaching at a Quakers' meeting. Pardon was offered him and his fellow-offenders if they would undertake not to repeat their offence; but, as became good men and true, they preferred to suffer for conscience sake, and they were subjected to an imprisonment of fifteen weeks, during the depth of winter, in a prison cold and damp, with no bed but a litter of straw.

Again, in the reign of George III., public chronicles mention the family; and here again the representative of the family is no soldier nor politician, but a man noted only for his piety and his eminently godly life. In the next generation the head of the family was the Rev. James Spurgeon, eminent amongst the Nonconformist ministers of the day, and who for over fifty years ministered to the same congregation. His son was the father of Charles, and he also devoted himself to the service of Jesus. For some years he was pastor of a church at Cranbrook in Kent, but subsequently accepted an invitation to a large church in the north of London.

Of such a stock comes the pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, a pedigree as noble as the lines of ancestors whose coats of mail are treasured relics in the halls of the English nobles.

In his early years Mr. Spurgeon was remarkable for his strong passions and determined will, which were the cause of much anxiety to his parents, and the subject of their supplications to the Throne of Grace, where they entreated that power would be given him to subdue those passions and direct his energies into the service of God—a prayer which has been fully and graciously answered.

Much of his youthful time was passed with his grandfather, the worthy Nonconformist pastor. While at his house he made the acquaintance of Richard Knill, of the London Missionary Society, whose conversation left a deep impression on the boy's mind. Mr. Spurgeon relates how, as the good man was leaving the house on one occasion he seemed to have enjoy for a moment something like a prophe inspiration, for "calling the family toget er he took me on his knee, and I distinct remember his saying, 'I do not know ho it is, but I feel a solemn presentiment th this child will preach the Gospel to thou ands, and God will bless him to many soul So sure am I of this, that when my litt man preaches in Rowland Hill's chapel, he will do one day, I should like him promise me that he will give out the hyn commencing—

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform.'"

This promise was of course made, and w followed by another, namely, that at h express desire I would learn the hymn question, and think of what he had said.

"The prophetic declaration was fulfille When I had the pleasure of preaching t word of life in Surrey Chapel, and al when I preached in Mr. Hill's first pul at Wootton-under-Edge, the hymn w sung in both places."

But a trying ordeal was before you Spurgeon before that time came. He w one of those who enter the strait gate b stormy path. Those who like the wri have heard him narrate the circumsta of

For above months he agonized and prayed sought.

At length one day he set off to wall a distant chapel to hear some emin preacher, but on his way a snow-st came on, and it snowed so heavily that relinquished his intention and turned a little Primitive Methodist chapel, wl stood half hidden in a court down an scure street. There he heard the seri that was used by the Holy Spirit to b peace to the troubled heart.

The preacher announced as his Isaiah 45 : 22 : "Look unto Me, anc ye saved, all the ends of the ear Mr. Spurgeon says: "Just setting eyes upon me, as if he knew m by heart, he said, 'Young man, are in trouble.' Well, I was, sure eno Says he, 'You will never get out unless you look to Christ.' And lifting up his hands he cried out, 'L look, look!' 'It is only look,' said he. at once the way of salvation. I know what else he said: I did not take much tice of it, I was so possessed with that thought. Like as when the brazen ser was lifted up, they only looked and healed. I had been waiting to DO things, but when I heard this word 'L what a charming word it seemed me!

"I now think I am bound neve preach a sermon without preaching to ners. I do think that a minister who preach a sermon without addressing ners does not know how to preach."

This interesting event occurred when Mr. Spurgeon was fifteen years of age.

Twenty-five years afterwards, in relating the story to an audience of boys, he made the following characteristic remarks: "I have never been sorry for what I then did; no, not even once. I have had plenty of time to think it over, and many temptations to try some other course, and if I had found out that I had been deceived, or had made a gross blunder, I would have made a change before now, and would do my best to prevent others from falling into the same delusion. I tell you, boys, the day I gave myself up to the Lord Jesus, to be His servant, was the very best day of my life. Then I began to be safe and happy; then I found out the secret of living; and had a worthy object for my life's exertions, and an unfailing comfort for life's troubles. Because I would wish every boy to have a bright eye, a light tread, a joyful heart, and overflowing spirits, I plead with him to consider whether he will not follow my example, for I speak from experience."

Such a soul could not keep silence, and accordingly before two years were over he was regularly employed preaching the word.

In the year 1873 Mr. Spurgeon preached from 1 Peter 2:7: "Unto you therefore which believe He is precious," and he commenced his sermon by saying: "I remember well that, more than twenty-two years ago, that I ever made was from this text. I had been asked to walk out to the village of Paversham, about four miles from Cambridge, where I then lived, to accompany a young man whom I supposed to be the preacher for the evening, and on the way I said to him that I trusted God would bless him in his labors. 'Oh! dear,' said he, 'I never preached in my life; I never thought of doing such a thing. I was asked to walk with you, and I sincerely hope God will bless YOU in YOUR preaching.' 'Nay,' said I, 'but I never preached, and I don't know that I could do any thing of the sort.' We walked together till we came to the place, my inmost soul being all in a trouble as to what would happen. When we found the congregation assembled, and no one else there to speak of Jesus, though I was only sixteen years of age, as I found that I was expected to preach, I did preach, and the text was that just given."

During the two years following this event, while preaching every Sunday, young Spurgeon worked assiduously as usher in a school at Newmarket. But supplying the pulpit on one occasion at the little church at Waterbeach, in Cambridgeshire, the hearers were greatly impressed with the powers of "the boy preacher," as he was then called, and eventually invited him to become their pastor. This invitation was accepted, and for a period of two years Mr. Spurgeon labored there, during which time the number of communicants was more than doubled.

While at Waterbeach the course of his future life seemed so clearly indicated that his father and other friends advised him to enter himself for a course of study at Stepney College, in order to prepare himself for his career. Mr. Spurgeon, holding learning in high appreciation, accepted the advice, and Dr. Angus, principal of his college, made an appointment with him for a preliminary interview at the house of a friend. Mr. Spurgeon arrived punctually at the rendezvous, and a servant showed him into a room, where he waited two hours for the college magnate. At the end of that time he made inquiries, and found that Dr. Angus had just left for London, having waited all the time in another room for Mr. Spurgeon, the clumsy mistake of a simple girl having thwarted the design of the two men.

Mr. Spurgeon still clung to the idea of a college course, and decided on making application to the authorities for admission. He made it the subject of earnest and continual prayer, and one day, with his mind full of the thought, he set out to walk to a neighboring village where he had to preach, and as he pursued his lonely path he heard what seemed to him a loud voice, saying, Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not. In this utterance he thought he saw a new light, and resolved to desist from any further efforts to enter college, although he believed at the time that in so deciding he was choosing a life of poverty and obscurity.

Towards the close of 1853 Mr. Spurgeon (then nineteen years of age) received an invitation to preach at New Park Street Chapel, London, a church which had at one time been a very important one, and had enjoyed the ministrations of Dr. Gill, Dr. Rippon, and other eminent men, but from various causes had dwindled down to a very small body, and even that torn by internal dissensions. Mr. Spurgeon went and ultimately received an invitation to become pastor of the church. To the mere stripling of nineteen the undertaking seemed too great, and he compromised with the church by an arrangement to take the duties for a period of six months, at the end of which time either pastor or people were at liberty to close the engagement.

Long before the end of that six months the matter was settled by the distinct and emphatic voice of the London people. His fame spread rapidly through the metropolis, and one asked another, Have you heard the boy preacher?

Those who went to hear confirmed the good report and came again, until the building, which contained less than 200 when he first preached in it, but which would hold 1200, was filled to its utmost capacity. He himself tells us that "the congregation so multiplied as to make the chapel, in the evening, when the gas was burning, like the Black Hole of Calcutta." One evening in 1854 the preacher exclaimed, "By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, and by faith this wall at the back shall come down too." An aged and prudent deacon, in somewhat domineering terms, observed to him, at the close of the sermon, "Let us never hear of that again." "What do you mean?" said the preacher. "You will hear no more about it when it is done, and therefore the sooner you set about doing it the better."

In due course the "wall at the back" came down, and an enlargement took place, the young preacher meanwhile occupying Exeter Hall for about three months. But although enlarged, New Park Street "resembled," as Mr. Spurgeon remarks, "the attempt to put the sea into a teap and there was literally no room for hundreds desirous of obtaining a sion.

The chapel could not be further enla for the very sufficient reason that th ing then covered every inch of available. It was therefore re chase land elsewhere and build a new e fice. Until that could be built a large co cert-hall in the Surrey Gardens was hir and filled with hearers at every servic In this building occurred the terrib catastrophe that shattered Mr. Spurgeon nervous system and left a permanent effec on his health. It was in October 19t 1856, that just as the pastor was engage in prayer and the hall was densely crowded some mischievous person raised the alar of Fire! A general panic ensued, whic the pastor ineffectually endeavored to cal by assurances that there was no fire. stampede followed, in which several peo ople lost their lives and others were severe ly injured.

The work connected with the New Tabernacle was pressed forward, and in May, 1861, Mr. Spurgeon had the satisfaction o preaching in the new building, which ha cost $156,661, and which had all been con tributed.

During the years from 1856 to 1861 Mr. Spurgeon's pulpit labors were almost incessant. He preached on an average twelve sermons a week. His health could not long endure so great a strain, and eventually he was induced to take a sho period of repose. His brother James (al a Baptist minister) came to his aid and b came his co-pastor. Of late years he been under the necessity of economizing strength by curtailing his exertions, b even now he is admonished by frequent a tacks of illness that he is overtasking h strength.

Mr. Spurgeon's labors are by no me confined to his pulpit. The Metropoli Tabernacle is the centre and nucleus o wide circle of work, and the pastor's c ful and minute attention is given to every detail. Prominent among the institutions which have sprung from the Tabernacle is the Pastor's College, in which a large number of young men are educated for the minis try. A second institution is the Stockwell Orphanage, in which over 260 orphans are boarded, clothed, and educated. In connection with the Tabernacle is also a c portage association, an organization f home and foreign missions, and a variet of other societies for effecting spiritual an material good.

The origin of these benevolent and eva gelistic institutions, with their history an method of management, though a subjec full of interest, cannot be pursued here fo lack of space, but we hope to give an account of it in a future number.

(These charitable institutions are supported by voluntary contributions. Should any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES, feeling the importance of a work which is effecting so large an amount of good, desire to aid in supporting them, they may forward a subscription for the purpose to the manager, Mr. J. Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, New York, who will than fully receive and transmit them to Rev H. Spurgeon in London.)

THE NIGHT SIDE OF NEW YORK.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

> Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in ll ; and when I had digged in the wall, behold And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the nations that they do here. So I went in behold every form of creeping things, nd abominable beasts."—EZEKIEL 8 : 8, 9, 10.

So this minister of religion, Ezekiel, was commanded to the exploration of the sin of his day. He was not to stand outside the door guessing what it was, but was to go in and see for himself. He did not in vision say : "O Lord ! I don't want to go in ; I dare not go in ; if I go in I might be criticised. O Lord ! please let me off !" When God told Ezekiel to go in he went in, "and saw, and behold all manner of creeping things, and abominable beasts." I, as a minister of religion, felt I had a Divine commission to explore the iniquities of our cities. I did not ask counsel of my session, or my Presbytery, or of the newspapers, but, asking the companionship of three prominent police officials and two of the elders of my church, I unrolled my commission, and it said : "Son of man, dig into he wall ; and when I had digged into he wall, behold a door. And he said, Go and see the wicked abominations that are ne here ; and I went in, and saw, and beeld !"

Brought up in the country and surrounded by much parental care, I had not until is autumn seen the haunts of iniquity. y the grace of God defended, I had never wed any "wild-oats." I had somehow en able to tell from various sources someing about the iniquities of the great cities, and to preach against them ; but I saw, in the destruction of a great multitude of the people, that there must be an infatuation and a temptation that had never been spoken about, and I said, "I will explore."

I saw tens of thousands of men going down, and if there had been a spiritual percussion answering to the physical percusion, the whole air would have been full of he rumble and roar, and crack, and thuner of the emolition ; and this moment, if we should pause in our service, we should ear the crash, crash ! Just as in the sickly season you sometimes hear the bell at the gate of the cemetery ringing almost incessantly, so I found that the bell at the gate of was tolling by day and tolling by night. I said, "I will explore." I went as a physician goes into a small-pox hospital, or a fever lazaretto, to see what practical and useful information I might get. That would be a foolish doctor who would stand outside the door of an invalid writing a Latin prescription. When the lecturer in a medical college is done with his lecture takes the students into the dissectingom, and he shows them the reality. I am here this morning to report a plague, and to tell you how sin dissects the body, and dissects the mind, and dissects the soul.

"Oh !" say you, "are you not afraid that in consequence of your exploration of the iniquities of the city other persons may make exploration, and do themselves damage ?" Wellington, standing in the battle of Waterloo when the bullets were buzzing around his head, saw a civilian on the field. He said to him, "Sir, what are you doing here ? Be off." "Why," replied the civilian, "there is no more danger here for me than there is for you." Then Wellington flushed up, and said, "God and my country demand that I be here, but you have no errand here." Now I, as an officer in the army of Jesus Christ, went on this exploration, and on to this battlefield. If you bear a like commission, go ; if not, stay away.

But, you say, "Don't you think that somehow your description of these places will induce people to go and see for themselves ?" I answer, Yes, just as much as the description of the yellow-fever at Grenada would induce people to go down there and get the pestilence. It was told us there were hardly enough people alive to bury the dead, and I am going to tell you a story in these Sabbath-morning sermons of places where they are all dead or dying. And I shall not gild iniquities. I shall play a dirge and not an anthem, and while I shall not put faintest blush on fairest cheek, I will kindle the cheeks of many a man into a conflagration, and I will make his ears tingle.

But you say, "Don't you know that the papers are criticising you for the position you take ?" I say, Yes ; and do you know how I feel about it ? There is no man who is more indebted to the newspaper press than I am. My business is to preach the truth, and the wider the audience the newspaper press gives me, the wider my field is. As the secular and religious press of the United States and the Canadas, and of England and Ireland and Scotland and Australia and New Zealand, are giving me every week nearly three million souls for an audience, I say I am indebted to the press, anyhow. Go on ! To the day of my death I cannot pay them what I owe them. So slash away, gentlemen. The more the merrier. If there is any thing I despise, it is a dull time. Brisk criticism is a coarse Turkish towel, with which every public man needs every day to be rubbed down, in order to keep healthful circulation. Give my love to all the secular and religious editors, and full permission to run their steel pens clear through my sermons, from introduction to application.

THE EXPLORATION.

It was ten o'clock of a calm, clear, starlighted night when the carriage rolled with us from the bright part of the city down into the region where gambling and crime and death hold high carnival. When I speak of houses of dissipation, I do not refer to one sin, or five sins, but to all sins.

As the horses halted, and, escorted by the officers of the law, we went in, we moved into a world of which we were as practically ignorant as though it had swung as far off from us as Mercury is from Saturn. No shout of revelry, no guffaw of laughter, but comparative silence. Not many signs of death, but

THE DEAD WERE THERE.

As I moved through this place I said "This is the home of lost souls." It wa a Dante's Inferno ; nothing to stir th mirth, but many things to fill the eyes wit tears of pity. Ah ! there were mora corpses. There were corpses on the stair way, corpses in the gallery, corpses in the gardens. Leper met leper, but no bandaged mouth kept back the breath.

I was reading of an incident that occurred in Pennsylvania a few weeks ago, where a naturalist had presented to him a deadly serpent, and he put it in a bottle and stood it in his studio, and one evening, while in the studio with his daughter, a bat flew in the window, extinguished the light, struck the bottle containing the deadly serpent, and in a few moments there was a shriek from the daughter, and in a few hours she was dead. She had been bitten of the serpent.

Amid these haunts of death, in that midnight exploration, I saw that there were lions and eagles and doves for insignia ; but I thought to myself how inappropriate. Better the insignia of an adder and a bat.

First of all, I have to report as a result of this midnight exploration that all the sacred rhetoric about the costly magnificence of the haunts of iniquity is apocryphal. We were shown what was called the costliest and most magnificent specimen. I had often heard that the walls were adorned with masterpieces ; that the fountains were bewitching in the gaslight ; that the music was like the touch of a Thalberg or a Gottschalk ; that the upholstery was imperial ; that the furniture in some places was like the throne-room of the Tuileries. It is all false.

Masterpieces ! There was not a painting worth $5, leaving aside the frame. Great daubs of color that no intelligent mechanic would put on his wall. A crossbreed between a chromo and a splash of poor paint ! Music ! Some of the homeliest creatures I ever saw squawked discord, accompanied by pianos out of tune ! Upholstery ! Two characteristics : red and cheap. You have heard so much about the wonderful lights—blue and green and yellow and orange flashing across the dancers and the gay groups. Seventy-five cents' worth of chemicals would produce all that in one night. Tinsel, gewgaws, tawdriness, frippery, seemingly much of it bought at a second-hand furniture store and never paid for !

For the most part, the inhabitants were repulsive. Here and there a soul on whom God had put the crown of beauty, but nothing comparable with the Christian loveliness and purity which you may see any pleasant afternoon on any of the thoroughfares of our great cities. Young man, you are a stark fool if you go to places of dissipation to see pictures, and hear music, and admire beautiful and gracious countenances. In Thomas's, or Dodworth's, or Gilmore's Band, in ten minutes you will hear more harmony than in a whole year of the racket and bang of the cheap orchestras of the dissolute.

But, my friends, I noticed in all the haunts of dissipation that there was an attempt at music, however poor. The door swung open and shut to music ; they pped to music ; they danced to music ; ey attempted Fifty times that night I said with- myself, " If poor music is so powerful in bad direction, why cannot good music be nost omnipotent in a good direction ?"

h ! my friends, we want to drive men o the kingdom of God with a musical ff. We want to shut off the path of ath with a musical bar. We want to atch all the musical instruments from the vice of the devil, and with organ, and net, and bass viol, and piano, and or- stra praise the Lord.

RURAL VICTIMS.

But I have, my friends, also to report of that midnight exploration, that I saw something that amazed me more than I can tell. I do not want to tell it, for it will take pain to many hearts far away, and I cannot comfort them. But I must tell it. In all these haunts of iniquity I found young men with the ruddy color of country health on their cheek, evidently just come to town for business, entering stores, and shops, and offices. They had helped gather the summer grain. There they were in haunts of iniquity, the look on their cheek which is never on the cheek except when there has been hard work on the farm and in the open air. Here were these young men, who had heard how gayly a boat dances on the edge of a maëlstrom, and they were venturing.

O God ! will a few weeks do such an awful work for a young man ? O Lord ! hast Thou forgotten what transpired when they knelt at the family altar that morning when he came away, and how father's voice trembled in the prayer, and mother and sister sobbed as they lay on the floor ? I saw that young man when he first confronted evil. I saw it was the first night there. I saw on him a defiant look, as much as to say, "I am mightier than sin." Then I saw him consult with iniquity. Then I saw him waver and doubt. Then I saw going over his countenance the shadow of sad reflections, and I knew from his looks there was a powerful memory stirring his soul. I think there was a whisper going out from the gaudy upholstery, saying, "My son, go home." I think there was a hand tremulous with anxiety, a hand that had been worn with work, a hand partly wrinkled with age, that seemed to beckon him away, and so goodness and sin seemed to struggle in that young man's soul ; but sin triumphed, and he surrendered to darkness and to death—an ox to the slaughter.

Oh ! my soul, is this the end of all the good advice ? Is this the end of all the prayers that have been made ? Have the clusters of the country vineyard been thrown into this great winepress where Despair and Anguish and Death trample, and the vintage is a vintage of blood ? I do not feel so sorry for that young man who, brought up in city life, knows beforehand what are all the surrounding temptations ; but God pity the country lad, unsuspecting and easily betrayed.

Oh ! young man from the farm-house among the hills, what have your parents done that you should do this against them ? Why are you bent on killing with trouble her who gave you birth ? Look at her fingers—what makes them so distort ? Working for you. Do you prefer to that honest old face the berouged cheek of sin ? Oh ! write home to-morrow morning by the first mail, cursing your mother's white hair, cursing her stooped shoulder, cursing her old arm-chair, cursing the cradle in which she rocked you. "Oh !" you say, "I can't, I can't." You are doing it already. There is something on your hands, on your forehead, on your feet. It is red. What is it ? The blood of a mother's broken heart!

When you were thrashing the harvest apples from that tree at the corner of the field last summer, did you think you would ever come to this ? Did you think that the sharp sickle of death would cut you down so soon ? Oh ! if I thought I could break the infatuation I would come down from the pulpit and throw my arms around you and beg you to stop.

Perhaps I am a little more sympathetic with such because I was a country lad. It was not until fifteen years of age that I saw a great city. I remember how stupendous New York looked as I arrived at Cortlandt Ferry. And now that I look back and remember that I had a nature all awake to hilarities and amusements, it is a wonder that I escaped. I was saying this to a gentleman in New York a few days ago, and he said, "Ah! sir, I guess there were some prayers hovering about."

When I see a young man coming from the tame life of the country and going down in the city ruin I am not surprised. My only surprise is that any escape, considering the allurements. I was a few days ago on the St. Lawrence River, and I said to the captain, "What a swift stream this is !" "Oh !" he replied, "seventy-five miles from here it is ten times swifter. Why, we have to employ an Indian pilot, and we give him $1000 for his summer's work, just to conduct our boats through between the rocks and the islands, so swift are the rapids." Well, my friends, every man that comes into New York and Brooklyn life comes into the rapids, and the only question is whether he shall have safe or unsafe pilotage.

Young man, your bad habits will be reported at the homestead. You cannot hide them. There are people who love to carry bad news, and there will be some busy old gossip who will wend her hasty step toward the old homestead, and she will sit down, and, after she has a while wriggled in the chair, she will say to your old parents, "Do you know your son drinks ?" Then your parents will get white about the lips, and your mother will ask to have the door set a little open for the fresh air, and before that old gossip leaves the place she will have told your parents all about the places where you are accustomed to go. Then your mother will come out, and she will sit down on the step where you used to play, and she will cry and cry. Then she will be sick, and the gig of the country doctor will come up the country lane, and the horse will be tied at the swing-gate, and the prescription will fail, and she will get worse and worse, and in her delirium she will talk about nothing but you.

Then the farmers will come to the funeral, and tie the horses at the rail face about the house, and they will talk about what ailed the one that died, and one will say it was intermittent, and another will say it was congestion, and another will say it was premature old age; but it will be neither intermittent, nor congestion, nor old age. In the ponderous book of Almighty God it will be recorded for everlasting ages to read that you killed her. Our language is very fertile in describing different kinds of crime. Slaying a man is homicide. Slaying a brother is fratricide. Slaying a father is patricide. Slaying a mother is matricide. It takes two words to describe your crime—patricide and matricide.

But I was going to tell you of

AN INCIDENT.

I said to the officer, "Well, let us go; I am tired of this scene;" and as we passed out of the haunts of iniquity into the fresh air, a soul passed in. What a face that was! Sorrow only half covered up with an assumed joy. It was a woman's face. I saw as plainly as on the page of a book the tragedy.

You know that there is such a thing as somnambulism, or walking in one's sleep. Well, in a fatal somnambulism, a soul started off from her father's house. It was very dark, and her feet were cut of the rocks; but on she went until she came to the verge of a chasm, and she began to descend from boulder to boulder down over the rattling shelving—for you know while walking in sleep people will go where they would not go when awake. Further on down, [illegible]d further, where no owl of the night or [illegible]wk of the day would venture. On down [illegible]til she touched the depth of the chasm.

Then, in walking asleep, she began to as[illegible]d the other side the chasm, rock above [illegible]k, as the roe boundeth. Without having her head to swim with the awful steep, she [illegible]led the height. No eye but the sleepless eye of God watched her as she went down one side the chasm and came up the other [illegible] the chasm.

It was an August night, and a storm was gathering, and a loud burst of thunder awoke her from her somnambulism, and she said, "Whither shall I fly?" and with an affrighted eye she looked back upon the chasm she had crossed, and she looked in front, and there was a deeper chasm before her. She said, "What shall I do? Must I die here?" And as she bent over the one chasm, she heard the sighing of the past; and as she bent over the other chasm, she heard the portents of the future.

Then she sat down on the granite crag, and cried: "Oh for my father's house! Oh for the cottage, where I might die amid embowering honeysuckle! Oh! the past! Oh! the future! O father! O mother! O God!" But the storm that had been gathering culminated, and wrote with finger of lightning on the sky just above the horizon, "The way of the transgressor is hard." And then thunder-peal after thunder-peal uttered it: "Which forsaketh the guide of her youth and forgetteth the covenant of her God. Destroyed without remedy!" And the cavern behind echoed it, "Destroyed without remedy!" And the chasm before echoed it, "Destroyed without remedy!" There she perished, her cut and bleeding feet on the edge of one chasm, her long locks washed of the storm dripping over the other chasm.

But by this time our carriage had reached the curbstone of my dwelling, and I awoke, and behold it was a dream!

PROPHETIC SIGNS IN THE EAST.

BY THE REV. HORATIUS BONAR, D.D., OF EDINBURGH.

Israel and Jerusalem the Solution of the Eastern Problem—Lord Beaconsfield, a Jew, the Guiding Spirit in Recent Eastern Affairs—Yet he has Acted by means of Gentile and not Jewish Resources—The Bag-and-Baggage Policy—The British Protectorate a Boon to Palestine—Russia's Designs on Jerusalem—In Ezekiel 38 Britain Predicted to Checkmate Russia—England's Responsibility toward Palestine.

IT is to the East that God is now turning the eyes of His Church. It is in connection with the East that His people are now asking the question, "Watchman, what of the night?" and it is in answer to this that the watchman's voice is heard saying,

"THE MORNING COMETH"

—adding the solemn words of warning, lest men should too eagerly anticipate the dawn and forget the darkness that still lies between, for though the announcement of coming dawn should cheer us with the brilliant prospect of the brightest day that ever dawned upon the earth, yet we are not to lose sight of the judgments that lie between us, and that glorious consummation.

"BUT ALSO THE NIGHT;"

And the watchman does not discourage the question; rather he commends it, and bids us ask it again and again, until he can tell us "It is done: the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ." For thus He speaks: "If ye will inquire, inquire ye; return, come."

In the events of the last two years we hear the prophetic voice bidding us look Eastward. Not as if the West were no more to occupy our attention, but the long-neglected East is now emerging from its obscurity; and God is now, in His own way, about to settle the "Eastern Question," and to bring Jerusalem "into remembrance." And this before both the Church and the world, for He is speaking to both.

The statesmen of earth have been trying to settle this question so as to preserve the balance of power in Europe and in the Mediterranean, according to their own ideas of Eastern or Western supremacy. God now steps in, and presents His own solution of it, introducing a new element, to which earthly potentates have hitherto paid no regard—Israel and Jerusalem; for in them lies the final settlement of the great problem which they have been working at so long in vain.

One of the most remarkable features of the case is, that the arrangement of Eastern affairs should have been in the hands of a JEW—Lord Beaconsfield. I do not touch the politics of the question. It is time that these were set aside, and that Eastern affairs were no longer judged or misjudged by imperial ambition or English partisanship. For nearly two years the noise of angry and one-sided politics has drowned the voice of prophecy, and Christian men have shrunk from speaking out, lest they should be set down as mere political debaters; the canvassers for a party in the state, instead of the expositors of the divine Word.

But now, when the ritualistic admirers of the Greek Church have said their say; when the defenders of Turkish weakness and misrule have cooled down; when the "Liberal" supporters of the greatest despotism which the world contains are beginning to admit that Russian professions of benevolence and religious zeal look rather suspicious, if not thoroughly insincere, we can speak out more boldly, and hope for an impartial hearing.

A Jew, then, in the person of the Prime Minister of England, has been the moving, guiding, controlling power throughout these confusions and complications. The rightness or wrongness of what he has done is not to us, just now, the question. It is the fact that in the providence of God he should have been at the helm of England when these difficulties came up, and that he should have been made use of to settle them.

The question is ultimately a Jewish one, a Jew has been called in to solve it, and to s it as only a Jew could do.

It is a Jew that is now Premier of the grea monarchy which the world ever saw, and practically commands its fleets and armies.
a Jew that is virtually at the head, not on the ten kingdoms of the Roman earth, but o whole four monarchies of Daniel. It is a that, when the great northern power was p ing down its squadrons upon Europe, Asia
Syria, ready to occupy not Constantinople but Jerusalem, interposed and bridled back mighty hosts without the shedding of one of blood.

But the instruments through which this has done this Eastern work have not been ish. They have been altogether Gentile.
through Gentile resources that he has carrie plans to a successful consummation; takin highest place in Gentile cabinets, moulding tile statesmen, wielding Gentile armies and ies, and employing Gentile gold and silver.

He has arrested the aggressor; he has se peace; he has obtained the protectorate of Minor, and specially of Palestine. Thes gions now lie at the feet of England, an moral influence alone of what has been will operate with prodigious power for the throw of Mohammedan misrule.

The cry was raised a year ago, "Sen

Gentiles is sad enough, whether these be ylonians, Greeks, or Romans; but to be dden down by Turkey is the very depth of radation and shame. Such has been God's pose regarding that people that crucified the d of glory, and that city where he was nailed he tree. It is the bitterest cup of woe that ever given to a nation to drink.

erican and British missionaries enjoy the full-liberty under Turkish rule. Under Russian ninion this would have been at an end. It is ll known to many of us, that just before the break of the war our missionaries wrote home ressing their dread at the possibility of Rus-n success and a Russian possession of Asia
nor. They knew that they would be expelled, d their work scattered to the winds. They unstood, in this respect at least, the difference ween Turkish misrule and Russian tyranny.
ey knew that there could be always influence ought to bear at Constantinople more than at Petersburg.
Hope for Palestine, save as a Russian province Poland or Siberia, would have been at an
d. The heel of the Gentile would only have n more effectually planted on Jerusalem.
e influence already too greatly exercised in ria by Russia would have been utterly disas-us. The hatred of the Greek Church to the w is quite as ferocious as that of the Turk, d Israel would soon have had no place in Pal-
ine. We wonder so many evangelical men ould have taken the part of the Greek Church, d allowed themselves to be the dupes of ritual-
n. They might have known better, and at least od aloof from the zeal of Russian partisan-ip, and abstained from praises of Muscovite nevolence. The Rhodope Commission has no ubt opened the eyes of many; but why were ey not from the first suspicious of the friendly ngratulations of ritualism?
But apart from all this, let the Christian now rn his eye to Palestine. It is to England that ery eye in Palestine will now be turned; and is will be the question added, What are you ing to do for us? Is the connection between gland and Syria to be a barren one; or is gland to rise up to her responsibilities and do mething worthy of her name and power?
That England has undertaken responsibilities a simple fact; and it is a position from which no ave man need shrink. This is the age of re-onsibilities, personal and national, and it is wardly to turn away from them. Her respon-ilities are before her, whether she understand em or not; and the fact that a nation and a werful government has undertaken responsiities should not be a matter for reproach or alarm. Only let her go forward to redeem them, by acting boldly as a nation that loves the truth, honors justice, prizes the Bible, and recognizes the position which God has marked out for Israel in the latter days.

That the time of Israel's trouble has come to an end, we do not believe. There are days of evil in store for that unbelieving nation, sadder, it may be, than any heretofore. For the fourteenth chapter of Zechariah remains yet to be fulfilled, and the events predicted there are likely not only to startle the world, but to disarrange many a scheme of human calculation, political and religious.

Still, the events of the present day are calling the attention of men to the East, and especially to Israel. The predictions of God's Word will ere-long unfold themselves, perhaps more rapidly than we think; the ten tribes, still, like Judah, under the curse of scattering and unbelief, will be brought into view in some way that we know not; and, it may be in various sections and at different times, the whole nation will reappear and claim their ancient heritage.

Meanwhile we rejoice that it is given to England to keep the Jew and to deliver his land. Hitherto, for many a century, the foot of the Gentile has been upon Jerusalem to tread her down; now the hand of the Gentile comes forward to lift up her head. Already we seem to realize the words of prophetic peace:

"Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins" (Isaiah 40 : 2).

Let political partisanship wrangle over the Eastern Question, and the Turkish convention, and the Syrian protectorate; but let the Christian rejoice that we are swiftly approaching the redemption of Israel, and the second advent of Christ, even though the latter-day glory will have to be introduced with darkness and terror and war.

[It is understood that the ministers whose gospel sermons are printed every week in this journal do not necessarily agree with all the views that may be expressed in its articles from week to week upon prophecy, a subject in connection with which there is sometimes great diversity of opinion amongst pious and studious people.]

A LONDON CHILD'S CONVERSION.

In one of the wealthy homes of London lived a little girl named Laura. She had parents to educate her, servants to wait upon her, and carriages to ride in. There seemed a great deal around her to make her happy; but Laura was not pleased and satisfied with those things that please and satisfy other little ones.

She knew she often did those things which she ought not to do; and her heart was filled with fear and trembling. What could save her, she asked herself, from God's displeasure?

Before she could read, she treasured up passages of the Bible which others read to her, and went away by herself to ponder them over. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart," Laura often heard from the sacred volume. "But I don't love Him," she said to herself; "I don't know how to love Him; and I don't love my neighbor as myself. I love papa, mamma, and my sister best of all. Did ever anybody love God with all their heart, and their neighbor as themselves? Did God really mean so?" She was required to be Christ's faithful servant and soldier, and fight manfully under His banner. This amazed her greatly. "I am sure I do not fight; and I don't know what to fight against," thought she.

Laura asked many questions upon these perplexing subjects; but she was bid not to trouble herself upon such matters. "The Bible is not so strict as it seems to be," she was told. This eased her mind for a little while; but the Holy Spirit was stirring up Laura's heart. It was forgotten by Laura's friends, that as children sin and do often bitterly feel the weight of their ill-deserts, they must seek forgiveness and peace through Him "who was bruised for our transgressions, and by whose stripes we are healed."

When Laura was seven a pious servant-girl came into the family, who, observing her serious turn, sometimes spoke to her upon the subjects which so perplexed her. As soon as this was known she was sent away; but she left some little books behind, which the child hid away and read. "If I could only be a Methodist, I should be sure of salvation," Laura thought; but as she read she found it was not joining any particular people that could save her, but it was believing in Jesus Christ.

One day as she pondered she read the words of the hymn,

"Who on Jesus relies, without money or price
The pearl of forgiveness and holiness buys," and the Holy Spirit opened her eyes to behold and her heart to embrace its precious truth. 'Rely on Jesus; I do, I will, rely on Jesus," she cried aloud; "I will trust Him as my Saviour, and God will count me good for what He has done and suffered, and He will forgive all my sins for His sake." Joy and gratitude filled her bosom.

Before, every thing seemed easier than to believe; now, the way of believing seemed easier than any thing else. Thus the light of the glorious Gospel broke upon Laura's mind; she became a lovely disciple of the Lord Jesus, and grew up a devoted Christian woman.

A RUSSIAN COUNCILLOR AND HIS WIFE CONVERTED.

BY J. VENNING, OF ST. PETERSBURG.

One winter I was surprised to see a handsome, well-dressed young man of the rank of Statsky Swetnik (Councillor of State) brought into prison for breaking open a packet, and embezzling 40,000 roubles, connected with one of the public departments. He and his wife had lived in unwarranted extravagance; money was wanted by them just at that time; the means of obtaining it was regarded as a matter of indifference, and he unlawfully seized what fell within his grasp.

When I first visited him he had no sense of his guilt. On my expressing regret that he should have committed such a deed, he said, with tears, "Do not pity me; but oh! sir, go and see my wife, who is on the point of confinement, and destitute of the very necessaries of life. Will you go? will you go now, immediately?" It was in the midst of winter. I went and knocked at the door; no one came. Went upstairs. In the front room not an atom of furniture was to be seen—nothing but an old flower-pot in the window with frozen wall-flowers. Knocked at the door of the adjoining room.

On entering it, saw a beautiful young woman sitting up in bed, her dishevelled hair giving her a wild and frantic appearance. On the cold peetch lay her new-born infant, covered up in blankets, and an old haggard woman watching it. The room was as cold as ice. The stoves had not been lighted for several days, for want of wood. There was no fuel in the house. I instantly went to the adjoining sugar-manufactory, and procured wood and wine. I reported the case, and through Mr. Schwerin obtained from the empress 200 roubles, and the attendance of a medical man.

The Lord restored to the young woman her reason and her health. I presented her with a New Testament, and frequently visited her. She told me her history. "I was brought up," she said, "with every advantage of connection and education; I was taught in one of the Empress Mother's institutions; but after marriage we lived in vanity and folly, went beyond our means, accumulated debts, and you know the rest." I said, "What can you do?" "I can paint on velvet." I purchased some velvet, and she began.

Then I asked the husband whether he could fit it up for fire-screens. This he did admirably. The first pair was presented to the Empress Elizabeth. One I presented to the late Duke of Gloucester, with the history of the maker, which much affected his Royal Highness.

For years I visited him weekly in the town-prison. Being noble, he could not be knouted, but he could be sent to Siberia. His humble and penitent deportment was such, and he was so beloved by all the prisoners, especially by the sick for his attentions to them, that I laid his whole case before the Government, and he was sentenced to only five years' imprisonment.

On his liberation he was appointed to a new situation, and was an honor to it. His lovely and amiable wife became, I trust, a changed character. Her French letters to me were full of interest. One day her husband came to me, announcing her death; he said her last words were, 'Take my blessing and my thanks to him who gave me the New Testament, which has been and is now my hope and joy.'"

TO THE AMERICAN PUBLIC.

In publishing The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times in New York we are not introducing a new paper to your notice, but one that for the last twelve years has been before the English public, by whom it has been so cordially received that its circulation for a considerable period past has averaged 115,000 copies per week.

Emboldened by this evident appreciation as well as the very favorable reception of the few hundred copies circulated in this country for the past six months, we have concluded to publish an American edition, with such alterations and additions as may seem befitting for the American public.

The Christian Herald is the organ of no sect or class, does not advocate the interests of any denomination or party, and has no pecuniary gain in view, as its low price ($1.50 per annum) clearly evidences.

We enter into no competition with existing periodicals in this country, but are ready to give the right hand of fellowship to all engaged in the circulation of a pure Gospel, and hope from all such the recognition and greeting usually accorded a fellow-laborer in the same field.

The Christian Herald will contain every week a portrait and memoir of some person eminent in the religious world, and information about religious revivals. It will contain each week a sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London; a new sermon by the Rev. Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn; and occasionally a sermon by other noted American and English preachers.

Also, prophetic articles by clergymen and others on the Eastern crisis, and the second advent of Christ; ably written sto[illegible] and religious sketches, narratives, anecdotes, brief biographies, and a serial story of thrilling interest, will be among its weekly contents.

The annual subscription will be $1.50; balance of the year sent free. Subscriptions should be sent to Jos. Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, N. Y.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons the Christian Herald which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week, and the American readers of his sermons, by helping to circulate the Christian Herald, will be co-operating in rendering assistance to these institutions. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to his cousin, Mr. Joseph Spurgeon, manager of The Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times: "I am in constant receipt;—almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the Herald have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the Herald has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

Mr. Spurgeon will be much obliged to any ministers who will receive for distribution among their congregations copies of The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times. Upon receipt of application at the office, 63 Bible House, New York, from any minister in the United States, a number of gratuitous copies will be forwarded, charges paid.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Political Horizon is so overcast that any prediction as to the future of the two great leading parties, Republican and Democratic, would just now seem presumptuous. Party lines are broken with impunity, and thoughtful men on either side seem to be in a kind of incertitude—a half-expectant looking for of something better. It would not be very surprising if in the near future a general defection in both parties would result in the birth of a new organization. Something of the kind was shadowed forth in the opening days of the administration of President Hayes, but the little cloud failed to assume due proportions, and soon passed from view. Lately, the Greenback element seemed likely to obtain a very large following, but recent elections have demonstrated its inability to meet the present need.

The Cipher Telegrams published in the Tribune, and in the translation of which that paper has displayed considerable ingenuity, have caused much speculation in the minds of all classes of politicians. The questions asked are, Were such dispatches really sent? If so, has the Tribune correctly deciphered them? If so, who is responsible for the instructions they contained? Republicans taunt Democrats with the revelations of the Tribune, and Democrats retort by charging Republicans with fraudulent practices; meanwhile the Christian patriot mourns over the sin which is "a reproach to any nation," and looks anxiously forward to the time when Christ shall take to Himself His great power and reign; to that day when all men shall have but one aim in life—to glorify God and extend His kingdom on the earth.

The Yellow Fever, though somewhat abated in the larger cities, such as New Orleans, Memphis, and Vicksburg, still rages with great intensity, considering its duration—now about three months.

The deaths in New Orleans last week averaged nearly fifty a day. In Memphis the mortality last week reached a total of one hundred and fifty-seven, making the whole number of deaths in that city, since the commencement of the epidemic in August, close on to three thousand. In Vicksburg the abatement is most noticeable, the death-list for the week being but thirty-three.

The latest development of this terrible scourge is its rapid and deadly spread from the cities and large towns to the small settlements and habitations on the plantations of the lower Mississippi Valley. From Memphis to New Orleans every plantation has furnished its quota to swell the death-lists of this fearful epidemic. At last accounts from about Port Gibson, Miss., at least thirty plantations were affected; and in Warren County, outside of Vicksburg, ninety-six deaths have occurred.

Impending War with Afghanistan.—The dark and threatening clouds which have for some time been gathering on the north-west frontier of India seem about to burst in a storm of blood and fire. Shere Ali, the Ameer of Afghanistan, has long been exceedingly hostile to the British Government, and recently in open durbar uttered these words, "I have seven crores of rupees by me, every one of which I will hurl at the head of the British Government, and I will roll the border tribes against them like blasts of fire." Nor was this an idle boast, as subsequent events have proved. The present position of the quarrel is briefly this:

Russia having sent an envoy to Cabul, where she was supposed to be plotting against England, the Indian Government determined to send a friendly mission to the Afghan capital, with Sir Neville Chamberlain at its head, to point out to the Ameer the danger of lending himself to promote any aggressive designs of Russia. The expedition started from Peshawur on September 21st, and included about 1000 armed men. It proceeded to Jumrood, a station in British territory, close to the Afghan frontier, from whence Major Cavagnari, one of the leading members of the mission, rode forward, a small escort, to Ali Musjid, a station in Afg territory. Here it was found that the Ame commandant had advanced an outpost to centre of the pass, and was prepared to disp the passage; and that this was no idle thr was apparent from the fact that his troops l both sides of the pass. The embassage wa once withdrawn, the expedition has been bro up, and already English preparations are b made for a powerful military demonstrat against Afghanistan. Altogether 20,000 Ang Indian soldiers are to march against the Am It is questionable, however, whether it will possible to accomplish the conquest of the co try till the spring.

This Afghan crisis has caused considera sensation at Berlin and Vienna. Profes Vambéry, the great Hungarian traveller, written pointing out the necessity of Engla energetically resenting the insult offered to flag, and warning Austria-Hungary that this m lead to a fresh crisis in the Eastern Questi He regards a war between England and Rus as inevitable. Meanwhile, Professor Fawc and Lord Lawrence, both acknowledged auth ities on Indian affairs, have written protesti against the action of the British Government.

A Disastrous Bank Failure has occurred Scotland. The City of Glasgow Bank, wi above one hundred branches in different parts the country, has suspended payment with a li bility of nearly fifty millions of dollars. Th circumstances of the failure are unusually di graceful to the directors and managers. The have loaned the money intrusted to them to few rotten firms, and have made false reports the position of the bank, both to the Gover ment and their own shareholders. So con pletely had they deceived the public, that a fe days before the bank closed its doors, the $5 shares in the concern were bought and sold fre ly at $1100. The depositors and holders of note will suffer no loss, as it was an unlimited com pany, and every individual shareholder is liabl for the whole amount of the bank's indebte ness. The number of shareholders is nearl 1300, and each of them is required, as a fir step, to pay $2500. This, in addition to th loss of their shares, will prove a serious matter t many who had invested their savings in thi way. We are glad to see that the British Government is prosecuting the directors and managers for fraud.

"Kin Beyond the Sea," the able article b Mr. Gladstone in the North American Review has brought a perfect torrent of abuse on his devoted head. Mr. Gladstone sees farther ahea than most of his contemporaries; he recognize the manifest destiny of the United States, an he has had the moral courage to tell the English public some very unpalatable truths, and the English public, like an animal frequently mentioned in Scripture, has turned upon him to ren him. He compared the position and prospects of this country with those of England, not at all to the advantage of the latter; and he has in consequence been accused of a want of patriotism, and of rejoicing in the prospect of England's decline and fall. Mr. Gladstone was doubtless prepared when he wrote his article for such a reception of it, for prophets of evil have never been popular in their generation, and we have read of some who even ran a risk of their lives because the messages they delivered were more truthful than pleasant to their fellows. Time will show who is right, and John Bull will, in the mean time, be none the worse for hearing a little plain speaking on his position.

A Curious Memento, presented by the British and Foreign Bible Society, has been placed in a cavity of the pedestal supporting Cleopatra's Needle, which has been recently set up on the banks of the Thames. It consisted of a jar, taining a French and an English Bible, an A bic Genesis, a Hebrew Pentateuch, and the ei eenth verse from the third chapter of St. J Gospel in 215 different languages. A stan [illegible] measure, pound weight, some coins, a bronze plate representing the various stages of the removal and erection of the Needle, with a variety of small articles in everyday use in England, had previously been placed in the cavity.

Mr. J. B. Gough, the well-known temperance orator, has received a very cordial reception in England. An enthusiastic meeting assembled in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle in London on Tuesday, September 23d, to whom he delivered one of his eloquent addresses. It is twenty-five years since Mr. Gough first spoke on temperance before an English audience, and his popularity has in no way declined since that time. He has made arrangements to deliver orations in different parts of the country almost every day during the present month.

A notorious haunt of vice in London has, we notice with much pleasure, lost the sanction of the magistrates. We refer to the Argyll Rooms. For several years that place has been the rendezvous for vicious women and their dissolute patrons. It is stated that the attendance every night usually exceeded two thousand persons, amongst whom were to be seen men belonging to all ranks of the peerage. That such a place should have been tolerated so long, in a land calling itself Christian, seems almost incomprehensible, and that it should have been annually licensed by the magistrates was a disgrace to the whole bench; we congratulate them on having at last removed that stigma from their names by refusing to renew the license.

THE APPROACHING PROPHETIC CONFERENCE.

THE doctrine of the second coming of our Lord, and kindred topics connected with that doctrine, have been the subject of conferences at Mildmay Park, in London, and at the little English village of Addlestone, in Surrey. These meetings were attended by believers from all parts of the world, and the experience of those present was, that a more happy and blessed time had seldom been spent than while interchanging views on this precious doctrine, and in listening to men who had devoted much study to the subject of unfulfilled prophecy.

It is proposed to hold a conference of a similar character in New York on the 30th and 31st inst., and on November 1st. We trust our readers will pray that the blessing promised (Revelation 1 : 3) may descend on the meetings, and that they may be the means of strengthening the faith of believers, and of extending to those Christians who have not yet laid hold of this blessed doctrine the comfort and joy it affords.

It is hoped that Dr. Tyng, Rector Emeritus, St. George's Episcopal Church, New York, will preside, and that addresses will be delivered by several eminent ministers, including the Rev. W. P. Mackay, D.D., author of "Grace and Truth," of the Presbyterian Church, Hull, England.

The following is announced as the programme:

1st. "Christ's Coming; is it Personal and Visible?" Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., D.D., of Episcopal Church, New York City.

2d. "Christ's Coming; is it Pre-Millennial?" Rev. S. H. Kellogg, D.D., Professor of Theology, Presbyterian Seminary, Alleghany, Pa.

3d. "The First Resurrection." Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass.

4th. "The Rapture of the Church." Rev. W. P. Mackay, D.D., Presbyterian Church, Hull, England.

5th. "Times of the Gentiles." Rev. Jno. T. Duffield, D.D., Professor in Princeton College.

The following

indorsed by a long list of bishops, professors, and ministers, has been issued:

PROPHETIC CONFERENCE.

Dear Brethren in Christ: When from any cause some vital doctrine of God's Word has fallen into neglect or suffered contradiction and reproach, it becomes the serious duty of those who hold it not only strongly and constantly to reaffirm it, but to seek by all means in their power to bring back the Lord's people to its apprehension and acceptance. The precious doctrine of Christ's second personal appearing has, we are constrained to believe, long lain under such neglect and misapprehension.

In the Word of God we find it holding a most conspicuous place. It is there strongly and constantly emphasized as a personal and imminent event, the great object of the Church's hope, the powerful motive to holy living and watchful service, the inspiring ground of confidence amid the sorrows and sins of the present evil world, and the event that is to end the reign of Death, cast down Satan from his throne, and establish the Kingdom of God on earth. So vital, indeed, is this truth represented to be, that the denial of it is pointed out as one of the conspicuous signs of the apostacy of the last days.

Now, while casting no word of reproach upon those who may differ from us, we cannot be insensible to the fact that there has been a sad decline in our times from the clear, vivid, ardent faith of the early Church in regard to this doctrine. Very many Christians have been taught to think of the coming of Christ as equivalent to their own death; others regard it as synonymous with the gradual diffusion of Christianity. Many, satisfied with this present world, have little desire for the return of the absent Lord; while here and there are those who boldly speak of such an event as only a "fascinating dream," destined never to be realized. But while we lament all this, and can but regard it as an alarming symptom of the present state of religion, it is an occasion for the profoundest gratitude that there has within the last few years been such a powerful and wide-spread revival of this ancient faith. Looking over the Church of God in all its branches, and listening to the clear and decisive testimony to this truth that is coming up in such volumes from teachers and pastors, expositors and lay workers, evangelists and missionaries, it can but appear to us, that after the long sleep of the Church, the wise are at last rising up, and trimming their lamps, in preparation for the coming of the Bridegroom.

In view of these facts it has seemed desirable that those who hold to the personal pre-Millennial advent of Jesus Christ, and who are "looking for that blessed hope," should meet together in conference, as our honored brethren in England have recently done, to set forth, in clear terms, the grounds of their hope, to give mutual encouragement in the maintenance of what they believe to be a most vital truth for the present times, and in response to our Lord's "Behold, I come quickly," to voice the answer by their prayers and hymns and testimony, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

We, the undersigned, therefore cordially invite you to meet with us at Church of Holy Trinity, Madison Avenue and Forty-second Street (Rev. S. H. Tyng, Jr., Rector), in the city of New York, on the 30th and 31st of October and 1st of November, 1878, to listen to a series of carefully-prepared papers on the pre-Millennial advent of the Lord Jesus Christ and connected truths, and to participate in such discussions as the topics may suggest.

TAKE NO THOUGHT.

A SERMON BY THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

"Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (for after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things" (MATT. 6 : 31, 32).

1. This Precept forbids anxious Thought, but does not encourage Idleness or Prodigality—The Pious Monk—The White Ones—Slaves by Work and Worry—Mary at the Wedding Feast—Our Crosses—Avoid Hoarding. 2. This Precept commands Thought—Our Father's Banner—Christ's Forethought for His People—The Hen and Her Chickens—What we should Care for—Eruption of Vesuvius upon Pompeii, etc.

THESE are soothing words to read, but hard words to practise. Had any other man spoken them, we should have replied, "Physician, heal thyself;" for scarcely shall we find a teacher who is himself free from care. But Jesus Christ is not only a giver of precepts, but His life is the exposition of them; and if ever you want to know what Christ means by His precepts,

LOOK AT HIS LIFE.

You may rest assured that He never gave us a command that He was not Himself prepared to exhibit in His life. We are servants of God, and he Himself condescended to be a servant for our sakes. He was a model servant; and the service He requires of us He himself shows us how to perform.

I do not intend, therefore, to explain the text so much by words of my own as by the life of Jesus Christ; and it will be more profitable and fresher to take the words and say, If you would know their meaning, look upon Him whom ye call Master; you shall understand His sayings by His actings. And see in the text, first, a precept forbidding thought; second, a precept commanding thought; and then in the two precepts, if we are able to keep them, I see a frame of mind admirably fitted for all believers on coming to the table of communion.

First, then, we have a precept forbidding thought: "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? for after all these things do the Gentiles seek." How are we to understand this? Certainly not in the sense of the idler, who says, "God will provide, and therefore there is no need to labor. God's providence is mine inheritance, and therefore I will fold my arms and sit still." The inheritance of the man who says this will be and ruin to his character. Holy Scripture says, "He that will not work, neither shall he eat;" and it would, perhaps, be the best way of treating some men if they were never allowed to eat except when they had earned—of course excusing those incapacitated by old age or sickness—work being the duty of all, and work being a benefit to all. You have, perhaps, heard of

that he might spend his life in devotion; and when the brethren went into the fields to work, he remained in his cell, too spiritual to labor, and fitted only for communion with angels. When the time for meals approached he was astonished to find that he was not called to the refectory ; and at last, the demands of his stomach overcoming the claims of that spiritual heart, he inquired why he was not called to meals ; and he was informed that as he was too spiritual to work he was probably too spiritual to eat, and that the laws of the house did not allow him to consume any thing until he had earned it.

Now our Lord Jesus Christ was not one of those who had nothing to do. Point to one empty hour, to one day, in which he was a sluggard. There is the life before you ; put you finger on the spot in which he could be accused of being idle or sluggish. If it were so we could interpret the text according to the lazy man's version of it.

Neither did our Lord intend here prodigality, when he used the words, " Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat ? or, What shall we drink ? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed ?" That is too often what a young man does when

HE COMES INTO HIS ESTATE.

Take no thought ? No, not he ; as long as the gold lasts, he will scatter without stint ; and so with extravagance he brings himself speedily to poverty. But our Lord Jesus Christ never meant that, for He never practised it. With what singular economy did our Saviour always behave—generous to the last degree. He fed five thousand [illegible] women, but with the strictest economy, He said, " Gather up the fragments [illegible] remain, that nothing be lost." Jesus Christ would have us take care of what we have ; we are only stewards, and a steward must not waste. Extravagance—that is, suffering any thing to perish which should be used—must not be allowed.

Neither did our Lord forbid a certain kind of forethought. One kind He does forbid—that anxious care about the future which is centred on mere earthly things, such as food and clothing. But He Himself —who, as I have said, is His own expositor, and the key to His own teaching—exercised forethought often, even from the very commencement of His work. For instance, He looked forward in regard to the death of Lazarus ; and when He might have gone at once and healed him, He stayed until the time had come for displaying His resurrection power.

AND AS TO HIS OWN DEATH,

He looked forward to that, even at the very opening of His ministry, and perhaps long before. He knew he had a baptism to be baptized with ; and how was He straitened until it was accomplished ? He steadfastly set His face towards Jerusalem all His life long, and His whole career was a preparation for that sacrifice for the sins of men.

Hence He does not forbid us to take thought in regard to the end of life, and to be prepared for it ; for if we did not so our life would be all confusion, and could not be well directed.

WHAT, THEN, DID HE MEAN

by " Take no thought "? He meant, first, let no provision for your temporal wants be the great aim of life ; for this is what the heathen Gentiles do. They live to eat, and drink, and clothe themselves. This is what the savage does. Give him food to eat, shelter from the storm, and a covering from the inclement weather, and he cares for nothing beyond. " After all these things do the heathen seek." But you are not to make this the end of life. You are made for something better. For this the ox may live, for this the ass may live and die, but not the Christian ; it is utterly beneath the dignity of an immortal spirit to be living alone, or chiefly for the satisfying of their earthly appetites. It is true these things will require some thought, for God has made us akin to the dust, and the appetites of animals are shared by us. But the Saviour says : " Take no thought for these things as compared with service of God and the honor of His name, which should be the great object and aim of your being." And He says that His disciple is required to hate even his own life, and to be prepared to regard it as a mere trifle, if it should stand in the way of the glory of Christ.

Remember, if it should ever come to this that you should lose your place, your livelihood, or your property, rather than do wrong, you must lose every thing rather than commit the smallest sin ; and if it should ever come to this, that you should lie in a prison rather than deny the faith, then lie in prison rather than accept the traitor's opportunity of denying your Master.

Remember the martyrs, who, when they could have purchased life on these terms, chose rather to die; who could burn, though they could not turn ; and they took no thought how they should live, but regarded such matters as mere insignificant trifles, seeking first and chiefly the kingdom of God and His righteousness. And who will say that they were unwise ? If any should think thus, open yonder pearly portals, and see them there made who took no thought whatever for themselves, but who followed the Lamb whithersoever He led the way.

But still further, to open up the subject, remember what Christ did. You cannot say that Jesus Christ considered what He should eat or what He should drink. You cannot say that His life was any thing to Him, for He laid it down for our sakes. When the devil offered Him all the kingdoms of this world, He rebuked him ; and when Peter chided Him about dying, He regarded that disciple as Satan—" Get thee behind me, Satan ; for thou art an offence unto me ; for thou savourest not the things of God, but those that be of men." He counted nothing that he had worthy of preserving ; but taking no thought of any thing, He surrendered all to God for the good of His people.

These words teach us we are not to make ourselves

SLAVES BY WORK AND WORRY.

I see some Christians who appear as if they meant to grasp all the world. They have plenty of money and plenty of business, but they must have more. They are up with the lark, and the day is not long enough for them. They have long had property enough, but still they have not enough, and never will have, unless the grace of God should take its proper place in their heart. See how wearied they are ! I have seen with only a piece of dry bread, yet quite happy ; and I have seen a rich man with plenty of luxuries, but yet perfectly miserable ; the one thankful and contented with his little, the other discontented.

The Christian should not be worried and wearied so as not to have time for devotion. God should not have the mere scraps, the odds and ends, the cheese-parings and candle-ends of life, as I have known to be His only portion in some men's houses ; but He should have the chief of our time, and all our time should be consecrated to Him. But while it is right to be diligent in business, let all be done for His glory and in His name. When did our Lord worry about gold and silver ? Did a cloud ever rest on Him from anxiety about these things ? Enough was given to Him for worldly matters, and that was entrusted to Judas, His treasurer ; but He took things calmly and quietly, and we should do the same. He meant also that about any thing. He Himself never was. You never read about His being in a great state of fret and anxiety. Look at the mother of our Lord at the wedding-feast. There was no wine, or it was all used. She was in a fret. " They have no wine ;" and the good mother is all concern about the matter. But He simply says, " Woman, what have I to do with thee ? Mine hour is not yet come." But His time would come when He would let them have what was needed for the wedding-feast, and till then the Saviour was calm and quiet about it. And this is what we should do. Having done all we can by honest labor and prayer, we should leave the result to God, for He would not have His people cumbered with much service or vexed with earthly care.

Do not murmur, and say my cross is heavier than yours. Well, I would not have you to change with me, for no man can take another's cross, for each cross is specially adapted to its bearer ; and if we could all this morning, and if each could take up one which he liked better than his own, we should all come back in an hour, crying to have our own crosses back again ; for our cross has got fitted to our back, and if we had a trial of our own choosing, mayhap the needed grace would not come.

Christ did not murmur though He was a poor man, and His food was not delicate, nor His drink and clothing of the choicest but He was a joyous man—a man of sorrows for our sakes, but yet, personally, the happiest of mankind.

And we should never let these earthly things drive us to despair. Possibly there is in this large audience one who says " Things are very hard with me ; I canno get on, and my troubles thicken around me. I think I shall be obliged to throw i up altogether."

Throw it up ? When did your Lord throw it up ? You can carry well enough the load which God appoints ; but if you let the devil sit on the top of it, in the form of anxieties and cares, the burden will crush you to the earth. Imitate your bless ed Master, and cry, like Him, "My God, my God!" even when that God appeared to have forsaken him.

Upon this point I will only say one other thing. We must not so cultivate thrift as to get into the habit of hoarding. There are some Christians who are so anxious to save that they save every thing. The poor get nothing and the church nothing, or rather less than nothing; for they occupy the place which others have paid for, and put others to the expense which they never help to bear.

but the first thing is the saving of the soul; and there are some who are looking so much to saving that their souls seldom get saved at all. "To get and to hold, to get and to hold," seem to be the end and object of their being. But it was not so with Christ, "who, though He was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we, through His poverty, might be made rich;" whose riches lay in giving, and who was the richest man that ever lived, because He gave more than any one else, for He gave Himself; and so, in the largeness of His infinite bounty, He exalted all that lived.

I urge you, my dear brothers and sisters, by the wounds of Jesus, to get rid of care, by believing that His heart beats true to you in the little things as well as in the great affairs of life; numbering all our trials and sorrows, counting even the very hairs of our heads, according to that gracious word, "In all our afflictions He was afflicted, and the angel of His presence saved them." Let us then cast all our care upon Him, that we may cease to care.

Second. We have also in the text a precept commanding thought: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." Call back your care from the things of this life, and send them forth in the things of the life to come. What ought we to care about? What did Christ care about? His Father's glory. For this He lived and for this He died.

GOD'S GLORY WAS THE END OF EVERY ACTION OF HIS LIFE.
Brethren, sisters, bought with the blood of Christ, we cannot say this of ourselves; but let it be our constant aim to live in all things, even eating and drinking, to the glory of God.

Next to this, Christ's great care was to do the work which God had given Him to accomplish. When sitting hungry on the well, His disciples wondered why He did not ask for meat. "Master, eat," they said; but He replied, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish His work." "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." He was absorbed in the work which was given Him to do. And how early He commenced! What a lesson for you lads and lasses here this morning! You remember when only a child He was missing from the company, and He replied on his return, "How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

And the same description was equally descriptive of the end as of the beginning of His life. When they led Him forth from the garden of Gethsemane, he might have said the same. He never served Himself, or sought for honor or pleasure; His life was one of self-denial; and when people wished to thrust honors upon him He withdrew Himself. He did not seek for riches, but His whole life was spent among the poor; and among them there were none poorer than He. Oh, if we lived like that we should live happy lives! We should, it is true, multiply our sorrows as He did; but a deep happiness would fill our souls.

Never let us be content till we can say, "for me to live is Christ." And although God should hurl me like a thunderbolt forward and onward, until I reach the point to which He would have me go, I must never swerve, but must go cheerfully and faithfully onward. So must it be with us all.

Another thing our Lord took thought about was His people. From the very first day when He had disciples, to the day on which He was taken up, He was always thinking about them. Read the Gospels and you will be struck with the tender care which He manifests for them. There was Peter, for instance. Christ knew that that he might sift him as wheat; but Christ stepped before the devil and said to Peter, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." He did not say I will pray for thee, but I have prayed for thee; I have intercepted the temptation. And when they took Christ away to crucify Him He said, "If ye seek me, let these go their way." It was just so at the table of His last supper. He was about to die, but He never asked comfort for Himself, but thought only of giving the disciples comfort: "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me;" and at such a time, when He might very reasonably have asked them to refresh him, He thought only of them, and took a basin and towel and began to wash His disciples' feet; because for them He lived and for them He died.

Oh! it was a beautiful simile, when Christ, looking over Jerusalem and thinking of its sinners, soon to be destroyed, exclaimed, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." It is a beautiful picture of care. The poor bird seems

if she can but get her wings over her chicks, which nestle down into her bosom. And thus Christ looked upon sinners, whom He saw going down to destruction; and He longs to gather even these sinners with wings of love. Nay, it was not a mere expression; for when a crowd gathered—although surely it is not a preacher's duty to feed his congregation—and when His compassionate eye saw that they were hungry, He did care for them—the women and children especially, who had come so far and looked so weary. He said in effect, What shall we do for these people? "I have compassion on the multitude;" and like a prince with boundless munificence, He cared for the poor and fed them.

And thus the man who is like Christ lives for others. It has been said that there are some people whose first care is for themselves; and their second care is for themselves; and their third care is for themselves; and so on as many times as you like to say it: and perhaps somewhere down there is a little possible care for somebody else, but it is too far down to come to any thing. And it is sometimes so with Christians; but it ought not to be so. For themselves the heathen care, the brute beasts care for themselves; but the Christian should care for others.

Now, "He that spared not His own Son, but gave Him up for us all," and has given us His flesh to be our meat, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things? What! will God deny you bread when He has given you the bread of heaven? Deny you clothing, when He has given you a robe of righteousness? Will He withhold from you an earthly dwelling, when He has provided for you a mansion in the skies which fadeth not away? If there is any place where more than any other

it is at the communion. Cares! Why do we carry them? Have they ever put a single sixpence into your purse? Our sighs and our groans make truly sorry music. The man who will carry a bundle of staves, and hundreds of staves, may do so if he likes; but if he will give me one to walk with I will be content. He that has enough is a rich man, and he that loads himself with the thick clay will have to lay it aside, like the beast of burden, when he gets to the journey's end.

But I address some who are not Christians, and who may say, 'You may let us care about the world, for we have nothing else to care for." Well, I reply, when I see and I see the farmer coming to give him some swill from his house, I say, "Let the creature have it—I don't want it, but if he likes it let him have it;" and if I see a man running after this or that amusement, this or that fleshly enjoyment, I say, "I don't envy him—I don't want these things." And, taking these good things, as you call them, you take the devil and all his works, and the casting away from the presence of God forever.

WHEN MOUNT VESUVIUS BEGAN TO POUR ITS LAVA
upon Pompeii many of the people were in the theatre enjoying themselves; I don't know what the play was, but this I know—there was not a man who saw the danger who did not run as hard as he could to the fields, in order to make his escape. A few remained in their houses, and there they are to this day, just as the lava found them, and they have only lately been exhumed. Ah! if men were wise, the richest gains and the choicest pleasures which have ever tempted the human mind would never tempt them to tarry; they would never rest till they had "escaped from the wrath to come." Oh! if you knew your danger, you would cry for mercy, and would not wait till you reached your chamber, but would fall now on your knees, and ask, "Lord, what must I do to be saved?"

"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Trust Him whose teaching I have tried to explain; trust Him who did more than teach, for He lived out his precepts; trust Him who did more than live, for He died; trust Him who did more than die, for He rose again.

The Lord bless you! Amen.

BRIAN GALLAGHER'S EXPELLED SON AND DAUGHTER.

A TRUE STORY, BY MR. HENRY MARTIN.

"No, niver! Mane swadlin' turncoats, even though me own flesh and blood, shall niver put head ondher me roof—no, not iv the heavens this minnit war black as a raven's wing and rainin' down a second deluge, let alone its bein' the bright and smilin' day that it is this blessed June mornin'. No, niver shall it be sed that Brian Gallagher put his own heart's feelin's afore the commands uv his Church. Iv it cost me me life from a broken heart, I'd dhrive ye from me dure."

Brian Gallagher was a skilful pilot and fisherman—and these strong and passionate words of his were addressed to his son Phil and his daughter Rose, as they stood at the door of his little cottage, pale and agitated from his refusal to receive them.

The "head and front of their offending" was, they had got possession from a Christian neighbor of the Holy Scriptures, and had come to love their doctrine and follow their rule; but the Bible was a forbidden book in the parish, and Father Hennessy, a severe man—who as a celibate did not know the strength of parental feeling, nor the agony of heart produced by violence done to it—had insisted that unless the two young people surrendered to him the heretical volume, they should be expelled from their home as incorrigible children, to save the parish from the poison of their opinions.

"I'd do any thing, father, to plaze ye," answered Phil; "that is, any thing that wasn't agin the Lord's will—even though it war to go on me two bare knees round the kingdom. But, [illegible] darlint, how could I give up the Word o' God, that has been the light o' salvation to me sowl?—and that to be burnt too—for Father Hennessy swore he'd put the sacred book with the tongs in the flames, scornin' to touch it with his fingers. Oh, father, how could I give up [illegible]ed Word for such an ind as that? No, I'd sooner give up me own body to be burnt.

"Shure 'the Book' is the Lord's own livin' voice to us, father, which He has towld us to hear, love, and obey, and which He wishes us to guard and cherish as our very life; and anyhow it wouldn't do you nor the priest much good to take the precious volume from me, for its texts by hundreds are deep down in me heart, and as lodged there no power o' man can touch them. Nor is it in me own power, even if I would, to give up what I've larnt, for no wan can jist remimber and forget as it plazes him."

Further details of this painful interview between the father and his children might be given, but suffice it to say, that Phil kept his resolve to stand firm by the Bible, and his sister Rose, encouraged by his example, did the same. Their father Brian also was steadfast to his declared purpose, so that the young Irish lad of seventeen and his sister, two years his junior, were fain to look for a home other than that in which they had drawn their first breath and passed their childhood. Amid the sneers and jeers of unsympathizing onlookers, they had, weeping bitterly, to leave their native village.

Such incidents, alas! have not been uncommon in Ireland. The Celtic nature is deeply religious—using the phrase in its broadest sense—and the commands of what is called "the Church" are regarded as absolutely binding by such men as Brian Gallagher. The warm Irish heart, it is true, with its strong family affections, rises up rebellious against this disowning and casting out of children; but the demands of an ignorant conscience, blinded by superstition, and goaded by clerical authority, are inexorable, and even though the heart break, as Brian Gallagher himself expressed it, the son or daughter, deemed a heretic, is banished from the home, as accursed of Heaven.

"Think not I am come to send peace on the earth," said the Saviour; "I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance with his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; and a man's foes shall be they of his own household."

Phil and Rose Gallagher, however, were given to know the fulfilment of another Divine prediction, "No man hath left father or mother, for My sake and the Gospel's, but shall receive an hundredfold now in this time, and in the world to come eternal life." The Christian friend who had in love to their souls given them the Scriptures, interested other friends like-minded in the young refugees' behalf, so that soon another home, far superior in the highest respects to that they had been driven from, was opened to them, and "father and mother, brothers and sisters," of the household of faith were likewise soon added. They were for a season kindly cared for in a neighboring town, and afterwards were sent to friends in England.

After the departure of his children, Brian Gallagher was a man to be pitied. While his temper was up, no sacrifice seemed too great for him to make at the call of supposed religious duty; but when upon seeing Phil and Rose vanish from his sight, he turned to his accustomed seat in the chimney-corner, and his passion had time to cool, things appeared in a somewhat different light, and an irrepressible yearning for his loved ones arose and struggled in his bosom.

The tears of his wife, too, though she was but the stepmother of his children, added to his painful emotions. He relented and wavered, and would have gone after the banished ones to recall them, had not his spiritual guide suddenly made his appearance, and, stepping into the house, commended his obedience to the injunction laid upon him, and fanned anew his blind and angry zeal for "the thrue Church."

"The highest authority—the Pope himself—has put his ban upon the cursed heretical book," said Father Hennessy, "and upon the Society that prints and circulates it; and it must not be found in my parish, I've made up my mind to that; and you, Brian Gallagher, have my best priestly benediction for backing me up in this determination."

"Thank yer riverence," answered Brian. "I'm proud to stand by me religious shupayryers; and yit, Father Mat (this was the priest's baptismal name), it's crushin' the very heart in me; for oh, God help me, it's the sorest throuble I've had in all me life."

"Tut, tut!" cried the stern priest, "let us hear no more o' that. It's foolish, and a mortal sin, me man. Hear what the Church (?) says, and take a warning from it,—'He that loveth wife or child more than me, is not worthy of me.' Be thankful it's your children and not your life you're asked to give up, Brian Gallagher, for you'd be bound to give your life if I asked it."

"Oh, how I wish it war my life you asked for," responded poor Brian, "and not me childer! It's me belief I'd resign it aisier; but as it's the Lord's will that Phil and Rose should go, in His holy name I'll bow to me lot, though it brings me to the grave."

Deluded man! It was not the Lord's will that his children should be exiled, and least of all because of their love for the Holy Scriptures. To teach such a doctrine was a wicked libel upon God's sacred name and character, and this the miserable parent, if he had but true insight, might have found out.

To continue in the house brooding over his thoughts and feelings was impossible—he could not endure the torment of his own reflections. To relieve his mind, he busied himself with unwonted zeal, and yet withal with an absent mind, in his calling.

"What on airth has cum over Brian?" said one of his comrades to another one day. "He used to be wan you could rely on. No wan knew betther whin to howld and whin to venthur—as sinsible and raysonable a man he was as any in the disthrict. But, 'pon me conshuns, of late I can tell ye he has becum a caution; why you'd imagine he was for ever and a day in a drame, or was half his time lookin' at a ghost. Last Tuesday he'd have sent us all, clean as a whistle, to the bottom, had not Andy Maguire forced the tiller from his hand, and brought the Polly Hopkins's bow as it should be to a whapper of a wave that, as Brian was steerin', would as shure as day in a twinklin' have swamped us, and landed every mother's sowl ov uz at the bottom of the say."

Brian's comrade was right. The wretched man was ever as in a haunted dream, and existence had become a burden to him. Almost reckless, he would also risk any danger and dare any consequences to become lost to himself in the excitement of a perilous moment.

All attempts, however, thus to drown reflection proved unavailing; or, if successful for a time, the misery within quickly returned. Amid all his forced and fevered employment, a voice from his inner self never ceased to call for the return of the loved ones he had so cruelly banished—the brave son and fair daughter once the light and pride of his dwelling.

It is not wonderful, therefore, that after a while he began to lose faith in the rectitude of his unnatural conduct—felt that perhaps he had been too hasty and unrelenting. Words, too, which his daughter Rose spoke in his ear with sobs and tears, as he spurned her from his door, came with a power to his remembrance that would not be resisted.

"Father," she said, "though the baste o' the field wouldn't thrate its offspring as you are me, may the Lord in heaven, who will take me up, forgive and bless you. I blame not you for this unnattheral act, but thim that has set you on it, and who ought to know betther. In place of wantin' to get the livin' Word of the Lord from me, ye ought to be the furst to put it in me hand. Oh! whin will it be that the blessed St. Paul would be able to say of every boy and girl in this so-called Christian land what he did of a young Christian—Timothy—in the early times of the Gospel, 'From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make you wise unto salvation, by faith that is in Christ Jesus'? But good-by, father; and may the Lord whom I have found in the Book guide ye to what is right!"

At the time Brian Gallagher flung back with scorn the remonstrance and prayer of his child but now the words she spoke came back with burning sting to his conscience, and evoked remorse that filled him with sore disquietud and pain.

And yet he could not bring himself to und his evil work. A cowardly shrinking from wha he considered would be an act of self-humiliatio held him in suspense. That some time or othe he would recall the banished ones was his settle intention, but precisely when he could not brin himself to determine. And thus it ever is wit poor human nature, when it is the prey of contending passions. When we would do good, ev is present with us; and the virtuous decision a most made to-day is sent back again into the region of uncertainty and doubt to-morrow.

The extraordinary and tragical circumstance under which he was soon to meet them he littl imagined.

(To be concluded.)

THE LAST HOURS OF SIR DONALD McLEOD.

THE following account of the death of Sir McLeod is furnished by one of his friends, wh on hearing of his injury, went to St. George Hospital in search of him. He found him in th accident ward, laid upon a bed, awaiting an examination by the surgeon.

"There had been little or no hemorrhag and, owing to the shock, there was no pai while the mind was clear. He suffered mere from discomfort and prostration of strengt On seeing me he smiled, and asked me to t him what had happened to him.

"His left arm, which was much crushed, w then removed while he was under the influence of ether. He was then placed in a bed in a small room, the surgeon pronouncing the case hopeless, and that he was sinking rapidly, and could not survive more than half an hour. (He lived more than two hours after this.) While the operation was being performed, I had gone to fetch his sister, Mrs. Hawkins; and, on returning to the hospital with her, we received this dreadful announcement. On being conducted to his room, we found him lying quietly in bed with his eyes closed, surrounded by his father-in-law, Sir Robert Montgomery, a young friend who was staying with him, the lady superintendent, a nurse, and the surgeon.

"He was told, as quietly as possible, that he was dying, to which he only replied, 'Is it really so? I don't feel very ill.' He was asked if we might engage in prayer to God, to which he said he should like it as far as he could collect his thoughts. We then knelt, commending him in earnest prayer to God, to which he gave a hearty 'Amen.' He lay silent for some time; not a murmur escaped his lips; and he retained the same placid countenance throughout.

"Presently I said, 'I have no doubt you can say, "Into Thy hands I commend my spirit; for Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth."' He replied, 'MOST CERTAINLY!' 'And you can say,

"COME, LORD JESUS, COME QUICKLY"?'

He repeated the text, adding, 'I shall then be free from sin and sorrow, and forever with the Lord,' or words to that effect. He then engaged in prayer, almost inaudibly; but the last sentence was, 'Praised be His holy name forever and ever.' These were his last words. He now rapidly sank. Presently he drew a long, deep sigh, as if his spirit was departing, and then the breathing became feebler; then a pause; then a few more breathings. Another pause, longer than before; again a few more gentle respirations; and then he simply ceased to breathe, at twenty minutes to ten—a little less than five hours after the accident.

"We held our breath, overawed. I shall never forget the silence, the solemnity, the holy calm of that dying hour of the believer. 'O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?'"

Thus passed away suddenly, from the midst of loving friends, one of whom it has been justly remarked, that "Wherever he went his presence was like sunshine; and the sunshine was the reflection of another Presence—even of Him of whom it is said, 'In Thy presence is fulness of joy.'" The peace of God which passeth all understanding, and which had sustained him in bereavement, kept him calm and serene in the dark hours of the mutiny in India, and upheld him in the difficulties and trials of life, enabled him now to triumph over the last enemy—death.

THE BRIDE AND HER DOWRY.

A CLERGYMAN was sent for to visit a girl who was seriously ill. The illness proved fatal, and the mother was left bereaved of her child as well as husband. A few days after her child's funeral the widow called and requested to see the clergyman. She put into his hand a small packet, containing money, which she begged he would give to some society which was sending the Gospel to the heathen world. He opened the parcel, and to his amazement counted out $20. He at once remonstrated with the widow, told her that, gaining her precarious living as a laundress, she surely ought not to give so large a sum. With firmness she urged him to take it, and then said, "How I come to have this large sum is just this: When my child was born, I thought, 'She'll live to get married some of these days,' and I thought I would begin to put by a little sum to be a store for her then, and I began that day with sixpence. You know what happened last week. Well, I thought to myself, 'The heavenly Bridegroom has come, and He has called her home to be His bride; and as He has taken the bride, it is only right He should have the dowry.'"

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 27th.—Luke 16 : 19-31. Golden Text, Prov. 14 : 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day tell us that "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness: but the righteous hath hope in his death." The Hebrew word is much more expressive, "a just claim," because he is justified by faith. Our subject presents to us two men—the one lost, the other saved. No positive sin is recorded of the lost man, and no righteous action of the saved man. Our Lord, in continuing his discourse of the prodigal son and the elder brother, "said also unto His disciples" the parable of the steward, in which He teaches, through this prudent but unprincipled man, the great necessity of making provision for the future. He had done wisely, though he had not done well; "for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light" (verse 8).

Then He shows the utter impossibility of serving two masters, God and mammon. And the Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things; and they derided Him. And it was to them this parable was addressed: "There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day." The Lord does not condemn either his food or his clothing. Every rich man has a better coat than a poor man, and better food upon his table. This was not his sin; he paid for what he had, and encouraged trade; and no doubt it was better than hoarding up his money.

He seems to have been a religious man, for Abraham calls him "Son," and he calls Abraham "Father." He was more than usually kind-hearted, for even in hell, where his own case was hopeless, he wants to warn his brethren from following him. Most men when in pain have no thought for others; and here, amidst the agonizing torment which makes him besiege heaven for one drop of water, he can think of the lost state of his brethren. What, then, was his sin? That of tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands in our land—perhaps your sin, dear reader: he lived for time, when God had created him for eternity. The sumptuous fare and clothing, the ease and the comfort, the success of business—these were the things he lived for.

Perhaps for one thought he gave to God he would give five hundred to his business or his pleasure. The fashion of his clothing was an object to him. No doubt the invitations to his sumptuous feasts were given to the great and noble; the world was in his heart, and in all this his calculations were for time, not for eternity; for himself, and not for God.

A business engagement could not be postponed, but prayer-meeting might be. As a man of business, no doubt every transaction was definite in the extreme, clear, unmistakable; but in his private devotions there was nothing of the kind. A few hurried prayers to appease his conscience, without aim or end—this was all. And in his public devotions it was the same thing. Regular at the synagogue, of course—it was "the thing," he was not a heathen; but in the secret of his soul there was no intercourse between him and God; the ominous silence between him and his Creator had never been broken—it was the stillness of a soul dead in trespasses and sins. And this was a man living under the avowed obligation to love the Lord his God with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his strength, and with all his mind (Luke 10 : 27).

The beggar who lay at his gate had but one earthly desire: it was, "to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table." He did not so much as ask for the broken bread and meat from the table. His calculations were small indeed for time, because he was living for eternity. It was no hardship to him to take his place among the dogs here on earth, because he knew that it was not forever; for he would "enter in through the gates into the city," where "without are dogs," etc. (Rev. 22 : 14, 15).

"And it came to pass that the beggar died." Perhaps the dogs missed him more than any one upon earth; but he was not unknown in heaven, for he was "carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom." Though he had no one to minister to him on earth, they who "minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. 1 : 14) were waiting for him. "The rich man also died, and was buried." Probably there was a magnificent funeral to celebrate the entry of this ruined soul into its endless misery and desolation. And God lifts the curtain and shows us the great hereafter. We see the rich man in hell—not because he was rich, for David was rich, Abraham, Joseph, and many others were rich, who nevertheless faithfully served God.

Why, then, was he found in hell? He was no murderer, no thief, no adulterer, no swearer, as far as we know; but he was guilty of the loss of his own soul. And so are you, my reader, if your soul is not saved. Some one must be guilty of your lost state; either God has been unwilling to save you, or you must be unwilling to be saved, for the Bible is witness that "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners" (1 Tim. 1 : 15), and "He is the propitiation . . . for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2 : 2). Can you, do you, judge it possible that He should make a perfect provision for your salvation and yet be unwilling to save? Why then are you not saved? Where can the fault lie but in your own guilty indifference to the claims upon you of that God who formed you for Himself? (Isa. 43 : 21.)

The rich man in hell "lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me." Not knowing God, he made no formal prayers to Him: now all was too real. "And send Lazarus," he said, "that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame." Poor unhappy soul, he had made his choice for mammon, and there could be now no reverse. "Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things." This is all the accusation Abraham lays to his charge. He had wholly, deliberately, and with perfect freedom of choice, chosen to live for time, and the consequences were irreversible. "And likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented."

Lazarus was not saved because he was a poor man, but because he honored his God and his own soul. If it is a piteous thing to see a rich man despise his own immortality by living only for time, how much more mad does a poor man seem, who, having so little on earth, yet throws away his chance of heaven!

"And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf FIXED: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence." Here is so clear a declaration from the Lord Jesus Himself, that it is marvellous how men can doubt the eternity of punishment which is the inevitable consequence of deliberately refusing eternal life through Jesus Christ. A man who believes that he is possessed of an immortal soul, and who by his own free will, for most unworthy considerations, refuses, with his eyes open, that salvation which has cost God so much, has proved himself the suicide of his own soul, and unworthy of everlasting life (Acts 13 : 46).

Then most touchingly the unhappy spirit thinks of his brethren: If Lazarus cannot come to me, send him to them. Abraham said, "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. And he said, Nay, father Abraham, but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent." And the answer, how solemn is it! "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." If this was true of them, what must be the condemnation of such as refuse the Son of God speaking from heaven? O reader! if you are unsaved, "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh" (Heb. 12 : 25)

INCIDENTS OF THE PRINCESS ALICE DISASTER.

THE accounts of the terrible calamity which occurred on the Thames, September 3d, have produced a thrill of horror in the breast of every reader. The sad fact that above 800 persons were on the Princess Alice boat when she was struck by the Bywell Castle, and that of that number above 600 perished, is appalling enough; but the narratives of the survivors, as elicited at the inquest and by reporters to the English press, give a realistic picture of individual suffering scarcely ever equalled in the case of any similar catastrophe. The following details may interest our readers:

Mr. H. Drew, manager of the packing department of Messrs. Leaf, silk merchants, Old Change, in the city of London, made the following statement: "I was seated about two or three seats abaft the paddle-box, when I saw a large screw-steamer bearing straight down upon us. When I first saw her she was about three hundred yards off. Our captain gave orders to stop our engines, and I believe they were stopped at the time we were struck; but the ship seemed to come down upon us without altering her course, and struck us on the side of the paddle-box, cutting us nearly in halves. In three or four minutes the vessel went down. My wife and three children were on board, but I don't know what became of them. I suppose they were drowned. (Here the poor fellow burst into tears.) I laid hold of a piece of wood, which I pushed before me, and it kept me up. I was afraid every moment some of the poor people would snatch it from me, for I was surrounded by hundreds—men, women, and children—struggling for life, and shrieking in their agony. It is a sight which I shall never forget if I live for a hundred years. I looked for my wife and children, but could see nothing of them, and I was very nearly done myself when two good fellows, who I found belonged to the barge Charity, caught hold of me, saying, 'All right, old fellow,' and dragged me into their boat."

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon writes in regard to the [illegible] "Mr George Linnecar, 65 Heaton Road, [illegible] a student of my college, escaped by climbing up the funnel of the Princess Alice and [illegible] the Bywell Castle. Having been for years accustomed to the sea, his opportunity of escape was [illegible] than that of the many who knew nothing of climbing and grasping ropes. Yet at the same time [illegible] Providence may rescue a person who is utterly helpless in the water, for one of my esteemed matrons of the Stockwell Orphanage, Miss Fairey, is also among the saved."

Another passenger was Mr. Charlton Harrison, a well-known Good Templar. He had formed the acquaintance of Miss Hanbury, a lovely American girl staying with her brother in London, and had been betrothed to her. Both of them were on board the Princess Alice on that mournful Tuesday, and both lost their lives. Mr. Harrison's brother Arthur, who was on a visit to London, persuaded him and Miss Hanbury to take a day's outing to Rosherville, and, noth ing loth, they had gone together. A pleasant day was spent, and by and by they returned on the Princess Alice. They were together when the fatal collision took place, and we can well imagine the sudden anxiety and grief which seized all as, in a moment, they found what had been a scene of pleasure suddenly transformed into one of unutterable horror. Death was staring every one in the face, and escape seemed impossible.

When the sinking vessel left them both struggling in the river he is said to have kissed her affectionately as the waves beat around them, and exclaimed, "Good-by, dearest, we shall meet in heaven." She supported him in the water for nearly half an hour, and he only sank as she was being lifted into a boat. Although rescued, she died from the general shock to her system ten days afterwards, on September 13th.

The Rev. A. S. Herring, the almoner of the Disaster fund, says that of the 400 families directly involved in the direful calamity there cannot be less than 80 families who have lost both parents, and probably leaving 170 to 200 completely orphans, mostly young. To this terrible catalogue must be added 80 left widows—all but four with families—ranging in their households from one to ten children, and 85 left widowers, only seven without families. The fatherless and motherless children will probably be nigh upon 300. There are, too, some 150 general cases, and the parents on both sides need something for garments of mourning, etc. What a mass of human woe and misery is involved in this one collision, and what a weight of anguish and self-reproach must rest upon the heart of the person or persons for the want of foresight, or perhaps neglect, that caused it!

EVANGELICAL WORK AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

THOSE of our readers who visited the Paris Exhibition may have noticed opposite the principal entrance the Salle Evangélique, and the kiosk where Bibles and tracts were distributed.

The efforts made in these buildings to spread the knowledge of the truth among the crowds attracted from all parts of the world by the Exhibition have been greatly blessed. The scenes witnessed at the doors day by day are full of interest. A visitor thus describes some of the applicants for the books and tracts:

DAILY SCENES AT THE PARIS BIBLE AND TRACT KIOSK.

Here come two olive-skinned young Mexicans. Perhaps we may never see them again until we stand together before the judgment-seat of Christ. How delighted they depart with a selection of tracts, and each with a New Testament!

The features of these two picturesquely-dressed men are unmistakably Indian. "We are Gauchos, sir. We show how to lasso wild horses, and nobble them with bolas, or two balls attached to a cord, which is thrown at full gallop, and entangles the animal's legs. Never heard of such a thing as the Bible. As you say it is the Word of God, we will take it home, preserve it, and carefully read it. I never heard before that Jesus died for me; that His blood was shed to put away sin. I shall be astonished to find One loves me so much as to have suffered on my behalf."

Look at this young negro in sailor's costume. His jetty face is not unpleasing, and how it beams with animation! "From Senegal," he replies. "I speak and read French, and talk a little Ingaleeze. I do not think I can call again, but if you give me a few more my messmates will gladly accept of them."

Another says, "Polish, sir. Oh, thank you! I little thought I should receive such a nice present in my own language on my first visit to the Exhibition."

Another, "I am from Venezuela. My object in coming to France is to be cured of a painful disease. I have read Padre Scio's version of the Bible. Ah! you have no idea what a comfort your tracts have been to me. I once stepped into the Salle Evangélique to see if the preaching corresponded with your teaching, and, understanding French, I have endeavored to attend a service every day since. Unworthy of mercy, I have found it through faith in Christ Jesus, my Lord and Saviour."

Another says, "I am a Hebrew, and go to the synagogue twice a year, when I confess my sins. I am liberal-minded, and esteem one religion pretty much the same as another. Well, you have your way of thinking and I mine. Yes, I will read this tract and Gospel according to St. John, but I don't think I shall ever be a Christian. What would be the use? Philosophy is my religion."

A schoolmaster comes up and asks if his pupils may each receive a present. "Will they be permitted to read what is given?" "Oh! yes. I have perused some myself, and think them most excellent." "Well, let them come." And a hundred lads eagerly stretch forth their hands, fearing to exhaust our stock; but commending them to patience and good order, all soon depart with happy hearts and faces. May the message of salvation be blessed to every one!

As successive trams and 'busses halt near the kiosk the stream of passers-by swells in volume, and occasionally our energies are fully taxed to meet demands, a thousand or more tracts being delivered as fast as we can give. A large proportion of applicants are French, country visitors being less easy in bearing and graceful in dress than Parisians. The former, too, are generally sunburnt, those engaged in agricultural pursuits wearing the stiffest of new blue blouses, or white starched caps and short skirts.

"For my poor dear mother," a young female worker asks, opening her satchel on the window-sill. "She is confined to her bed, and is alone most of the day. Yes, I have had several tracts before, but I have promised to obtain for her any new one you may have. Poor mamma! she has your tracts and the Evangels on the bed, and reads about Jesus, and shuts her eyes, and prays, and thinks; then takes her medicine and goes to sleep, and she says she is very happy. Yes, I am thankful I can earn enough to support us, and when I come home at night I tell her of things in the Exhibition, then read awhile, thank God, and go to rest. How kind of you! If you will let me have a dozen, I will give them to young ladies in the Exhibition, who often ask me to bring them something, but I have not liked to trespass on your generosity." She looked so pleased, and as I watched her run tip-toe across the road, I prayed to God to bless her and her dear mother.

Artillery, cavalry, and infantry soldiers, together with civil, military, and naval officers of all ranks and varied uniforms; police, cab, car, coach, van, and draymen apply; friars of orders white and brown, priests, sisters of charity; ladies and gentlemen on foot, in vehicles, and on horseback accept, and none of the ever-moving, changing, living throng of immortal souls need go away unsupplied.

A Spanish priest, the principal of a college of high standing in one of the chief cities in Spain, after conversing with friends of the kiosk, has become convinced of the truth of the Gospel, but hesitates to give up his position and incur the enmity of his relations.

THE ROUGH DIAMOND.

A Temperance Story of Lancashire Life.

BY MRS. RIGG, WIFE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE ENGLISH WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

THE village of Oakham, situated about three miles distant from Manchester, boasted two mills, one large, the other somewhat smaller in its dimensions, and belonging respectively to two wealthy families; the name of the owner of the large mill was Marsden; that of the smaller, Leigh.

The population of the village of Oakham was essentially a mill population, and the houses, or rather cottages, were such as befitted the workers in the mills, having nothing pretty or inviting in their appearance. Besides these, and a few shops—chiefly provision shops—the two manisions belonging to the proprietors of the mills, the house occupied by the parish doctor, the vicarage, the curate's small dwelling, and the unostentatious house of red brick occupied by the Wesleyan minister, with three or four other houses of similar size, were all the buildings besides the church and chapel, at the time of which we write, that the village of Oakham could boast.

One of these houses of red brick, with green shutters, some distance from the Wesleyan minister's—for they were not placed together in a row, but were scattered here and there about the village, as though Oakham thought it desirable that people of the same rank in life should not have too much companionship—was tenanted by a very respectable family (though their means were very limited) of the name of Cookson. They were from the South of England, and the husband was merely a clerk in an office in Manchester, his entire income not amounting to more than seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum.

Mr. Cookson was a very prepossessing and, indeed, a very handsome man, the son of a clergyman, and one of six brothers, all of them handsome; but the father had no means, so one by one, as is the case with too many in similar circumstances, they were sent into offices, when James Cookson soon obtained an income of five hundred dollars a year, then seven hundred and fifty—as we have before stated—but never got beyond.

In early life he became attached to a young and beautiful girl, one of nature's gentlewomen, lovely and delicate in mind and in form. He had no difficulty in pursuading her to be true to him; and so, contrary to the advice of friends, this somewhat imprudent marriage—for the lady had no property worth naming—was contracted. Only one child was the fruit of this union, and at the time at which our story begins he was fourteen years of age, had always been delicate, and was now far advanced in consumption.

Mrs. Cookson did not like Lancashire nor Lancashire ways. Four years ago she had removed with her husband and child from a pretty sea side place not far from London, to this land of smoke and chimneys—removed with the hope of bettering their condition; but the result had not proved satisfactory; their income was scarcely increased at all. Manchester air did not agree with her, and necessitated a removal to Oakham. Here her refinement was continually shocked by the manners of the clogged and hooded denizen of the mills. At certain hours of the day, when, to use their own expression, "the mill was loosed," they turned out by hundreds into the streets hurrying to their homes. Their direct gaze discomforted her, their rudeness terrified her, and she experienced at all times a vague feeling of alarm and distrust of the character of the Lancashire weavers. No doubt this was partially owing to a lack of acquaintance with them, for she made no friends and seldom ventured beyond the streets where the shops were situated. Who was there amongst them, she asked herself, suitable for her to associate with? So she shut herself up in her solitary little dwelling, there to sigh after the sunny skies and the softer manners of her beloved spot—the South of England.

Had her heart been filled with the love of Jesus she would have found an interest in every face she saw, as one redeemed by the blood of Christ and one whom she might win to the knowledge of salvation. The ugly, uniform streets of plain, dirty-looking houses would have been forgotten in the thought of the eternal destinies of those who lived in them; and the very denseness of the population would have made her heart thrill with joy that there were so many around her whom she might bear on her heart in prayer.

When she had been a few weeks resident at Oakham, she hurried one day into one of the little general shops of the village, where bread, butter, groceries, oaten cake, and the Lancashire bannock were temptingly displayed in the window. The owner of the shop was a Mrs. Carson, a tall, gaunt woman, who wore a rough blue linsey-woolsey gown, a large, white, coarse apron, and a clean starched calico cap without trimmings. Mrs. Carson's husband and her two sons were weavers in Marsden's Mill at Oakham. Mrs. Cookson purchased several parcels, together with a large piece of bacon and a few eggs; she paid for them, and was about to direct Mrs. Carson where to send them to, when the latter surprised her with the query, "Yo' gotten a basket to put 'em in?"

"No," said Mrs. Cookson, with some dignity; "I must trouble you to send them; I think I could not carry them myself."

"Where to?" demanded Mrs. Carson, bluntly.

"To Elm Cottage; it is not very far down the road."

"Oh! You be the strangers as has just come to live in the village. Well, yes, I'll send 'em when my lads have done their work."

"If it is inconvenient for you to send them, my servant shall call for them."

"Well," said Mrs. Carson deliberately, and fixing a searching gaze on Mrs. Cookson, "folks as keep a servant do mostly send for their things, or carry them themselves; my lads are always busy, and measter's seldom at home; but I'll send these by and by, never fear." This was intended to be encouraging and pleasant, but poor Mrs. Cookson, in her ignorance of the country and the ways of the people, went away with an almost utter detestation of Oakham generally and of Mrs. Carson in particular. Time and circumstances, however, were destined to show her the value of this rough Lancashire woman.

"Strangers," reflected Mrs. Cookson, bitterly remembering Mrs. Carson's words; "yes, and you hate the sight of strangers." It must be admitted that years ago there was too much truth in this accusation of Mrs. Cookson's, as far at least as the working classes were concerned.

Mrs. Cookson's dislike of this worthy shopkeeper did not diminish with the lapse of time. But reports reached her through the medium of her servant, a faithful young Irish lass, who had lived with her many years and had followed them into Lancashire, which to some extent explained the brusque independence which had annoyed Mrs. Cookson. It appears that the Carsons were well off in the world—being worth some hundreds of pounds—although Mrs. Carson worked and looked, as Maggie, the Irish girl, remarked, "as if she were not worth a five-pound note in the world, except on Sundays, when she comes out quite grand in her black-silk dress, that is so good and stiff that it would almost stand alone, and her black satin coal-scuttle bonnet; but then it is always black, and no doubt she has had them many years, for she scorns the fashions, and things like them would not wear out easily."

"Oh! I think I must have seen her," said Mrs. Cookson to Maggie. "She attends the chapel, does she not? I saw some one as I was coming out, dressed as you describe, and thought I ought to know the face, for she looked hard at me, but I could not remember who it was."

"Yes, ma'am, that was her! She has such peeping, gray eyes, and seems to look you through and through."

"She is a very good woman, I believe, although she is so peculiar."

"Oh, yes! I saw her staying to the sacrament, and she has got some sort of a class on a Sunday afternoon."

"How strong she must be, for she is not a young woman! One would think she needed a little rest on a Sunday."

"Strong, I should think she is: but these Lancashire people, some of them, do seem to be made of iron."

So the years passed somewhat drearily with Mrs. Cookson; she sought no society, and none she had. Had she and her husband been members of a Christian church, that must have brought them into contact with a few worthy people at least, however humble; but though often solicited by the minister and his wife, whose place of worship they attended, to cast in their lot with them, they yet chose to keep outside the pale of the church, for we grieve to say they were not of that happy number who have "chosen the good part," and made sure of "the one thing needful."

The Cooksons were, however, well known and respected in the village. They were quiet, educated, moral people, and though their means were so limited they were unquestionably gentlefolks. Mrs. Cookson was a great reader and an accomplished woman, quite capable of educating and forming the tastes of her son up to a certain age, and between mother and son there existed the purest sympathy, the most untiring affection. But the boy, Allan, was smitten with an insidious and almost hopeless disease, and the poor mother beheld, with a sinking heart, this cherished idol of her soul about to be snatched from her.

Trials seldom come singly, and now while death threatened them on the one hand poverty came on them on the other. Their little savings—the savings of many years—were scattered to the winds by a bad investment, and Mr. and Mrs. Cookson had nothing left to them but their little furniture and their love for each other. This was a great blow, for their little hoard had been got together so slowly, it was the fruit of so many economies and of so much self-denial, that the loss of this little provision for the future seemed doubly hard.

The worst, however, was not over as far as Mrs. Cookson was concerned, for her husband grew sour and morose, took to hard drinking in a vain effort to forget his sorrows, and not unfrequently murmured against Providence.

As was to be expected, difficulties came upon them; sickness brings with it many cares and expenses. This might have been met by ordinary care despite the money loss; but the cost of the brandy that Mr. Cookson was consuming, both at home and in the office at Manchester, was a sad drain on their small income; so that one dreadful morning Mrs. Cookson found herself without money to carry on with, and the poor child needing delicacies which she was wholly unable to procure for him.

"What will Master Allan have for dinner today, ma'am?" asked Maggie. "He won't be able to touch the cold meat."

"No," said Mrs. Cookson; "and whatever I get him it seems to be all the same. He eats nothing, yet I should like to tempt him with something; but, oh! Maggie, things are going against us sadly. We have lost so much money, and—and—" here Mrs. Cookson quite broke down, and sobbed violently.

"Don't, don't, missis," cried Maggie, going close up to her mistress, and touching her hand kindly; then, as though a new light broke in upon her, she asked, "Is it that you are short of money?"

"Oh, yes; and worse. My poor heart will break. When all is over—when what we dread has come to pass, and my poor boy is gone, you will have to leave me, Maggie, for, as things are, I could never pay you your wages."

"Then I will stay with you for nothing," said the girl, vehemently; "but I see what you mean, it is the brandy that master has taken to drink."

"Hush, hush! Maggie, not a word. It is trouble that has done it. He takes it to drown care; a sad, a fatal mistake."

But before Maggie could answer there came a rap at the door, and the girl, drawing aside the curtain, said, with that sudden change of manner from grave to gay, so peculiar to the Irish, "Oh! I do believe it is Mrs. Carson. I just caught sight of her bonnet. What can she want?"

"Run," said her mistress, "and open the door."

It was Mrs. Carson: on her arm she carried a small basket; she wore the famous black bonnet and linsey gown. She asked kindly after Mrs. Cookson.

"Please to walk in," said Maggie, all smiles and sunshine.

Mrs. Carson cast a quick glance round the little drawing-room, and noticed the many little tokens of refinement and good taste, of which her own house was quite innocent. The result was a little embarrassing to her; she felt that she was in the presence of an educated person and a lady, and seemed to fear whether her freedom in calling might not be taken amiss. Mrs. Cookson's tear-stained face, however, recalled her to herself, and the object of her visit.

"How is young measter? Very ill, I fear. I have brought him a few new-laid eggs, and a pot of preserve; perhaps he might like one with his tea sometimes. I would have brought some before, but they are scarce, and the fowls have but just begun to lay."

"You are very kind, Mrs. Carson, and I am extremely obliged to you. My son is gradually sinking—getting worse day by day."

"So they tell me; and yo'—yo' look but sadly. It is grief, I fear. Can I do nought to help yo'?"

"No, thank you, Mrs. Carson; mine is a sorrow of the heart."

"Well, yo' know where to look for comfort, I hope?—

'In every sorrow of the heart
Eternal mercy bears a part.'

He is waiting to comfort you. The gre't, loving heart of God feels for yo' in yer sorrow."

Mrs. Cookson looked at her visitor in unfeigned astonishment. She could not understand her. God waiting to comfort her; sympathizing with her in her sorrows, and yet taking her boy; permitting the money loss and the poverty, and worse than poverty, that seemed to be coming upon her; no. He was no God of comfort to her.

"I know nothing of the comfort you speak of, or the love. I only feel that my boy is dying, and that I have other heavy troubles besides. Some people see sunshine through every thing; I see nothing but clouds."

An uneasy movement and a suppressed sigh showed how much this rough Lancashire woman sympathized with this lady in her trouble, and how difficult she found it to say words which would really comfort her.

"I can but advise you to pray and believe that there is mercy in this; the comfort will come. Behind a frowning Providence God hides a smiling face. Perhaps He wants to draw you nearer to Himself. How is the dear laddie? Will yo' let me see him? or would he rather not see an old rough body like me?"

"Oh, no! You shall see him. Come this way. Allan, my dear, here is Mrs. Carson come to see you. I think you know Mrs. Carson."

STRANGE SCENES AMONG THE HINDOOS.

BY REV. DR. FIELD.

THERE are holy shrines in different countries, which are held sacred by the devotees of different religions ; but there are four chief holy cities —Rome, Jerusalem, Mecca, and Benares. As the devout Catholic makes a pilgrimage to Rome, to receive the blessing of the Holy Father ; as the Jew traverses land and sea, that his feet may stand within the gates of Jerusalem, where he weeps at the place of wailing under the walls of the ancient temple ; as the caravan of the Arab still crosses the desert to Mecca ; so does the devout Hindoo come to Benares, and count it his supreme joy if he can but see its domes and towers, and eternal felicity to die on the banks of the sacred river.

In our recent visit to India we found the appearance of Benares very striking. For two miles it presents a succession of palaces and temples, which are built not only on, but almost in, the river Ganges, as Venice is built in the sea ; the huge structures crowding each other on the bank, and flights of steps going down into the water, as if they would receive the baptism of the sacred river as it flowed gently by. It is peculiarly an Indian city, with every feature of Asiatic and of Indian life strongly marked. Its bazaars are as curious and as rich as any in Asia, with shawls of Cashmere, and silks wrought by fine needle-work into every article of costly array. It has also cunning workmen in precious metals and precious stones—in gold and silver and diamonds. One special industry is workmanship in brass.

While rambling about the city, we had an opportunity to see something of the

of the Hindoos, as we met in the streets a number of wedding processions. The heavenly influences were favorable to such unions. The Hindoos are great astrologers, and give high [illegible] to the conjunction of the stars, and do not marry except when Jupiter is in the ascendant. Just now he rides high in the heavens, and this is the favored time of love. The processions were very curious. The bridegroom was mounted on horseback, tricked out in the dress of a harlequin, with a crowd on horses and on foot, going before and following after, waving flags, beating drums, and making all manner of noises, to testify their joy ; while the bride, who was commonly a mere child, was borne in a palanquin, covered with ribbons and trinkets and jewelry, looking, as she sat upright in her doll's house, much more as if she were a piece of frosted cake being carried to the wedding, than a living piece of flesh and blood that had any part therein.

Altogether the scene was more like a Punch-and-Judy show than any part of the serious business of life. Engagements are often made when the parties are in childhood, or even in infancy, and the marriage consummated at twelve. These child-marriages are a great curse to the country, as they fill the land with their puny offspring, that wither like weeds in the hot sun of India. It is a pity that they could not be prohibited ; that marriages could not be forbidden until the parties had reached at least sixteen years of age.

The people were very polite in hastening to make way for us wherever we came. But we found that it was to avoid pollution ; that if they but touched the hem of our garments, they would have had to run to the Ganges to wash away the stain !

It is always interesting to study a country or a religion in its capital. As we go to Rome to see Romanism, we come to Benares to see Hindooism, or Buddhism, which rules a larger part of mankind than any other religion. Benares is full of temples and shrines. Of course we can only visit a few of the more sacred. The first that we entered was like a menagerie. It was called and rightly so, for the place was full of the little creatures—it fairly swarmed with them ; they were overhead and all around us, chattering as if they were holding a council in the heart of a tropical forest. The place was for all the world like the monkey-house in the Zoological Gardens in London, or in the Central Park in New York, and would be an amusing resort for children were it not regarded as a holy place—one for religious worship. But a glance shows the stranger that the monkeys are here, not to worship, but to be worshipped. According to the Pantheism of the Hindoos, all things are a part of God. Not only is He the Author of life, but He lives in His creatures, so that they partake of His divinity ; and therefore whatsoever thing liveth and moveth on the earth—beast, or bird, or reptile—is a proper object of worship.

But the monkeys were respectable compared with the hideous idol which is enthroned in this place. In the court of the Temple is a shrine, a Holy of Holies, where, as the gilded doors are swung open, one sees a black divinity, with thick, sensual lips, that are red with blood, and eyes that glare fiendishly. This is the goddess Doorgha, whose sacred presence is guarded by Brahmin priests, so that no profane foot may come near her. While they kept us back with holy horror from approaching, they had no scruples about reaching out their hands to receive our money. It is the habit of strangers to drop some small coin in the outstretched palms, but I was too much disgusted to give to the beggars. They were importunate, and said the Prince of Wales, who was there recently, had given them a hundred rupees.

In another part of the city is devoted to the god Shiva, which divides with that of the monkeys the homage of the Hindoos. Here are no chattering apes, though the place is profaned with the presence of beasts and birds. Some dozen cows were standing or lying down in the court, making it seem more like a stable or a barn-yard than a holy place. Yet here was a fakir rapt in the ecstasies of devotion, with one arm uplifted, rigid as a pillar of iron. He was looked upon with awe by the faithful who crowded around him, and who rewarded his sanctity by giving him money ; but to our profane eyes he was a figure (though disguised under the pretence of spirituality) as palpable to the sight as the peacock who spread his tail and strutted about in the filthy inclosure.

The great sight of Benares is the bathing in the Ganges. This takes place in the morning. We rose early the next day, and drove down to the river, and, getting a boat, were rowed slowly for hours up and down the stream. It is lined with temples and palaces, which descend to the water by flights of steps, or ghauts, which at this hour are thronged with devout Hindoos. By hundreds and thousands they come down to the river's brink, men, women, and children, and wade in, not swimming, but standing in the water, plunging their heads and mumbling their prayers, and performing their libations, by taking the water in their hands and casting it towards the points of the compass, as an act of worship to the celestial powers, especially to the sun.

As the boatmen rested on their oars that we might observe the strange scene, we started with horror to see a corpse in the water. It was already half decayed, and obscene birds were fluttering over it. But this is too common a sight in Benares to raise any emotion in the breast of the Hindoo, whose prayer is that he may die on the banks of the Ganges. As the body drifts down with the stream, or becomes food for the fowls of the air, he imagines that the soul floats to its final rest in the Deity, as surely as the Ganges rolls onward to the sea.

But, look ! here is another scene. We are approaching the Burning Ghaut, and I see piles of wood, and human bodies, and smoke and flame. I bade the boatmen draw to the shore, that we might have a clearer view of this strange sight. Walking along the bank, we came close to the Several were ready, waiting to be lighted. It is the custom of the Hindoos that the nearest male relative applies the torch. Here was a body just dressed for the last rites. It was wrapped in coarse garments, perhaps all that affection could give. Beside it stood a woman, watching it with eager eyes, lest any rude hand should touch the form which, though dead, was still beloved. I looked with pity into her sad, sorrowful face What a tale of affection was there !—of love fo the life that was ended, and the form that wa cherished, that was soon to be but ashes, and t float away upon the bosom of the sacred river.

FUNERAL PILES.

What the river Nile, which the ancient Egyptians worshipped, is to Egypt, the Ganges is t a part of India, giving life and verdure t plains that but for it were a desert. As it burst through the gates of the Himalayas, and sweep along with resistless current, cooling with its ic breath the hot plains of India, and giving fertility to the rice-fields of Bengal, it may well see to the Hindoo the greatest visible emblem Almighty power and Infinite beneficence.

In the Hindoo creed the Ganges has all th virtue and the divine power that belongs in th Christian system to the blood of Christ. makes atonement for sins that are past. " H that but looks on the Ganges," says the Hindo proverb, " or that drinks of it, washes away th stains of a hundred births ; but he that bathe in it washes away the stains of a thousan births."

The spectacle of such superstition produced strong revulsion of feeling, and made me tu away from these waters, that cannot cleanse th guilty soul nor save the dying, to the Migh Sufferer, whose blood was shed for the sins the world and cleanses from all sin, and I seemed to hear voices in far-off Christian lands sing :

" E'er since by faith I saw the stream
Thy flowing wounds supply,
Redeeming blood has been my theme,
And shall be till I die."

As we passed along the banks of the Gange I thought what tales that stream could te Could we but listen in the dead of night, wh sounds we might hear ! Hush ! hark ! The is a footstep on the shore. The rushes on t bank are parted, and a Hindoo mother comes the water's edge. Look ! she holds a child her arms. She starts back, and with a shri casts it to the river monsters. Such scenes a not frequent now, because the Government h repressed them by law, though infanticide fearfully common in other ways. But even secretly—" darkly, at dead of night"—does f aticism sometimes pay its offering to the ri which is worshipped as a god.

This is what Hindooism does for the mot and for her child. Thus it wrongs at once ch hood and motherhood and womanhood. W that thinks of such scenes can but pray tha better faith may be given to the women of dia, that the mother may no longer look w anguish into the face of her own child, as doomed to destruction, but, like any Christ mother, clasp her baby to her breast, thank God who has given it to her, and bidden keep it, and train it up for life, for virtue, for happiness ?

At Benares we observed, in sailing up down the Ganges, that the river had undermi a number of temples built upon its banks, that they had fallen with their huge colu and massive architecture, and were lying in ken and shapeless masses, half covered by water. What a spectacle of ruin and deca the Holy City of the Hindoos ! This is a f lustration of the process which has been g on for the last half century in regard to I dooism. The waters of education and Gos preaching and civilization are washing it a and by and by the whole colossal fabric, b up in ages of ignorance and superstition, come crashing to the earth. Hindooism fall, and great will be the fall of it.

John Bartholomew Gough was born at Sandgate, near Folkestone, in the county of Kent, on August 22d, 1817. His father had been a soldier, and fought in the Peninsular War, obtaining a medal with six clasps, with which he retired from active service, on a pension of twenty pounds per annum. The old pensioner was evidently pleased to avail himself of every opportunity to tell the graphic stories of his battles and glorious victories, to which his young son listened with deepest interest; but beyond the fascination of his military history there was not much in the stern old soldier to draw forth the lad's affections. But he writes of his mother—"Her heart was a fountain whence the true waters of affection never ceased to flow. Her very being seemed entwined with mine, and ardently did I return her love. For the long space of twenty years she had occupied the humble position of schoolmistress in the village."

John was early sent to school at Folkestone, and made good progress, so that he was able to help in the instruction of younger lads before he left school, which happened soon after he reached the age of ten years. About this time an accident nearly put an end to his life. As he was [illegible] excavated [illegible] roadside, when running home from school one day, the man who was working threw up a spadeful of the earth, and unfortunately struck the lad on the head with the sharp edge of the spade. He fell insensible, and for many days his life was despaired of; and though after long and anxious waiting his parents had the joy of seeing the greater danger pass away, the dreadful fear that his reason was permanently impaired still remained. However, this fear also was removed; but the effects of that terrible blow remain to the present day, and are specially felt during the excitement of public speaking.

The venerable and devoted William Wilberforce resided, during a few of the summer months, at Sandgate, for the benefit of his health. Young Gough had heard much of the great philanthropist, and was not a little delighted when his father took him to the only gentleman's lodgings, where a prayer-meeting was held. How it was the lad could not tell, but he attracted Mr. Wilberforce's attention, who patted him on the head, said many kind things, and expressed wishes for his welfare. He also presented him with a book, and wrote with his own hand his name on the fly-leaf. Young Gough, for his age, was considered to be a very good reader, and Mr. Wilberforce requested him to read to him. He did so, and called forth an expression of pleasure from the venerable listener. The lad never forgot the old man's kindly words.

Gough's mother's circumstances were very much straitened at times, although, in addition to school-keeping, she worked industriously at making a kind of lace, then very fashionable, and in the manufacture of which she excelled. On one occasion, when their necessities absolutely required extra exertion, she took her basket of work and travelled eight miles and a half to the town of Dover. Arriving there, footsore and heart-weary, she threaded the streets and lanes with her lace, seeking vainly for customers; and after reluctantly abandoning the pursuit, she turned her face supperless towards home. During her absence, a gentleman had sent for John to the library, and was so pleased with his reading that he made him a present of five shillings ($1.25), and Mr. Purday, the librarian, in addition, gave him sixpence. Soon afterwards, on entering the house, he found his mother sitting in her chair, bathed in tears. On asking her what was the matter she drew him close to her, and, with a mournful expression, told him that all her weary journey had been fruitless—she had sold nothing. With joy he drew the crown piece and the sixpence from his pocket, and placed them in her hand; and then with feelings of delight they knelt down, whilst she poured out her heart in thankfulness to God for the relief so seasonably provided.

It is remarkable that the first money we hear of the young orator possessing should have come into his hands as the result of the exercise of his elocutionary powers.

When young Gough was twelve years of age, his father, finding himself unable to furnish the premium necessary to provide a trade, agreed with a Sandgate family, who were about emigrating to America, to take his son for a consideration of ten guineas, which he paid them, and teach him a trade, and provide for him until he was of age. After a long and painful struggle, his mother yielded to the arrangement. John was in high glee at the prospect before him, and on the 4th of June, 1829, he left his native village. The parting from his mother was most affecting; he says: "My poor mother folded me to her bosom; then she would hold me off at arm's length, and gaze fondly on my face, through her tearful eyes, reading—as only a mother could—the book of futurity for me."

During his brief stay in London he was gratified and excited by many of the great attractions of the city. On the 10th June the little company in which John had found this new life left the Thames in the ship Helen, and on the 3d of August, fifty-four days after sailing (a voyage which now only takes nine days), the ship stood off Sandy Hook. The party stayed two months in New York City, when they started for the farm in Oneida county—their goal. John remained here two years; but it was a dull, unprofitable kind of life to him. During that time he was never sent either to day or Sunday school, and his thirst for knowledge grew intense in the barren waste to which he seemed banished. All his letters home had been read by his master before they were posted; John now determined, however, to communicate with his father without interference, and to ask permission to go to New York and learn a trade. To do this he sold his jack-knife to find money for the postage. As soon as reply was possible he obtained the permission that he sought; and on December 12th, 1831, he quitted Oneida county for New York City.

He reached New York with but fifty cents in his pocket; and with but a few things, his all in the world, in a little trunk which he carried. He obtained employment at the Methodist Book Concern as errand-boy, and to learn the book-binding business, for which he was to receive two dollars and a quarter per week. He obtained lodgings, with board, at a cheap boarding-house, at two dollars per week. Thus the lonely lad, at the age of fourteen, entered upon his life in New York City.

A deep sense of his loneliness often oppressed him. Thus he writes: "As I was working, I fell into a train of thought respecting my desolate situation; and, as I mused, the scalding tears fell in large drops on the paper I was using. Into the very depths of my sorrow a kind heart looked; for, whilst I was weeping, a young lady came to me, and asked me what was the matter? Her tone of kindness and look of sympathy won my confidence, and I informed her of the particulars of my little history. When I had finished my tale she said, 'Poor distressed child! you shall go home with me to-night.' I did so; and, when I arrived at her house, I saw her mother, who was engaged in frying cakes on the stove. The young girl took her mother aside into an inner room, and presently the latter came out and said to me, 'Poor boy, I will be a mother to you.' These words fell like refreshing dew on my young heart; and mother and sister, indeed, did the benevolent Mrs. Egbert and her daughter prove to me."

Soon after this he joined the church in Allen Street, and after a time sent home for his father, mother, and sister, and in August, 1833, his mother and sister joined him, but his father, fearing to lose his pension, did not accompany them. John's income at this time was three dollars per week, not a luxurious sum on which to support the trio, but love made amends for all their wants.

They lived comfortably together until November following, when, owing to a want of business, John lost his situation. This was a severe blow, and it was followed by another misfortune, for his sister, who had obtained employment as a straw-bonnet maker, lost her situation soon after. Finding it necessary to retrench in expenditure, they gave up their two rooms, and occupied only one, dividing it into compartments at night by hanging up a temporary curtain. The rent was now reduced to fifty cents a week, and all their goods and chattels were contained in the garret whch they continued to occupy untll his mother's death.

On the 8th of July, 1834, Mrs. Gough who had for some time been in a condition of great bodily weakness, was seized with apoplexy while cooking a meal, and suddenly expired. When John came home a 8 P.M. his sister met him at the door and exclaimed, "John, mother's dead!"

Her funeral was very humble; but th only two mourners, her son and daughter shed tears of more genuine sorrow tha frequently fall when

"Some proud child of earth returns to dust."

THEN said Mrs. Boland, "Mr. Moran replied to me, 'Your sons nobly risked their lives to save Farmer O'Shaugnessy and his family from the burning house; but Christ Jesus actually gave up His. He drank the bitter cup of death, and shed His blood for the remission of sins; endured the Cross, despising the shame; died, the just for the unjust, to bring us to God.'

"'But,' I inquired, 'how am I to get to God by Jesus Christ? What am I to do? Surely something is necessary on our part. I have my own notions, Mr. Moran, on the matter, notions received in our own Church, which is the thrue one.'

"'I am aware, Mrs. Boland,' he replied, 'that you have your ideas upon these things, and they differ a good deal from mine. But I will simply state to you what God's own true book says. These are its words: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved" (Acts 16 : 31). "To him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness" (Rom. 4 : 5); "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life"' (John 3 : 16).

At this stage of Mrs. Boland's account of the conversation, a friend dropped in on a visit to Mrs. Dogherty; indeed she was known to Mrs. Boland also. She was a widow, clad in her mourning weeds, and though she bowed her head, and thus contrived to partly conceal her face, it was not difficult to discover that her eyes were inflamed with weeping.

"What," said Mrs. Dogherty, "cannot you forgive the great Lord yet for taking your husband to Himself? I am ashamed of you, Mrs. Moriarty—you ought to have more sense. Shure and we're all in the Lord's hands, and should take kindly what He's plazed to send us."

Mrs. Dogherty was another example of how much easier it is to give rebuke against murmuring at bereavement than to take it. She proved but as one of Job's comforters, who "broke him in pieces" with their words. At her admonition the poor woman, lately widowed, broke out into a loud burst of weeping. After some time, commanding her voice so as to be able to speak, she said:

"My tears now are not so much caused by the loss of my husband, as from my utter want of power to do any thing to help him."

"Why, then, what in the world do you mane?" ejaculated Mrs. Dogherty: "why the Lord has taken him to Himself, and what can you now have to do with him?"

"Would to God," sobbed out Mrs. Moriarty, "that I could believe what you say! but you well know, Mrs. Dogherty, that our Church holds and teaches that there is a Purgatory—a 'little hell,' as some of our books call it—a place of fire, where souls are in trial for a season to fit them for the presence of the Lord; and Father Burke himself told me this very morning that for ages untold they may be there, before the purifying process is complete; for that to his knowledge 'indulgences' for reducing the time by a hundred thousand years have been often granted by our Holy Father the Pope to those who could and were willing to pay for them.

"Oh dear, only think of it! this hour my husband, my dear Peter Moriarty, may be in pain such as has no likeness in this world—may be writhing in torture, which is to continue it may be for centuries, and I can't hinder it! My blood runs cold at the thought of it, and I am ready to weep out my very eyes with sorrow!"

"But, Mrs. Moriarty, ma'am," broke in Mrs. Boland, "cannot you get masses said for his repose? that would shorten his pain and imprisonment, you know; for the mass, you understand, is an oblation both 'for the living and the dead.'"

"So Father Burke reminded me this morning," answered the widow; "and, moreover, told me the fees that were to be paid—but here lies the very ground of my trouble. My poor husband, as you are aware, wasn't a prosperous man, and died in debt, and I haven't the money that our good priest says it is the custom to pay, and which indeed he requires. I asked him wouldn't my own prayers and penances do something for Peter—that I would be willing to spend my life in mortification and fasting if it would get him release.

"His reply was that it might indeed be of some little avail; but that as he was a man in holy orders, holding 'the keys,' able to bind and loose—having, by 'vartue' of his office, special divine and sacramental powers—one mass said by him would effect more in my husband's behalf than ten thousand prayers and penances by any one merely belonging to the laity.

"Upon this, I went down upon my knees before him, and clasping my hands, while the tears streamed down my cheeks, I besought him in the name of the Virgin and all the saints—as a friend of our own in the Church, who had long known my husband, and had often and often eaten and drank the best in our house—to say a few private masses, to ease my mind and to relieve the soul of my beloved Peter, for that I couldn't bear the thought of his enduring countless years of agony that might be prevented. He seemed a good deal surprised at my intensity of feeling, and was plainly touched at my sorrow.

"He gave me a momentary look of pity, but then said, 'Mrs. Moriarty, you make a strange request—I never heard the like. Ma'am, it is quite unreasonable: those who serve at the altar should live by the altar. There are regular fees laid down by the Church for these things. I feel for you, ma'am, but we must keep to rules, for no one can tell where it may stop if once they are broken. But, Mrs. Moriarty, your husband, you know, will have the benefit of the regular and ordinary services of the Church, for in every mass said, the world over, the faithful, both living and dead, have an interest.'

"'Yes, Father Burke,' I replied, 'I am fully sinsible of that—it has been taught me from childhood; but is it not the case that special masses have special power, and help to shorten the sojourn of a soul in Limbo, else why are they said? Why, when Bishop Nagle died, High Mass was said for the repose of his soul, at which dozens of priests assisted; and the same was done for the soul of Lord M——, who died a good Catholic, and by the same token you then took part in the Office for the dead yourself, for I was in the chapel and saw you there.

"'I know well that a poor body like me can't have High Masses said for Peter, and I don't ask it. It's a privilege which God and the Virgin, I suppose, from its high cost, must have only intended for the very good and the very rich; but couldn't you, as my husband's priest for years, say, as I have besought you, a few private masses for him? I'd pay if I had the money; but God knows me and my husband's poor childer are in a sore case, for if all we have was sold off it wouldn't leave a five-pound note behind after paying what's owing.

"'Why,' I added—for I felt that indignant I couldn't keep it in, though he was a priest—'if I had the power which you say you have, and could by any thing that I could do save a human soul, and especially the soul of a friend, from one hour's fiery pain, not to spake of scores of years, I feel sartin in myself I'd never bate an effort, paid or onpaid, to accomplish it. Think of it, sir. My husband's soul is in torturing fire.'"

At this last assertion of Mrs. Moriarty—as if the words suggested to her mind the occurrences of the past night at the fire, and forgetting at the moment the slur which her remark would cast upon the priests of her Church, who so stand upon their declared rights—Mrs. Dogherty cried out, "That's what your good man and his brave sons, Mrs. Boland, did at the burnin', as you told us. They rushed to the rescue, and never rested effort until they were safe from the flames. They weren't content with ordinary endeavors, but put forth their highest efforts to keep from pain their fellow-creatures."

"Ah! but, friends," replied Mrs. Boland, "they couldn't help it; the farmer's case was visible, and all before their eyes, and they forgot themselves at the sight. Your husband's case, however, Mrs. Moriarty, is different. Father Burke doesn't see your husband's soul in purgatory, and therefore can't so feel for him. You know they say 'seein' is believin',' and, I should think is feelin' too;" that it was

"Aye, but when he thought I had come to engage his priestly offices for payment," responded Mrs. Moriarty—"that is when I first cum into his house—he so described to me the pains of souls in purgatorial flames, that you'd think he was actually looking on at them. Oh dear, dear! can he have believed all he said? If he does, it passes all understanding how he can rest one hour from doing his highest endeavor to relieve and release them;" and at these words poor Mrs. Moriarty again burst passionately into tears.

Looking at her in sympathy, both the friends present kept for a time silent; but after a while Mrs. Boland, as though thinking aloud, said, "Ah! but isn't it a fine thing to be rich—fine for this world and fine for the next! With plenty of money in your purse, there's nothing to hinder you from having the best to eat and drink in this life, and then, when you die, from having but a short lodgin' of it in the 'little hell' called Purgatory, in the next. Aye, both the world and the Church will be your humble servant if you only have the money.

"But then," added Mrs. Boland, after a little reflection, "that, too, seems 'quare,' for Mr. Moran told me this morning that God's own book said, 'Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation;' that it was 'easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God;' but that 'blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven;' that all the blessings of Christ's Gospel were offered to us 'without money and without price;' that the last promise in the Book said (Rev. 22 : 17) 'The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.'

"Can it be," she continued, "that what Mr. Moran said, too, about this Purgatory, is true, that there is no such place, but that with the faithful to be 'absent from the body' is to be 'present with the Lord'—that it is only an invention of our priests to get money from us? It looks like it, though; for while living we have to pay for absolutions, christenings, churchings, and marryings; and when dead for burials and masses; the rule is—'no pay, no priestly work.' Even when the body is in the grave, and the soul in Limbo, they put their hands into our pockets, which last they couldn't do if there was no Purgatory.

"Thank God," she added, "it 'is not said 'that the man whose priest shall call upon the Lord for him shall be saved,' but that he may do all the calling his own self, and find it effectual. God give me grace to receive His offer! In His holy name I think I'll thry it." With these words she left her seat, and bidding her friends, Mrs. Dogherty and Mrs. Moriarty, good-day, departed to fulfil her intended business in the town.

We have since found out that her declared purpose to call upon God for herself was not a mere temporary impulse. She did call upon Him, casting her soul by faith into the strong and loving and saving arms of her crucified Saviour. As every one experiences who acts thus, she found salvation, peace, and pardon—obtained deliverance for her soul's life, just as Leonard O'Shaugnessy, the lad, did for his bodily life: who, simply dropping from the window of the burning house into his father's embrace, became "saved; yet so as by fire."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Thanksgiving Day marks the nation's acknowledgment of the Divine Being "from whom all blessings flow." It will, we trust, be devoutly observed by our readers, and we hope it will prove, for all, a day of spiritual blessing. We have, as individuals, and as a nation, innumerable blessings, for which we should render thanks, and as a Christian people it becomes us to take advantage of the opportunity of doing so in a public and solemn manner, prostrating ourselves in spirit before our Father, "from whom descends every good and every perfect gift."

The British Quarrel with Afghanistan has at last developed into hostilities. A column of English troops has marched into the Khyber Pass, and on Thursday, November 21st, opened fire on Fort Alimusjid. The cannonading continued through the day, the Afghan guns being well served and aimed. As night closed the firing ceased, and on Friday morning the Afghans evacuated the fort, alarmed, it is conjectured, by the appearance of a second British column which had advanced up the bed of a stream to attack them in the rear. The British force then took possession of the fort.

A fact of ominous significance is announced—viz., that the Russian General Kaufman has sent the Ameer of Afghanistan a present of a sword, with an address of sympathy, wishing him a speedy victory over his enemies. The address also speaks of the present as a pledge of friendship and unchanging affection, and boasting that "whoever sides with Russia need not fear that a hair of his head will be injured." If Russia intends protecting her interesting protégé's hair, she should lose no time in sending him help, for it is most assuredly in imminent danger; but if the Ameer is wise he will read a little of the history of those nations who in former times have put their trust in Russia before he follows their example.

In the Political World the period of quiescence which usually intervenes between the elections and the meeting of Congress has set in. Until Congress assembles politics may to a certain extent be considered a stagnant theme. Meanwhile Republican journals are loud in their denunciation of the manner in which the elections in the South are said to have been conducted. They contend that the solid South was solidified into Democratic shape by very unconstitutional methods; that intimidation and fraud operated at the polls, and that the same forces are being used to prevent a thorough investigation of the alleged malpractices. Democratic journals, on the other hand, assert that the charges are mere romance; that the issue of the elections in the South was such as might have been anticipated from the conduct of the late and present administrations; and that this year's marvellous crop shows that the white and colored populations are not actuated by the antagonism the Republican journals would have us believe.

The Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise made their formal entry into Halifax on Monday last, November 25th. The greatest enthusiasm was manifested, and a hearty reception was given them. For three miles the houses were festooned with evergreens and decorated with flags. As the Sarmatian, with the vice-regal party, steamed into the harbor, the fleet formed in double line, and the crews manned the yards and cheered lustily, and a royal salute was fired from the batteries. Presently boats put out from the vessel, and as they neared the quay the crowds on the shore gazed eagerly at the occupants. In a few minutes the Marquis of Lorne was seen lightly springing on shore and handing out the lady who had been sitting next him, and the ringing cheers that resounded from the crowd proclaimed that the new Governor-General had landed. A procession was formed, and the party proceeded to the Provincial Building, where the Marquis was duly sworn in as Governor-General. Congratulatory addresses followed, to which Lord Lorne gracefully replied.

The Voyage of the Marquis of Lorne from Liverpool to Canada was an unusually tempestuous one. The vessel encountered several very severe storms, and nearly every one on board suffered from sea-sickness. On one occasion a billow that must have weighed twenty tons descended on the vessel, crushing in the smoking-room and deluging the decks and some of the berths with water. The Princess Louise suffered sadly with sea-sickness, and to the disappointment of the officers and crew was unable to appear on deck during the voyage. The patent swinging berths, which it was hoped would neutralize the motion of the vessel, were found to be useless and were made firm. The Marquis of Lorne made a brave stand against the elements, and when not down below encouraging his wife spent most of his time on deck. Whatever show of homage is offered to royalty on land, it is manifest that on the ocean a very decided equality is in force, and the sea and the winds are no respecters of persons.

The commencement of the train of circumstances which have led to the Afghan war is traced, in a remarkable article which the Conservative Globe published lately, to Queen Victoria's assumption of the title of Empress of India—the perilous bit of stage effect by which Lord Beaconsfield inaugurated his "Imperial policy." In the autumn of 1876 Lord Lytton sent an invitation to the Ameer Shere Ali to attend the great Delhi assembly, when the Queen of England was proclaimed Empress of India. Shere Ali, however, saw clearly that to accept such an invitation would be to give up his position as an independent monarch.

It was scarcely to be expected that an independent ruler, with an army of 60,000 men, would voluntarily reduce himself to the position of a British satrap. Accordingly no answer was sent to the invitation. Thus began the unfriendly relations between the Anglo-Indian Government and the Ameer of Afghanistan, which have grown worse and worse, till they have issued in what is likely to prove a bloody, costly, and useless war.

The Depression in English Trade seems to become more marked every day. At Todmorden the mills are either working on short time or have been stopped altogether. A great deal of distress already prevails. At a meeting at Oldham the operatives resolved to resist the proposed reduction of ten per cent in wages. The reduction will affect 20,000 hands and 8,000,000 spindles. Ten thousand persons are already on strike. At Preston there are 205 pairs of mules, containing nearly 315,000 spindles, idle, besides which many mills are working short time. The short-time movement is extending in Burnley. The cotton trade in Chorley is very depressed.

In the shipbuilding yard of Elder & Co., Govan, where 3000 men are engaged, the workmen are to be employed only forty-five hours per week instead of fifty-one. Coming so close upon the seven and a half per cent reduction, this has caused some sensation among the men in the trade. The men at several firms on the Clyde have struck against the reduction. Between 6000 and 7000 hands engaged in the engine works at Crewe have just had notice of resumption of short time, the reduction consisting of seven and a half hours per week. Notices have been posted at most of the Carnarvonshire slate quarries announcing a reduction of seven per cent in the wages of the quarrymen. The notice of a reduction of wages given by the farmers of Kent and Sussex to their men expired on Saturday, and was followed by a strike. The most trying part for the laborers and their Unio is the question of lodgings, for the farmers hav in most instances told the laborers that if the leave their employ they must also leave thei cottages. In many districts of England, th landowners, when they let a farm to a tenant place at his disposal for the use of his employé a number of cottages, which he "underlets" a he chooses.

enough with him in the bar-room, were the very individuals who seemed most ashamed of his acquaintance—by no means a new or exceptional experience. He says, "I felt that I was shunned by the respectable portion of the community also; and once, on asking a lad to accompany me in a walk, he informed me that his father had cautioned him against associating with me. This was a cutting reproof, and I felt it more deeply than words can express. And could I wonder at it? No!"

To drown the sense of mortification thus aroused, Gough would drink, not so much from love of the liquor as to become stupefied by its fumes and so steep his sorrows in a half oblivion; and, as might be expected, from this miserable stupor he would wake to a fuller consciousness of his situation, which he again would banish by drinking. This continued for some months.

"I was now," he says, "the slave of a habit which had become completely my master, and which fastened its remorseless fangs in my very vitals. Thought was a torturing thing. When I looked back, memory drew fearful pictures, in lines of lurid flame; and, whenever I dared anticipate the future, hope refused to illumine my onward path. I dwelt in one awful present; nothing to solace me—nothing to beckon me onwards to a better state." Even the sudden death of a companion drunkard made no impression on him.

At this extremity Gough went to hear a lecture delivered by the first reformed drunkard, Mr. J. J. Johnson, who visited Newburyport. He stood for ten minutes at the door, and heard the speaker, in graphic and forcible terms, depict the misery of the drunkard, and the awful consequences of his conduct. He says, "I knew he was right, and I turned to leave the church, when a young man offered me the pledge to sign. I actually turned to sign it; but at that critical moment the appetite for strong drink, as if determined to have the mastery over me, came in all its force. Oh, how I craved it! and, remembering that I had a pint of brandy at home, I deferred signing, and let the golden opportunity pass away."

Soon after this he set his bed on fire while intoxicated, and was rescued by neighbors discovering the fire in time. Not long afterwards his drinking brought on with all its horrors. "For three days," he says, "I endured more agony than pen could describe. Hideous faces appeared on the walls, and on the ceiling, and on the floors; foul things crept along the bedclothes, and glaring eyes peered into mine. I was at one time surrounded by millions of monstrous spiders, that crawled slowly over every limb, whilst the beaded drops of perspiration would start to my brow, and my limbs would shiver until the bed rattled again. Strange lights would dance before my eyes, and then suddenly the very blackness of darkness would appal me by its dense gloom. All at once, whilst gazing at a frightful creation of my distempered mind, I seemed struck with sudden blindness. And then the scene would change: I was falling—falling swiftly as an arrow—far down into some terrible abyss; and so like reality was it that, as I fell, I could see the rocky sides of the horrible shaft, where mocking, gibing, mowing, fiend-like forms were perched; and I could feel the air rushing past me, making my hair stream out by the force of the unwholesome blast."

God spared him yet again; and he rose, a weak, broken-down man. Thoughts of his mother now haunted him, and he asked himself how had he obeyed the instructions received from her lips, and to what advantage had he turned the lessons she taught him. Her countless prayers and tears were recalled—thoughts of what he had been but a few short months before in contrast to his present situation; and, in the excitement of the moment, he resolved to lead a better life, and abstain from the accursed cup. This he did for about a month; then his wife came home, and, in his joy at her return, he flung his good resolutions to the wind, and, unwisely fancying that he could restrain his appetite, he took a glass of brandy. That glass aroused the slumbering demon. Another and another succeeded, until he was again far advanced in the career of intemperance. The night of his wife's return he went to bed intoxicated. Thus from bad to worse he fell.

He soon left his situation, and joined a travelling panorama, and, leaving his wife behind, went from town to town with the show. Lower and lower he sank, often being utterly unfit, through drink, to perform his parts in the entertainment.

From this point in his career we briefly summarize the remainder of his eventful life to the present period. On the last Sunday of October, 1842, as he was walking in a street in Worcester, U. S., in a state of wretchedness and degradation, he was accosted by Joel Stratton, a waiter in a Temperance Hotel, who in kindly tones entreated him to sign the pledge. He did so the next evening, and from that time there dates a new epoch in his career.

He then began to lecture at teetotal meetings, and his success as a public speaker led to his addressing large audiences in many towns of the United States. In 1852 he received an urgent invitation from the London Temperance League to lecture in England. He arrived on July 31st, 1853, at Liverpool, with the intention of returning to America after ten weeks' lecturing. But so enthusiastically was he received, and such was the effect of his unequalled oratory, that he was induced to remain for two years, and to deliver 438 lectures in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

He again visited England for three years, from 1857 to 1860, and delivered 605 lectures.

He is now in England again, and is attracting immense audiences.

Mr. John Bright on the Whiskey Question.—At a meeting of the Haddington Established Presbytery, the Rev. Dr. Whitelaw read a letter from Mr. John Bright, the eminent English statesman, in which the following passages occurred: "The great whiskey question is one which your friends may consider with some advantage. If all the ministers of the Scotch churches were to banish whiskey from their houses, and the consumption of it from their customs or social habits, they would do much to discredit and to withdraw one fertile source of poverty and suffering in Scotland. Many of what you term 'virtuous poor' suffer much from the evil of whiskey in connection with members of their families."

THIS attack of highwaymen was in a rocky ravine, which gives to robbers a first-rate chance. So late as 1820, on that very road, an English traveller was shot and robbed. This wayfarer of the text not only lost his money and his apparel, but nearly lost his life. His assailants were not only thieves, but assassins. The scene of this lonely road from Jerusalem to Jericho is repeated every night in our great cities—men falling among thieves, getting wounded, and left half dead.

In this series of Sabbath-morning discourses on the night side of city life, as I have recently explored it, I have spoken to you of the night of pauperism, the night of debauchery and shame, the night of official neglect and bribery, and now I come to speak to you of the night of theft, the night of burglary, the night of assassination, the night of pistol and dirk and bludgeon. You say, What can there be in such a subject for me? Then you remind me of the man who asked Christ the question, "Who is my neighbor?" and in the reply of the text Christ is setting forth the idea that wherever there is a man in trouble, there is your neighbor; and before I get through this morning, if the Lord will help me, I will show you that you have some very dangerous neighbors, and I will show you also what is your moral responsibility before God in regard to them.

I said to the chief official, "Give me two stout detectives for this night's work—men who are not only muscular, but who look muscular." I said to these detectives before we started on our midnight exploration, "Have you loaded pistols?" and they brought forth their firearms and their clubs, showing they were ready for any thing. Then show me crime in the worst shape, the most villanous and outrageous crime. In other words, show me the worst classes of people to be saved by the power of Christ's Gospel."

I took with me only two officers of the law, for I want no one to run any risk in my behalf, and, having undertaken to show up the lowest depths of society, I felt I must go on until I had completed the work. One of the officers proposed to me that I take a disguise lest I be assailed. I said, "No; I am going on a mission of Christian work, and I am going to take the risks, and I shall go as I am." And so I went.

You say to me, "Why didn't you first look after the criminal classes of Brooklyn?" I answer, it was not for any lack of material. Last year, in the city of Brooklyn, there were nearly 27,000 arrests for crime. Two hundred burglaries. Thirteen homicides. Twenty-seven highway robberies. Forty thousand lodgers in the station-houses. Three hundred and thirty-six scoundrels who had their pictures taken for the Rogues' Gallery, without any expense to those who sat for the pictures! Two hundred thousand dollars' worth of property stolen. Every kind of crime, from manslaughter to chicken thief. Indeed, I do not think there is any place in the land where you can more easily get your pocket she ended a long life of faithful work for others—a life of patient struggle, fighting nobly, lovingly, and hopefully the battle of life. Her worn body rests in hope, and He who wept at the grave of Lazarus watches the sleeping dust of his servant. Yes, life and immortality are brought to light through the Gospel. My poor mother sleeps as sweetly as if entombed in a marble sarcophagus ; and, thank God, she will rise as gloriously when 'He who became the first-fruits of them that slept' shall call His humble disciple to come and 'be forever with the Lord.' "

After this J. B. Gough got employment in New York, and his sister obtained a situation elsewhere. John was therefore alone, and was consequently subject to temptations from which he might have been saved if a loving sister only had been at hand to watch over him. Being a good singer, and having the imitative faculty largely developed, his company was sought after by young men, whose thoughtless and drinking habits were all too soon adopted by the lonely youth. The theatre was now his frequent resort ; and to be an actor soon became the one sole ambition of his life.

His efforts to procure a situation in a theatre were not, however, successful, though he obtained some encouragement for his hope of ultimately doing so by the applause with which a comic song which he sang at the Franklin Theatre was received.

During this period Gough worked pretty steadily at his business ; but such were his growing habits of dissipation, that, although receiving five dollars a week, he squandered every penny, and was continually in debt. His proceedings, too, became characterized by a hitherto unfelt recklessness. One morning a young man came to him, and informed him that a great fire had broken out down the street. (Gough had belonged to a volunteer fire-engine company, and also to a dramatic society, and these had greatly tended to increase his habits of irregularity.) He passed by the information lightly, saying, "Let it burn on, it won't hurt me."

He was then at breakfast, and, when he had finished it, some one informed him that the fire was in the neighborhood of the shop where he worked. This, of course, alarmed him, and he proceeded toward his place of business, where he arrived just in time to see the flames bursting through the workshop windows. By this disaster he lost what he could ill afford—an overcoat and some books ; and, worse than this, he was thrown out of employment, so that, as he says, "I was injured by the fire, which I had so confidently thought could not hurt me."

Mr. Gladding, after the fire, removed to Bristol, Rhode Island, where he set up in business, and Gough went again into his employ for about a year ; at the end of that time, however, Mr. Gladding failed, and John was again obliged to seek for occupation. He proceeded to Providence, Rhode Island. Here he succeeded in procuring work at Mr. Brown's, in Market Row, and experienced much kindness at his hands.

Alas ! the dissipated habits that he had formed followed him, and grew upon him. Business was distasteful ; and a company of actors coming at that time to perform in Providence, Gough made their acquaintance, and, following their counsel, gave himself up to the stage. Very short-lived was the gratification. The theatre was closed, Gough and the other members of the company were discharged, and received no payment of the salaries due to them, and, worse still for him, his reputation was injured, and he was unable to obtain employment. His drinking habits now became more uncontrollable, and he was soon reduced to absolute want.

At this extremity he was found by a person named Barry, who wanted to engage some actors for a theatre in Boston, and who took him back to Boston, where he obtained an engagement as low comedy actor. This, like the former engagement, soon terminated ; and, like the former again, left him without his hard-earned remuneration.

Through the kindness of a woman, Gough was kept from starvation until he again obtained some employment. This he at last did, at Mr. Benjamin Bradley's ; and in his employ he continued until the month of January, 1838, when he was discharged. The reason assigned by Mr. Bradley for his dismissal was what might have been expected from a knowledge of his habits. Mr. Bradley said Gough was too shabby in appearance for a shop, and it was his opinion, as well as that of others, that he drank too much.

Gough again obtained employment, but at very small wages, at Newburyport ; and for a few weeks managed to keep free from the intoxicating cup. As he was now comparatively steady, he gave great satisfaction to his employer ; but this state of things, unhappily, did not last long, for he had such a longing for convivial society that he soon formed an acquaintance with companions who were calculated to destroy any resolutions of amendment which he had formed ; and, before long, he again neglected his business, and still further injured both his reputation and health.

As work fell off, and its wages became insufficient, Gough embraced another occupation, and entered into an arrangement with the captain of a fishing-boat to go a voyage with him down Chaleur Bay. His sea experiences were somewhat severe ; but, as there was no rum on board, he was forced to keep sober. When, however, he went on shore, he made up for forced abstinence, and a visit to another vessel was generally accompanied by a carousal, if rum was by any means to be obtained. In consequence of what is commonly called a "spree," his life was, at one time, placed in considerable jeopardy. .

He, with others, had been on board a neighboring vessel, and, on returning at night, he was intoxicated. The boat was rowed to the side of their craft, and he was so much under the influence of drink that he lay unnoticed at the bottom of the boat. When the rest of the crew got on board, the hook was fastened in the bow of the boat, which was drawn up. In consequence of this, as the bow was hoisted with a jerk, Gough was flung violently to the stern, and the force of the blow effectually awakened him. He called out just in time to avoid being thrown overboard, and was soon rescued from his perilous position. So was his life again saved by a merciful God.

"And yet," he writes, "at this time I did not consider myself to be —what in reality I was—a drunkard. Well enough did I know, from bitter experience, that character, situations, and health had been lost in consequence of my love of ardent spirits. I felt, too, an aching void in my breast, and conscience frequently told me that I was on the broad road to ruin ; but that I was what all men despised—and I among them detested—viz., a drunkard, I could not bring myself to believe."

On their return voyage they were in imminent danger of drifting on the rocks through a violent storm, and were only saved by the wind suddenly shifting. Wrecks strewed the coast ; a vessel went down with all on board but a short distance from them ; and the schooner that started in their company from the Bay went on shore and every man perished.

On arriving at Newburyport, after being at sea, Mr. Gough engaged to work at his own business again with Mr. Tilton. "Not long afterwards," he says, "I entered into the matrimonial state, and commenced housekeeping, having earned money sufficient by my fishing voyage to purchase some neat furniture. In my new condition I might have done well, for I had every prospect of success, had it not been for my craving after convivial society, which, in spite of having a home of my own, I still felt."

But, unfortunately, he soon became involved in a dissipated social network, whose fatal meshes too surely entangled and unfitted him for the active exertion now rendered doubly necessary. He continued at his work for a few months, when, business becoming slack, he again went on a fishing excursion for six weeks, with his wife's brother.

While at Newburyport, Mr. Gough for some time attended the church of which Mr. Campbell was the minister ; and he speaks well of the kindness both of the pastor and of several of the members. It seemed a favorable opportunity to return to the impressions and resolves of his earlier years, an opportunity which surely would not be neglected ; but he says, "My desire for strong liquors and company seemed to present an insuperable barrier to all improvement ; and after a few weeks every aspiration after better things had ceased, every bud of promised comfort was crushed. Again I grieved the Holy Spirit that had been striving with my spirit, and ere long became even more addicted to the use of the infernal draughts, which had already wrought me so much woe, than at any previous period of my existence."

And now his circumstances began to be desperate indeed. His efforts to obtain work failed ; and at last he became so reduced that at times he did not know, when one meal was ended, where he should find another. Further mortification awaited him. The young men with whom he had associated in bar-rooms and parlors, and who wore a little better clothing than he could afford, one after another shunned him. The cold look, the averted eye, the half recognition, to a sensitive spirit such as his, was treatment almost past endurance. To add to this mortification, it happened that those who had laughed the loudest at his songs and stories, and who had been social picked, or your house burglarized, or your signature counterfeited, or your estate swindled, than in Brooklyn; but crime here is on a comparatively small scale, because we are a smaller city. The great depots of crime for this cluster of cities are in New York. It is a better hiding-place, the city is so vast, and all officers tell us that when a crime is committed in Jersey City, or is committed in Brooklyn, the villain attempts immediately to cross the ferry. While Brooklyn's sin is as enterprising as is possible for the number of inhabitants, crowd one million people on an island, and you have a stage and an audience on which and before whom crime may enact its worst tragedies.

There was nothing that more impressed me on that terrible night of exploration than the respect which crime pays to law when it is really confronted. Why do those eight or ten desperadoes immediately stop their blasphemy and their uproar and their wrangling? It is because an officer of the law calmly throws back the lappel of his coat and shows the badge of authority. The fact is that government is ordained of Heaven, and just so far as the police officer does his duty, just so far is he a deputy of the Lord Almighty. That is the reason Inspector Murray, of New York, sometimes goes in and arrests four or five desperadoes. He is a man of comparatively slight stature, yet when one is backed up by omnipotent justice he can do any thing.

I said, "What is this glazed window, and who are these mysterious people going in and then coming out and passing down the street, looking to the pavement, and keeping a regular step until they hear a quick step behind them, and then darting down an alley?" This place, in the night of our exploration, was what the Bible calls "A DEN OF THIEVES."

They will not admit it. You cannot prove it against them, for the reason that the keeper and the patrons are the acutest men in the city. No sign of stolen goods, no loud talk about misdemeanors, but here a table surrounded by three or four persons whispering; yonder a table surrounded by three or four more persons whispering; before each man a mug of beer or stronger intoxicant. He will not drink to unconsciousness; he will only drink to get his courage up to the point of recklessness, all the while managing to keep his eye clear and his hand steady.

These men around this table are talking over last night's exploit; their narrow escape from the basement door; how nearly they fell from the window-ledge of the second story; how the bullet grazed the hair. What is this bandaged hand you see in that room? That was cut by the window glass as the burglar thrust his hand through to the inside fastening. How did that man lose his eye? It was destroyed three years ago by a premature flash of gunpowder in a store lock.

Who are these three or four surrounding this other table? They are planning for to-night's villany. They know just what hour the last member of the family will retire. They are in collusion with the servant, who has promised to leave one of the back windows open. They know at what time the man of wealth will leave his place of dissipation and start for home, and they are arranging it how they shall come out of the dark alley and bring him down with a slung-shot. No sign of desperation in this room of thieves, and yet how many false keys, how many ugly pocket-knives, how many brass knuckles, how many revolvers!

A few vulgar pictures on the wall, and the inevitable bar. Rum they must have to rest them after the exciting marauding. Rum they must have before they start on the new expedition of arson and larceny and murder. But not ordinary rum. It is poisoned four times. Poisoned first by the manufacturer; poisoned secondly by the wholesale dealer; poisoned thirdly by the retail dealer; poisoned fourthly by the saloon-keeper. Poisoned four times, it is just right to fit one for cruelty and desperation. Those men have calculated to the last quarter of a glass how much they need to take to qualify them for their work. They must not take a drop too much, nor a drop too little.

These are the PROFESSIONAL CRIMINALS of the city, between twenty-three and twenty-four hundred of them in this cluster of cities. They are as thoroughly drilled in crime as for good purposes medical colleges train doctors, law colleges train lawyers, theological seminaries train clergymen. These criminals have been apprentices and journeymen; but now they are boss workmen. They have gone through the freshman, sophomore, junior, and senior classes of the great university of crime, and have graduated with diplomas signed by all the faculty of darkness. They have no ambition for an easy theft, or an unskilled murder, or a blundering blackmail. They must have something difficult. They must have in their enterprise the excitement of peril. They must have something that will give them an opportunity of bravado. They must do something which amateurs in crime dare not do.

These are the men who come in to examine the directory in the back part of your store while their accomplices are in the front engaging you in conversation, then dropping the directory and investigating the money-safe. These are the forgers who get one of your cancelled checks and one of your blank checks, and practise on the writing of your name until the deception is as perfect as the counterfeit check of Cornelius Vanderbilt, indorsed by Henry Keep, in 1870, for $75,000, which check was immediately cashed at the City Bank.

These are the pickpockets, six hundred of them in this cluster of cities who sit beside you in the stage and help you pass up the change! They stand beside you when you are shopping, and help you examine the goods, and weep beside you at the funeral, and sometimes bow their heads beside you in the house of God, doing their work with such adroitness that your affliction at the loss of the money is somewhat mitigated by your appreciation of the skill of the operator!

The most successful of these are females, and, I suppose, on the theory that if a woman is good she is better than man, and if she is bad she is worse. She stands so much higher up than man that when she falls she falls farther.

Some of these criminals, pickpockets, and thieves also take the garb of clergymen. They look like doctors of divinity. With coats buttoned clear up to the chin, and white-cravated, they look as if they were just going to pronounce the benediction, while they are all the time wondering where your watch is, or your portmonnaie is. A thousand of the professional criminals do nothing but snatch things. They go in pairs, one of them keeping your attention in one part of the store, the other doing a lively business in another part of the store. At one end of the establishment the proprietor is smiling graciously on one who seems to be an exquisite lady, while in another part of the same establishment a roll of goods is taken up by a copartner in crime and put in a crocodile pocket, large enough to swallow every thing.

These professional criminals are the men who break in the windows of jewelry stores and snatch the jewels, and before the clerks have an opportunity of knowing what is the excitement, are a block away, looking innocent, ready to come back and join in the pursuit of the offender, shouting with stentorian voice "Stop thief!"

You wonder whether these people get large accumulation? No. Of the largest haul they get only a fifth, or a sixth, or a seventh part. It is the receiver of stolen goods that gets the profit. If these men during the course of their lives should get $50,000, they will live poor, and die poor, and be poor to all eternity.

Among these professional criminals in our cities are THE BLACKMAILERS— those who would have you pay a certain amount of money or have your character tarnished. If you are guilty I have no counsel to give in this matter; but if you are innocent let me say that no one of integrity need ever fear the blackmailer. All you have to do is to put the case immediately in the hands of Superintendent Walling of the New York police, or Superintendent Campbell of the Brooklyn police, and you will be vindicated. Depend upon it, however, that every dollar you pay to a blackmailer is toward your own everlasting enthralment. A man in a cavern fighting a tigress might as well consent to give the tigress his right hand, letting her eat it up, with the supposition that she would let him off with the rest of his body, as for you to pay any thing to a blackmailer with the idea of getting your character cleared. The thing to be done is to have the tigress shot, and that the law is willing to do. Let me lay down a principle you can put in your memorandum-books, and put in the front part of your Bible, and in the back part of your Bible, and put in your day-book, and put in your ledger—this principle: that no man's character is ever sacrificed until he sacrifices it himself. But you surrender your reputation, your fortune, your home, and your immortal soul when you pay a farthing to a blackmailer.

Who are these men in this room at Hook Dock, or at the foot of Roosevelt Street? They are professional criminals. Under the cover of the night they go down through the bay, or up and down the rivers. Finding two men in a rowboat going to some steamer, or to one of the adjoining islands, they board the boat, rob the two men of their money, and if they seem unreasonably opposed to giving up their money, taking their lives, and giving them watery graves. These are the men who lounge around the solitary pier at night, and who clamber up on the side of the vessel lying at wharf, and, finding the captain asleep, give him chloroform to help him sleep, and then knock the watchman overboard, and take the valuables. Of this class were Howlett and Saul, who by twenty-one years of age had become the terror of the twenty-one miles of New York City water-front, and who wound up their piracy by a murder on the bark Thomas Watson, and crossed the gallows, relieving the world of their existence.

But in all these dens of thieves we find THOSE WHO EXCITE ONLY OUR PITY— people flung off the steeps of decent society. Having done wrong once, in despair they went to the bottom. Of such was that man who last Wednesday, in New York, stole a roll of goods, went to the station-house, said he was hungry, and asked to be sent to prison. Of such are those young men who make false entries in the account-book, resolved to "fix it up," or who surreptitiously borrow from the commercial establishment, expecting to "fix it up;" but sickness comes, or accident comes, or a conjunction of unexpected circumstances, and they never fix it up." In disgrace they go down. Oh! how many, by force of circumstances, and at the start with no very bad idea, get off the track and perish!

A gentleman sitting in this assemblage this morning told me of an incident which occurred in a large commercial establishment—I believe the fourth in size in the whole country. The employer said to a young lady in the establishment, "You must dress better." She said, "I cannot dress better; I get $6 a week, and I pay $4 for my board, and I have $2 for dress and for my car fare; I cannot dress better." Then he said, "You must get it in some other way." Well, I suppose she could steal. I do not know how that incident affects you; but when it was told to me it made every drop of my blood, from scalp to heel, tingle with indignation. The fact is that there are thousands of men and women dropping into dishonesty and crime by force of circumstances and by their destitution. Under the same kind of pressure you and I would have perished.

It is despicable to stand on shore laughing at the shipwrecked struggling in the breakers when we ought to be getting out the rockets and the lifeboat and the ropes from the wrecking establishment. How much have you ever done to get this class ashore? In our city of Brooklyn we grip them of the police. Then we hustle them into a court-room amid a great crowd of gaping spectators. Then we throw them into the worst jail on the continent—Raymond Street Jail. We put them in there with three or four confirmed criminals, and then actually deny $500 to the chaplain, who is giving his time for the alleviation of their condition, and putting our refusal of the $500 on the ground that if we support that thing in the penitentiary, and if we have religious services there, it will be so much like uniting Church and State.

But, says some one at this point in my discourse:

"WHERE DOES ALL THIS CRIME COME FROM?"

Let me tell you that New York is now paying for the political dishonesties of ten years ago. Do you believe that the political iniquities of 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871 could be enacted in any city without demoralizing the community from top to bottom? Look at the sham elections of 1868 and 1869. Think of those times when a criminal was auditor of public accounts, and honorable gentlemen in the legal profession were put out of sight by shyster lawyers, and some of the police magistrates were worse than the criminals arraigned before them, and when the most notorious thief since the creation of the world was a State Senator, holding princely levee in the Delavan House at Albany. Ah! my friends, those were the times when thousands of men were put on the wrong track. They said: "Why, what's the use of honest work when knavery declares such large dividends? What's the use of my going afoot in shoes I have to pay for myself, when I can have gilded livery sweeping through Broadway supported by public funds?" The rule was, as far as I remember it: Get an office with a large salary; if you cannot get an office with a large salary, get an office with a small salary, and then steal all you can lay your hands on, and call them "perquisites;" and then give subordinate offices to your friends and let them help you on with the universal swindle, and get more "perquisites."

Many of the young men of the cities were then eighteen years of age. They saw their parents hard at work with trowel and yard-stick and pen, getting only a cramped living, while those men who were throwing themselves on their political wits had plenty of money and no work. Do you wonder that thousands adopted a life of dissipated indolence? Ten years having passed, they are now twenty-eight years of age, and in full swing of vagabondism. The putrid politics of ten years ago sowed much of the crop which is now being harvested by the almshouse and the penitentiary.

But you say,

"WHAT IS THE PRACTICAL USE OF THIS SUBJECT?

Have I any relation to it?" You have; in the last judgment you will have to give answer for your relation to it. Through all eternity you will feel the consequences of your relation to it. I could not waste my time nor your time in a discussion if there were not some practical significance to it.

First of all, I give you a statistic which ought to make every office table, and every counting-room desk, and every money-safe quake and tremble. It is the statistic that larcenies in New York City, directly and indirectly, cost that city $6,000,000 per year. There are all the moneys taken, in the first place. Then there are the prisons and the station-houses. Then there are the courts. Then there is the vast machinery of municipal government for the arraignment and treatment of villany. Why, the Court of Sessions and the police courts cost the City of New York about $200,000 per year. The police force directly and indirectly costs the City of New York over $2,000,000 a year, and all that expenditure puts its tax on every bill of lading, on every yard of goods, on every parlor, every nursery, every store, every shop, every brick from foundation to capstone, every foot of ground from the south side of Castle Garden to the north side of Central Park, and upon all Brooklyn, and upon all Jersey City, for the reason that the interests of these cities are so interlocked that what is the prosperity of one is the prosperity of all, and what is the calamity of one is the calamity of all.

But I do not, this morning, address you as financiers: I address you as moralists and Christian men and women, who before God have a responsibility for all this turpitude and scoundrelism, unless in every possible way you try to stop it and redeem it. "Oh!" says some one in the house, "such criminals as that cannot be reformed." I reply: Then you are stupidly ignorant of Christianity. Who was the man on the right-hand cross when Jesus was expiring? A thief—a dying thief. Where did he go to? To heaven. Christ said to him: "This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." In that most conspicuous moment of the world's history, Christ demonstrating to all ages that the worst criminal can be saved!

Who is that man in the Fourth Ward, New York, preaching the Gospel every night of the week, and preaching it all the year round, and bringing more drunkards and thieves and criminals to the heart of a pardoning God than any twenty churches in Brooklyn or New York? Jerry McAuley, the converted river thief. That man took me to his front window the other evening, and he said, "Do you see that grog-shop over there?" I said, "Yes; I see it." "Well," he said, "I once was pitched out of that by the proprietor for being drunken and noisy. The grace of God has done a great deal for me. I was going along the street the other day, and that man who owned that groggery then, and who owns it now, wanted a favor of me, and he called to me. He did not call me drunken Jerry; but he said Mister McAuley—Mister McAuley!" Oh! if the grace of God could do as much for that man, it can save any outcast. If not, then what is the use of Paul's address when he says, "Let him that stole steal no more?"

I will tell you something—I do not care whether you like it or not—that at last, in heaven, there will be five hundred thousand converted thieves, pickpockets, gamblers, debauchees, murderers, and outcasts, all saved by the grace of God, washed clean and prepared for glory. That exquisite out there gives a twitch to his kid glove, and that lady brings the skirt of her silk dress nearer her, as though she were afraid of having that truth tarnish her.

"Why," says some one in the house, "are you going to make heaven such a common place as that?" I do not make it common. God makes it common. It is to be the most common place in the whole universe. By that I mean they are going to come up from all classes and conditions, and from the very lowest depths of society, washed clean by the grace of God, and entering heaven.

But, say some people, "What am I to do?" I will tell you three things, anyhow, you can do. First, avoid putting people in your employ amid too great temptation. You can take a young man in your employ and put him in a position where nine hundred and ninety-nine chances out of a thousand are that he will do wrong. Now, I say you have no right to do that. If you have any mercy on the criminal classes, and if you do not want to multiply their number, look out how you put people under temptation.

In the second place, you can do this: you can speak a cheerful word when a man wants to reform. What chance is there for those who have gone astray? Here they are in the lowest depths of society, first of all, with their evil proclivities; then, with their evil associations. But suppose they conquer these evil proclivities, and break away from them. Now, they have come up to the door of society. Who will let them in? Will you? No; you dare not. They will go all around these doors of decent society, and find five hundred, and knock—no admittance; and knock—no admittance; and knock—no admittance. Now, I say it is your duty as a Christian man to help these people when the want to come up and come back.

There is a third thing you can do, and that is be the stanch friends of prison reform associations, home missionary societies, children's ai societies, and all those beneficent institution which are trying to save our cities. But perhap
I ought to do my own work now, leaving your for you to do some other time. I will now d that work. Very probably there is not in al this house one person who is known as a criminal, and yet I suppose there are scores of persons in this house who have done wrong.

Now perhaps I may meet their case healthfully and encouragingly when I tell them wha
I said to

TWO YOUNG MEN.

One young man said to me: "I have take from my employer $2500 in small amounts, bu amounting to that. What shall I do?" I sai "Pay it back." He said, "I can't pay it back.
Then I said, "Get your friends to help you pa it." He said, "I have no friends that will hel me." Then I said, "I will give you two item of advice: First, go home and kneel down before God and ask His pardon. Then, to-morro morning, when you go over to the store, get th head men of the firm in the private office, an tell them you have something very important t communicate, and let the door be locked. The tell the whole story and ask their pardon.
they are decent men—not to say any thing abou their being Christians or not Christians—if the are decent men, they will forgive you and hel you to start again." "But," he said, "suppos they don't?" "Then," I said, "you have th
Lord Almighty to see you through, and no ma ever flung himself at Christ's feet but he wa helped and delivered."

Another young man came to me and said, " have taken money from my employer. Wh shall I do?" I said, "Pay it back." "Well, he said, "I took a very large amount—I near paid it all back." I said, "Now, how long b fore you can pay it all back?" "Well," he sai
"I can in two weeks, but my conscience distur

The Prince and Princess of Wales visited the kiosk of the Crystal Palace Bible Stand at the Paris Exhibition on October 2d. They expressed great interest in the work, particulars of which were given them by Mr. James Alexander, who has had the superintendence of it, and accepted a copy of the smallest Bible in the world, a book printed at Oxford, England, in minute type and on very thin, silky paper. On leaving, the Prince and Princess each made a handsome contribution to the fund. The kiosk is now closed. Nearly a million and a half of Gospels and New Testaments in 22 languages have been given to applicants at its wickets, the number last Sunday alone being 41,000, and English, French, and other influential visitors have evinced cordial sympathy with the undertaking, which is regarded as having been highly successful.

The Author of "Home, Sweet Home," Howard Payne, a genial-hearted, kind little man, was walking with a friend in the great city of London, and pointing to one of the aristocratic streets in Mayfair, where wealth and luxury had the windows closed and curtained lest the least warmth and light should go out, or the smallest air of cold winter come in, where isolated exclusive English comfort was guarded by a practical dragon of gold, he, this tiny man with a big heart, said: "Under those windows I composed the song of 'Home, Sweet Home,' as I wandered about without food, or a semblance of shelter I could call my own. Many a night since I wrote those words that issued out of my heart by absolute want of a home have I passed and repassed in this locality, and heard a sweet voice coming from within these gilded, fur-lined, comfortable walls, in the depth of a dim, cold London winter, warbling 'Home, Sweet Home,' while I, the author of them, knew no bed to call my own."

The Girl and the King.—The King of Prussia, while visiting a village in his land, was welcomed by the school children of the place. After their speaker had made a speech for them the king thanked them. Then taking an orange from a plate he asked, "To what kingdom does this belong?" "The vegetable kingdom, sire," replied a little girl. The king took a gold coin from his pocket, and, holding it up, asked, "And to what kingdom does this belong?" "To the mineral kingdom," said the little girl. "And to what kingdom do I belong, then?" asked the king. The little girl colored deeply, for she did not like to say "the animal kingdom," as he thought she would, lest his majesty should be offended. Just then it flashed into her mind that "God made man in His own image," and, looking up with a brightening eye, she said, "To God's kingdom, sire." The king was deeply moved. A tear stood in his eye. He placed his hand on the child's head, and said, most devoutly, "God grant that I may be accounted worthy of that kingdom." Thus did the words of a child move the heart of a king.

Sabbath Rest.—It is a well-established fact that more real work is performed by those who labor only for six days than those who devote all the seven to unremitting toil. It has been proved in the case of the overwrought statesman and professional man, as well as in that of the 'bus-driver, who works for sixteen hours from one week's end to the other. In this occupation few pass the age of fifty years. The celebrated Mr. William Wilberforce, so well acquainted with all the great statesmen at the beginning of this century—with Pitt, Fox, and the other giants of those days—has recorded that "he could name several of his contemporaries in the vortex of political cares whose minds have entirely given way under the stress of intellectual labor, so as to bring on premature death." Sir David Wilkie's experience was that "the artists who wrought on Sabbath were soon disqualified from working at all." Lord Chancellor Bacon, Sir Matthew Hale, and Sir William Blackstone, amongst our judges, contribute the same testimony, and give their experience of the moral injury caused by the practice. The latter says "that a corruption of morals usually follows a profanation of the Sabbath."

Ruth Elliott's Heavenly Vision.—One of the most rising of our young authoresses died last week. She was the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Peck, a Wesleyan minister of Chelmsford, England. Although only twenty-eight years of age, she had written a large number of excellent religious tales.

She was fragile in health, and of a highly nervous temperament, which makes the experience of her closing hours very noteworthy. She seemed to feel a great dread of the estate of death the very day before she departed; but in her last hour this quiet, calm, meditative spirit was alive with joy. She had taken no stimulant, no narcotic; nothing to create from the physical side such an experience. These were her words at one o'clock at night:

"I am going—going home. Yes, I know I am, and Jesus is near—close by me in this room. You can't see Him, but I can clearly, and He is touching me. He is holding me up, and so strongly, I fear nothing. I have no terror. Don't be afraid for me. Oh, I can see it all now! I can see inside, and it is lovely, it is lovely. Oh, I never saw any thing so lovely! It is so easy to die, so easy, so very easy. There is nothing in the world easier than to die. I wish I'd gone long ago for such happiness as this is." "The Everlasting Arms are around you," said one. "Yes, and under me too," she said. "Jesus is so close. All of you believe me. Oh, it is most lovely! I want to go; it won't be very long, will it? No pain, no pain; not any more pain. O Jesus, keep me close till I get right in! There's nothing like this beautiful heaven! I am nearly there! I see Jesus!" And with a last look of ineffable peace she closed her eyes.

Cardinal Manning, referring in a sermon the other day to the recent death of Cardinal Cullen, of Dublin, said: "He was a great cardinal—a pious, devoted bishop of the Catholic Church. He has gone from this evil world to his Divine Master. Remember him, then, in your prayers, for we shall all need the prayers of the faithful when we go hence into another and a better world. There is not one of us, however holy may be our lives, who will not stand in need, when he has departed this life, of the prayers of those living on earth, and of every saint in heaven, before we can pass through that great ordeal which is before us all." What a miserable prospect would this be for a Christian if it were true!

MR. SPURGEON AND HIS SONS.

We regret to learn that the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon is again laid aside through illness. He was at the college as usual on Friday, November 8th, but on his return home he became so unwell that it was feared he would be unable to preach on Sunday. These fears proved to be only too well founded, and the congregation that assembled in the Tabernacle on Sunday morning had to be content with a sermon from the pastor's son Thomas, who had arrived from Australia on the 1st inst. It is but bare justice to say that they were not only contented but delighted with the youthful preacher who was thus unexpectedly called upon to fill his father's place. At the prayer-meeting on the Monday previous Mr. Wm. Olney expressed the hope that they would soon have the opportunity of hearing him preach to the great congregation, little thinking at the time how soon his wish would be realized.

The evening service, as had been previously announced, was free to all comers, and notwithstanding the stormy weather, the great building was crowded to its utmost capacity, the number of men in working garb being especially noticeable. Mr. Thomas Spurgeon again preached, if possible, with greater power than in the morning.

At the same hour his brother, Mr. Charles Spurgeon, was preaching to part of the regular Tabernacle congregation at the Stockwell Orphanage, and we understand that he acquitted himself equally well. It must be a great consolation to Mr. Spurgeon, especially in this time of affliction, to see his sons thus following in his footsteps.

THE ANGELS HASTENING LOT.

By the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The angels hastened Lot."—GENESIS 19: 15.

Lot's Irresolution—What has been spent on us—Saltash Bridge—The Covenant Angel—Ministrations of Angels—Angel of Death and Judgment—Balaklava Charge—A Scotch Fisherman—Ezekiel and the Dry Bones—Satan's Net of Procrastination—Importance of Concord, etc.

ONE cannot help observing, before going to the point which will constitute our main drift this afternoon, how careful God is to save His own. Here is Lot: what business had he in Sodom? He was on unlawful ground, for unlawful reasons, about unlawful business. He had already been warned, for he had been carried captive. He had received notice that God was displeased with him, but still he did not heed the warning. He continued still to live in the midst of filthy Sodom; and though he was vexed with the conversation of the Sodomites he had no business to be there.

We can hardly pity him for suffering the vexation, since he brought it upon himself; and although the circumstances were such that had he been left to perish we might have said that it served him right, and a jury might have returned a verdict of felo de se against him, yet God would not let Lot perish. Lot must be saved, and yet it happened that the time had come for Sodom and Gomorrah to be destroyed. The sluices of God's justice were to be drawn up so that His vengeance should flow in fiery streams down upon the city; but not one single drop of the fire-shower must descend till Lot is safe. "I can not do any thing," is the voice of the angel girt with power—"I can not do any thing till thou be come thither."

When God shall come at last to destroy the world there will be seen that wondrous sight of THE FOUR ANGELS HOLDING THE FOUR WINDS in their hands, that the wind shall not blow on the earth or on the sea, or on any tree, till the servants of God are sealed in their foreheads. Even in those dire days when the pillars of the earth shall tremble, and the day of mercy shall be over, God will take care that His own people shall be preserved. Glory be to His name for this! Let His faithful love be reverently adored by us.

Yet this doctrine ought never to be preached without the mention of the fact that Lot, though saved out of Sodom,

WAS NOT SAVED WITHOUT GOING OUT.

He was not saved in Sodom, but from it. Neither did the angels take him up and bear him as on eagle's wings, and carry him out of the place; but he had to get out of Sodom;

HE HAD TO RUN FOR IT;

he had to turn his eye towards the mountain, and not dare to look back, and to speed on his way till he reached a place of safety. And this is ever to be noticed, because there are some who seem to fancy that God will save man as woodmen split timber—that, after all, God saves us not as men but as creatures devoid of will and responsibility. To save beings that are not responsible seems to me to be a very easy and simple matter; but to save men who are responsible and are free agents, and to accomplish His eternal purpose without the shrinking of a hair, and yet never to touch the free agency of men, but to treat man as man from the first to the last—this is the commingling of two things which look so much like two opposites, that I suppose we shall never, this side of heaven, understand how it is done. But done it is, to the praise of the glory of the mighty grace of God.

But now I shall come to our main subject, which is this: "The angels hastened Lot." We need, brethren, I think, a pressure put upon ourselves. Lot was a gracious man, with all his faults. It is very probable that he was about as good as the average of us. Lot needed a pressure put upon him. Well, many of us do; all of us do. We will speak upon the pressure put upon ourselves. Then, secondly, we will change the view of Lot, and regard him, as many a time we have done in sermons, and I think rightly, as the type of the escaping sinner. And then, we may be the angels, and I trust many of the angels of the churches are here; and we will speak upon the pressure that we are to put upon sinners in order that they may escape from destruction.

1. And first—and the first is essential to the second—we have to speak of the pressure to be put upon ourselves.

But are we slow, then? Lot is so slow that the angels have to hasten him, to press him, to constrain him. Are we slow, then? Redeemed with the blood of Jesus, and called into Christ's work by His Spirit, with a blessed inheritance reserved for us, are we slow, then? Are we slow? It is to be feared that we are. Wherein are we slow, then? I think slow in the same things in which Lot was slow—slow to obey commands, slow to complete a separation, slow to save others.

(1) Slow, I said, first, in keeping the commands of Christ; and I want to speak it very solemnly and very sorrowfully, referring as much to myself as to anybody here. Commands of Christ. Why, there are some brethren that do not even know those commands yet. They have never given an intelligent reading to the Scriptures. There are some—I am half afraid it is so—that do not want to know all of Christ's commands—who are a little afraid of knowing too much. I have known some that did not like to read certain portions of Scripture. They might have had to feel something to be a duty that they were prejudiced against. They might have had to believe something to be true that from their childhood they had been taught was not true.

Dear friend, if ever a text of Scripture quarrels with you, you had better make it up. You had better make it up by giving way, for that text will not. Is it not written, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one jot or one tittle of the law shall fail?" And if you have been afraid to look in the face one solitary text of God's Word, is it not due to your Master, due to your Redeemer's wounds, that you should go at once and sit at His feet, and say, "Lord, what is Thy will? Do teach me, for I desire in every thing to do Thy will."

I know some of our friends who say, if you point to a duty which they know to be one which they have neglected, that they want to have it "laid home" to them. I am constantly meeting with that sort of excuse—that it is not impressed upon them. It is the very essence of disobedience to talk in that way. Do you that are good parents allow your children to do so? For instance, when you tell your little girl, "Go, my child, into such a room," do you allow her to stand and tell you that she will not go till she fells it laid home to her? I think it is probable that you might "lay it home" to her in a sense that might not be altogether pleasant to her. And I do believe that some of God's children have provoked chastisement from God by the use of such expressions.

DO YOU THINK THAT A SOLDIER IN THE HOUR OF BATTLE

might reply to his chieftain, when ordered to march in a particular direction, "It has never been impressed upon me." Why, sirs, he shall be taken by drumhead court-martial and shot at once. He is not fit to be in the army at all. It is the very essence of malignity of disobedience that leads men to say, "That is my Lord's will, but I am not going to do it till my Lord does something more than let me know His will. He shall go out of His way, and do my will first, before I will do his will." Why, even when at last you come to the doing of His will, you have robbed the action of all its sweetness and all its charms. Oh! look to that, brethren and sisters! Do look to it! Is there any part of Christ's commands that you have been shirking—that you have been putting aside with this excuse or that?

I do believe that the blessed Spirit comes upon His servants sometimes with Divine monitions and suggests to them that such a field of labor would be worth their breaking up—that such and such a pious and gracious attempt would be useful to many souls. Have we, my brethren, never said, "I have enough to do?" Have we never said, "I do not feel strong enough for it?" Have we never, on some pretext or other, put aside the heavenly Word, and remained still idle while we might have reaped great harvests for the Lord? If we have, then on this point we want quickening. We need that the angels should come again, or some force such as angels use, that we may be hastened to perform the service of the Lord.

(2) Again, I fear we must confess that, like Lot, we have been slow to separate from sinners. Lot could not be saved from the devouring fire until he got out of Sodom. He must get out of it. How happy are those of God's servants who, like Abraham, have maintained the separated life for years without a break.

Oh! there are some of you who, when you get a little wealth, can not be trusted with it. If you prosper in business, straightway you are not seen at the prayer-meeting as you used to be. Oh! I know some in London. Some of our brethren around me have got some in their congregations. Poor bricklayers and carpenters, you know, that do not work very hard, of course they can come to the prayer-meeting of an evening; but those poor men that go to the city and deal with their thousands, and spend three or four hours a day in business, are so tired when they get home that they have their dinner, and are unable to go to prayer-meeting. That is growing in our churches daily.

One of the things which I almost dread for a Christian man is to see him get on in business. I am glad that he does, when I see him consecrate his wealth to the Master. I would that some of my brethren had millions poured into their coffers if they would use them well; but there are some who go down in the matter of spirituality, of love to Christ, just in proportion as the money pile goes up. These things ought not so to be. Oh! ye Lots, ye need to be quickened, and all of us need to be stirred up to seek a higher degree of holiness than that to which we have attained.

Brethren, if there is any thing in this world that can make any of us holier, let us go in for it; and if there be some brethren that do not put things exactly in our shape, but yet have any thing to communicate, let us have it. In the name of God there are enough influences abroad to drive us away from Christ, and drive us into the world. We need to have something—some loud voice, even if it sometime be a creaking and discordant voice—that should call us up and away into the clearer atmosphere of the mountain-life where men dwell nearer to God than they do in the steamy, smoky plains of doubt and unbelief and worldliness in which some men seem so glad to linger. Fain would I, if I could, act the part of angel, and press my brethren and myself to get away as far as ever we can from the low life, and get into the highest life that is possible to us this side heaven.

(3) But I am afraid we want to be hastened about another matter—namely, that of saving others. The way by which God saves men in this world is for the saved ones to be the means of bringing the unsaved ones to Christ. Brethren and sisters, I speak to you personally. Are you all clear in this matter as to doing all that lies in you for the conversion of all about you?

Lot had to be stirred up to get his wife and his children out of Sodom. Have we seen to our households? Are we clear there? Are all ministers clear there? Are all deacons of the church clear there? Are all mothers and all fathers who are present here quite sure that they have done all that they ought for their children? Have you prayed with every one of them separately, and distinctly, with your arms about their necks, not simply for them, but with them—with them apart? Have you done it again and again? I do not believe there is an instance under heaven in which this has been often done

WITHOUT THE CONVERSION OF THE CHILD.

I believe you may pray for children in a fashion, but if you never use the means by speaking to them privately and personally, your prayer may not succeed, for God does not promise us answers to prayers which come only from our lips, but are not backed up by our actions; but whenever this has been done I should like to see an instance in which it has failed, and I think it will be a long time before I shall hear of such a thing.

I do occasionally get little children coming to me to speak about their souls, and they ask me, "Please, sir, don't tell father." I said to one, "But I must tell your father; I see him every day nearly." She said, "Please, sir, don't." "Why?" I asked. "Oh, I will speak to him one day. Father is very good—very good indeed, but I could not speak to him." These things should not be, should they? We want waking up. Even those of us who are earnest about other people's children want to be made earnest about our own; and we that go about and preach, perhaps in the streets, want to be a little more earnest about our preaching at home. If there be any here to whom this would apply, may God apply it.

What makes us slow, brethren? Whereby are we hindered? Lot, I dare say, would have said it was the atmosphere of Sodom. I should not wonder; and the atmosphere of this present age, the atmosphere of some towns, the atmosphere of some villages, is enough to make a man go to sleep. I do not marvel that some men are not so earnest as others, because their surroundings are not propitious. Dear brothers and sisters, it won't do for us to lay any thing on the atmosphere. It belongs to ourselves. Perhaps Lot might have said that he was so slow because he had not any Christian associations. He had got away from Abraham. I think if Lot had stopped longer with Abraham he would have made a far finer character; but he got away, and got alone. Some brother may say, "Ah, if you lived where I live, where I do not see a brother minister for six or eight months together, you would value the Union meetings, I warrant. If I go out to speak to anybody, I can not meet with any one who would elevate me, but every one seems as though he would draw me down to a lower level. I know it is so, brother; but it won't do for Lot to lay it on being isolated. It won't do for you or me to put our slowness on any thing but ourselves. It is in ourselves after all that it lies.

There was no doubt an irresoluteness about Lot's disposition. He was a man of the type that wanted to do it, and meant to do it, and didn't do it; and it is very easy to get yourself into that condition. I remember a tombstone to the memory of a celebrated prince whose name has been rather notorious by reason of a book, the Prince of Monaco, a mighty prince of a little rock. On the tombstone is—"Here lies so-and-so, and so-and-so, and so-and-so"—any quantity of names—"Prince of Monaco. He was a man of excellent intentions." I copied the epitaph for use at home for some of my friends. "He was a man of excellent intentions"—not that he ever did any thing in all his life—no, but he was a man of excellent intentions; not that he ever did one mortal thing for which a soul ever blessed his memory, but he always intended to do it, and that is a good thing. Perhaps some of us might have been very useful if our intentions had only developed into facts, but, somehow, they have never done so. A certain irresoluteness of character springs up among us, so that we are for ever wishing, planning, scheming, and yet it comes to nothing.

Once more on this point. Whereby are we hastened? What, are there any angels to hasten us as they hastened Lot? Are there any forces under heaven that can stir us up to greater diligence, and get us out of Sodom into separateness with Christ? It seems to me that an angel is but a messenger, and we have a thousand messengers, all of them beckoning us to come nearer to God, and to serve Him with greater force. Every mercy that comes from God seems to me to be an angel that hastens us.

Look back upon your election, my brethren; look back upon your redemption; look back upon your effectual calling; remember how you have been pardoned, and how you have been sanctified. What manner of people ought you to be in all conversation and godliness? Every single one of these unspeakably precious blessings cries to you, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and serve your Lord, under the force of such love as this." Let us look at ourselves for one single moment, and then look at what has been spent upon us. They tell me they have spent

SO MANY THOUSANDS IN BUILDING THE SALTASH BRIDGE.

Very well, I can understand it. I can see something for the money. But here is a man of whom I am told that the everlasting purposes of God were concerned about him, that infinite wisdom bent its strength in the formation of him, and the production of such an one as he is; I am told that Jesus shed his blood for him, that to make him what he is the bloody sweat poured down the Saviour's face, and that the blessed Spirit had to come in and regenerate him with as much power put forth as was needed for the making of a world. Well, I look at him, and when I hear all this I am expecting something from him; I do not know what I do not expect; but, I tell you, I expect what I do not often see, and for all this, and this, and this, and this, such a little product; such ploughing, such sowing, such watering, and in such a field, and then such a result! Oh! dear brethren, do let us live in a way somewhat more drawn to the scale of infinite love, and eternal purpose, and atoning blood. It seems to come from the mountain to the mouse when it comes from God's eternal purpose down to our poor little shrivelled lives. It ought not so to be. We ought to be quickened by this.

The text tells us that the angels hastened Lot. I know one whose name is the Covenant Angel, and I would God He stood before us this afternoon; and as He will not do so in His flesh, let Him do so in spirit to you. He of the thorn crown—do you see Him yonder? He of the face battered with bruises, and stained with spittle; He of the scourged shoulder, and the pierced hand, and the open side—He looks upon you. Oh! can you look in His face and remember what He did for you and how He loves you, and not be hastened in your service of Him? I must confess this afternoon, if my Lord were here, my first impulse would be to ask Him to forget my life; I dare scarcely ask Him any more than to cover its good and its evil alike in the seas of His love, and help me to begin again. The Angel of the Covenant hastens you. Oh! my brethren, will you not be hastened by His touch? His pierced hand touches you now.

If you are a master, and have been employing a servant to do something for you, and he has done it in such a style that as you looked at him you have felt your very flesh creep, and you have wanted to go and do it yourself, and send him a-packing—I really think the angels, when they see some of us ministers, must feel inclined to say, "Get out of the pulpit, and let us come and do it."

Might not they say so to some of us who are slow; and who of us must not confess a measure of it? It would not be so very wonderful if an angel were to come and say, "Friend, what are you at? If I could only get into your skin and bone, and work for Jesus Christ as you have the privilege of doing, I should be delighted to throw all my energy into it."

Brethren, I believe the angels are hastening us at this very moment. It is not a dream of mine; it is being done. There are many things which have happened in the past about them that should all tend to quicken us. Did not they stand around the mercy seat, the golden cherubs looking always downwards, desiring to look into the secrets of the Covenant; and do they not chide us when they see us neglecting to search the Scripture, and giving our minds to trivial subjects instead of to the weighty matters of the law?

They came when Christ was born, and sang "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will towards men," and that midnight cry rebukes us that we do not sing and preach and teach more clearly of God's glory and God's mercy to the sons of men. They stood in the wilderness, they ministered to Christ after His combat with Satan, and they saw His separateness from all temptation, and methinks they must wonder at us that we should call ourselves His followers, and yet perhaps fall under each of the three temptations in which Christ overcame. They came into the garden, they helped Him when the bloody sweat was on Him, and they must look at us to-day and say, "Ye have not resisted unto blood, striving against sin." And do you hold back? Do you dread self-denials, and do you spare yourselves when your Master thus sweated, "great drops of blood falling to the ground?"

On the second head the subject will be this:

THE PRESSURE WHICH WE WHO ARE SAVED MUST NOW PUT UPON OTHERS.

I think these angels were model ministers. God had sent them to do exactly what they did do. They were sent to get Lot out of Sodom. He has sent us to fetch His chosen ones out of a guilty world. See what the angels did. They went down to Sodom. They were not non-resident clergy; though there was not a manse there, they went down, and when they got to Sodom they found out Lot, and got hold of Lot, and kept close to Lot. One fault of some who would be soul-winners is this: they do not get down to the people. Brothers and sisters, some of you are too respectable ever to win souls.

I SAW A MAN IN SCOTLAND THE OTHER DAY FISHING,

I think for salmon, but he was standing in big boots right in the river. That is the way to fish, right down among the fishes. We want to get down among the people just as these angels went down to Sodom to talk to Lot. And when they got close to Lot, and got his ear, they told him his danger. That is what we must do—tell men of their danger. Then they told him his remedy, how he must escape. We must be very particular about the way and plan of salvation; and here you will accompany me. But perhaps some brother will differ from me when I say that then they persuaded Lot to escape; they entreated and at last constrained him; while he lingered, the men laid hold of his hand, and upon the hands of his wife and his daughters.

It is not enough to warn sinners, you must bid them believe in the Lord Jesus Christ; it is not enough to tell them the way of salvation, you must command them that they believe in Jesus Christ, whom God has sent. But a brother says to me, "It is of no use doing so, they are dead." One said to me the other day, "It is as ridiculous to bid a dead sinner live as it is to shake a pocket handkerchief over a grave and expect the dead to rise." I looked him in the face and said, "My brother, I never expect you to do what God did not send you to do, and you were not sent, evidently, to address dead sinners because you think it ridiculous to do so; therefore, let those of us do it who are sent to."

When Ezekiel was going to preach to the dry bones somebody might have said, "Where are your congregation?" "Over there, in the valley." "Well, there are plenty of them, but a very dry wind has gone across the plain, and taken all the moisture from the bones, and the hot sun has scorched them and turned them white as pipe-clay. Can these dry bones live?" "Yes," says Ezekiel, "they can." "Have they got any innate force in themselves to receive your message?" "No, I know they have not; they are as dead as can be." "What are you going to do?" "Going to tell them to live." "That is ridiculous," says the other, "to tell dry bones to live."

"What am I to do?" says Ezekiel. "Oh! you may warn them." That is not ridiculous, I suppose—to warn dead bones. "You may teach them." "Why," says Ezekiel, "it does look ridiculous to you because you have not got any faith; but I have, and God has sent me to say, Thus saith the Lord, 'Let these dry bones live.'" "Ah, you are not sound, Ezekiel; there are not sixteen ounces to the pound in you." "Well," says Ezekiel, "Come along. Thus saith the Lord, 'Ye dry bones live.'" Ah, what is that? They are beginning to stir. You never saw that under the sound minister. And now they begin to stir; presently they come together, bone to his bone; presently the flesh comes upon them, and the same voice that commanded bones now commands the winds, for faith lays hold on God Himself, and commands the blessed Spirit, for Ezekiel says, "Come from the four winds, oh! breathe, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live." And it comes at Ezekiel's commands, and there are the living men, and the valley is filled with them.

It is Satan's business, as far as ever he can, to make sinners delay. I see the old fisherman; look at his nets; they are all around his infernal den. But what is that big net there that looks as if it could take the whole Atlantic in at a sweep? It has done awful work. See how he has mended it up. That big net is called Procrastination. He does not like unbelievers to say they won't repent; for when they come honestly to that, there is something in them; but he likes them to say, "Well, we will by-and-by." "I go, sir, and went not"—that is the devil's best disciple. He knows he is safe enough there; and what we have to do nowadays is not merely to preach Jesus Christ to make people understand the Gospel—for at the present day the doctrine of "Believe and live" I hope is pretty commonly understood; but what is wanted is that blessed heave that shall just shove them over the border ground; that argument, that strong pleading, that mighty persuasion which, through the efficacy of the Holy Spirit, shall bring them to decision now and on the spot. They want a deal of hastening.

Suppose those two angels that had to get Lot out of Sodom had differed in opinion; suppose one of them said, "The proper way to lead him out of Sodom is to go in front of him and let him come after us;" and the other had said, "I do not think so; the proper way is to go behind him and drive him on in front;" suppose they had gone to a very great argument about it—it is a very grave point, which shall have the precedence, men or angels; suppose they had taken up all the morning having that out, where would poor Lot have been? I have heard a good deal about a discussion we are likely to have, how much good has been done by certain brethren and how much has not been done. Never mind how much they have done or have not done; let us go and do more; let us work for Christ with all our might, and then for all these questions that may be brought up we will appoint a meeting a little after the Day of Judgment and have it out; but just now Lot has to be got out of Sodom, and let us do it somehow in the name of the blessed God.

I shall say no more but this: If at this very moment the heavens were split with thunder, and the Last Day were come, what sort of an account could you give in now? You believe in Christ, you say; you say you have been born again, you are a Church member—what have you done for Jesus? Take your book now and sit down quickly and make out your account; give account of your stewardship, for the time cometh when you must be no more steward. Will you make out that account now? for a man that is afraid to make his account out at any time must surely be doing bad in business. If a man is afraid of his books, it is generally because his books are afraid of him. Oh! I pray you take stock this afternoon, and, when you have done it, may God grant that that process may hasten you, so that you may be able to go forth and hasten sinners to lay hold on eternal life. May God bless every one of you, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

at Holy Trinity, New York.

DR. MACKAY'S SPEECH.

PREFACING the real discussion of his subject—"The Translation of the Saints"—by a few quickly-spoken words of the pleasure and encouragement he felt to see how widely represented the Christians of all denominations were in the call for the Conference, Dr. Mackay said :

We are here not to move a finger for denominational advancement in one way or another, or to bring a man from one denomination ; but we would cross the Atlantic to bring a man nearer to Christ : hence it cheers our heart to see here represented among the churches one Lutheran, one Dutch Reformed, one Reformed, six Methodist, ten Congregationalist, fifteen Episcopalian, ten undenominational, twenty-seven Baptist, and forty-three Presbyterian. On this basis, let me say concerning the brethren who do not agree with us that there should not be the slightest bitterness among Christians. I believe as good Christians as I am may differ form me on this point of belief, since it is not a question of Christianity at all. Let us pursue the study with that grace and likeness to Christ that becomes humble students of the Word.

The doctor then read with expression and emphasis the fiftieth Psalm, dwelling on the picture there presented of a "silent God," and remarking that there was no more awful thought than that of a silent God and a sinning world. The speaker said that he found among Christians a disinclination to inquire into or study mysteries, which was, in fact, disliking to study what God had made known to mankind—"the mystery of His will" (Ephesians 1 : 6, 7). It has come to this, said he, that the last book of the New Testament, called the "Apocalypse," which is the "unveiling and revealing," instead of being the revelation is the mystification of Christendom. It used to be a mystification to me. I remember the first time I ever thought of the book. When I was a little boy in Scotland we were compelled by our mothers to read it, but I remember when I was evangelizing in Ireland in the midst of much opposition, one day I was walking out and I turned to my pocket Testament at Revelations and read along to these words : "Blessed is he that readeth." There was a new light come to me, and I said : "Blessed Lord, this book is Thine, and it says it is the Revelation of Jesus Christ, and You have said, 'Blessed is he that readeth.' Thank God, you do not say, 'Blessed is he that understandeth.'" There is not a word about understanding there, and I said, "Now, Lord, if I have never really read it before, here goes," and I got down. Now this chapter reading, such as reading a chapter in the morning, and a chapter at night, etc., is a great snare to Bible readers. We don't read part of a letter from an absent friend, but the whole of it at once. So I began with the first chapter of this Lord's "letter," and finished the book of Revelations, and I arose from it with such an idea of my Lord as I never had before. I didn't understand any more about the book, but I found that whatever I read about, Christ was the centre. In discussing our position here, scoffers say : "You say the Lord is coming ; where is the promise of it?" It is a matter of heart more than of head. It is not so much a clear view of these points as of a heart waiting for the return of the blessed Lord.

A paper was then read on

THE KINGDOM AND THE CHURCH.

By Professor H. Lummis, Methodist, Monson, Mass.

THERE are, doubtless, words in the Sacred Scriptures that are very imperfectly understood, some that are not understood at all. The meaning given in our version, for example, may be the best that is known, and yet no careful student of the Bible can safely accept these temporary substitutes as the strict equivalents of the original words. The words whch name the theme now presented are not of ths obscure class. They are used so often and in so many different connections that it is not a little surprising to find such divergences of opinion as to their real meaning. And yet no more so perhaps than in a score of kindred cases where differences depend less on the data than on the point of observation, and on the wishes that fashion results. I do not believe that differing views are both right where they antagonize, but I think I do see why differences and antagonisms exist, and also that they have a ground less in truth itself than in circumstances. If the Spirit of truth direct us, there is no good reason why we should not arrive at substantial agreement.

A KINGDOM OF THIS WORLD.

If there were but a single Old Testament prophecy of this kingdom, one made definite by passing from its picture form in which it was at first given to the great King of Babylon, and afterward to that prince among the seers, Daniel, of the Children of the Captivity, it would establish on a foundation not to be shaken, the doctrine of the kingdom—a kingdom in this world, a kingdom embracing the globe and to be possessed by the saints. A king, a realm, a multitude of subjects, are requisite to a kingdom in the strict sense. I give the outline.

Nebuchadnezzar dreams a dream. It troubles him. He wishes to know its signification, but before he can state it to his magicians and astrologers and sorcerers and to the Chaldeans, it escapes his memory. He requires these men to tell the dream and its interpretation. With good reason they reply to this strange demand, that the requirement is beyond human power. In anger the monarch gives orders that all the wise men of the kingdom be slain. As one of them, Daniel is threatened by the decree. He seeks the king and asks time, giving assurance that both dream and interpretation will be given. God reveals the dream to the prophet, and he, acknowledging the Most High as the source of his wisdom, states before the king the dream and its signification. In the dream is seen a great image of gold and silver and copper and iron and clay. A stone cut out of a mountain without hands smites the image upon the feet. The shock pulverizes the image, and the dust is carried away by the wind, like chaff blown from the summer threshing-floor. The stone becomes a mountain and fills the earth.

In telling the meaning of the dream Daniel declares that the different parts of the image represent successive kingdoms, the four metals and the clay indicating four great empires, the iron mingled with the clay signifying the strength, and at the same time the weakness, of the last of the four sovereignties. Daniel closes his interpretation with these remarkable words : "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never (to eternity shall not) be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left (transferred) to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume (grind up and make an end of) all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the copper, the clay, the silver, and the gold ; the great God hath made known what shall come to pass hereafter, and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure," or trustworthy, rendered "faithful" in Dan. 6 : 4. The prophet declares to the king that God has made known to him (not that something shall come to pass, but) what shall come to pass.

A parallel to this dream picture and its simple prophetic meaning is given us in the first book of the Bible. Pharaoh dreams of seven fat and of seven very lean kine that come up out of the great river of Egypt. The lean kine, after devouring the fat kine, are still as lean as before. In his perplexity Pharaoh summons Joseph, the Jewish captive, who at once interprets the dream. The seven fat kine mean seven years of great plenty. The seven lean kine, seven following years of very grievous famine, which shall exhaust the abundance of the years of plenty, and leave the people greatly straitened by want. One advantage is found here. The history in which the prophecy is fulfilled is recorded, and no completer evidence could be given that the prophetic meaning given to the dream was in the strictest and most literal sense of the words realized. Any intelligent grammar-school boy could understand Joseph's interpretation, and could understand that the succeeding history records the fulfilment of what Joseph foretold, what Pharaoh understood ; and therefore appointed Joseph to superintend the storing of the abundance of the years of plenty to provide for the coming famine.

Just so the interpretation given by Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar. It avails not to say the passage occurs in a confessedly obscure and difficult book—this part of the book is no more obscure than the following chapter, which tells of the image of gold set up on the plain of Dura, and of the three Hebrew children thrown into the fiery furnace. Nebuchadnezzar's dream, like that of Pharaoh, was a picture prophecy, and without a key could not be understood, could not be explained. The God of heaven gives the dream and the key to its meaning to Daniel, and Daniel gives them to the king. If the king understood what kingdom meant when applied to his own empire and sovereignty, he understood what it meant when applied to the kingdom that the God of heaven should set up. To maintain that kingdom, as used in the latter case, meant an entirely different thing, is worthy the charge of tergiversation.

The implication in the interpretation, and this has been generally admitted by commentators, is that these great empires represent universal world empires, each successive one merging its predecessor in its own sovereignty.

With even greater force the explanation of Daniel implies the forcible reduction of all other political power to zero, and the occupation of absolutely universal world dominion. There is to be—it has not yet come—breaking with a rod of iron—shivering to pieces as a potter's vessel is shivered. The clang of the stone striking the feet of the huge image has not yet been heard ; the crumbling of dynasties and the sweeping away of their débris, as with the breath of a tempest has not yet been seen. But it approacheth ! When the history, whether it be seen but not written, or seen and then written, shall transpire, there will not be need of 1550 years to know whether the crushing stroke from the catapult missile has smitten temporal thrones out of existence. He who witnesses the downward sweep of that stone cut out of the mountain will hear the last cry of human woe under human oppression before its shivering shock takes place, and see every shackle that human greed has forged and locked on the limbs of cringing slaves shattered forever under the earthquake convulsion of that approaching hour. Thereafter, under the sway of the Son of God, will the gates of commerce be forced by the enginery of war to thrust into a resisting nation's throat and against a monarch's loud protest a drug that dwarfs and poisons the body and degrades the soul? Will liquor-leagues control legislators and bribe judges, after a mightier bolt than Vulcan ever forged or Jove ever brandished shall have been hurled? Reason answers no ; and prophecy, from the shores of the Euphrates, thunders down along the centuries, over crumbling dynasties and regal dust, an authoritative no. Christ's kingdom established, iniquity cannot triumph !

Objections have been filed against this view of the kingdom. Some are entitled to consideration more from the position and real ability of those who offer them, than for any Bible support that has ever been found or even offered for them.

HAS CHRIST'S KINGDOM COME?

It is maintained by some that Christ's kingdom has come, that it is already established. If this be true, was John the Baptist mistaken when he declared to the thronging multitudes from Judea and Jerusalem and the region around about Jordan, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand"? Was Joseph, of Arimathea wrong in waiting for the Kingdom of God? He was a good man, and doubtless shared in the common earnest looking for and expecting of the Kingdom. Had no apostle, had no word from the Son of man, enlightened his darkness? Was Paul wrong when he declared, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption"? He spoke as if the Kingdom of God was immutable, and as if the mortal and perishable could not enter into it.

CONTRASTS BETWEEN CHURCH AND KINGDOM.

To see the Kingdom of God is spoken of as a privilege in the Gospel. But an important prerequisite to the privilege is named by Christ himself. "Except a man be born from above he cannot see the Kingdom of God" (John 3). But Annanias and Sapphira found their way into the early Christian Church, as we have every reason to believe, without spiritual regeneration. Not born from above, they saw the church. To one who for the first time carefully examines, in a good concordance, the contrasts and the correspondence between the Church and Kingdom, I venture to predict some feeling of surprise, and a conviction that these words are further separated therethan in ordinary parlance.

The Kingdom a unit; the Church an aggregate of churches; the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom of Christ, is never once used in the plural. Wherever Kingdoms is found reference is made to the Kingdoms of this World, always recognized as transient. The churches is a common New Testament expression. Luke writes: "Then had the churches rest" (Acts 9 : 31). Paul sends thanks to all the churches of the Gentiles (Rom. 16 : 4), and writes to the brethren at Rome, "The churches of Christ salute you" (Rom. 16 : 16), showing that churches were local.

The Kingdom embraces the whole earth, and hence so far as the world or man is concerned, is universal. Common usage here accords with Scripture usage. We are wont to say: The Episcopal Church, the Lutheran Church, the Presbyterian Church, the Reformed Church, the Greek Church, the Catholic Church; and I suppose we properly say Congregational Churches, and Baptist Churches, and Unitarian Churches. But does any one venture to speak of the Methodist Kingdom, or the Lutheran Kingdom? Do we ever say Kingdoms of Christ, Kingdoms of God? Many of the best thinkers and profoundest scholars of the age incline to the position that the radical meaning of ekktasia limits it to a single thing, and that the comprehensive sense is a figurative one.

Dr. Christian Frederic Kling, in his commentary on Corinthians, which is a part of Lange's great work, gives us what is requisite to constitute a true church thus: 1. "An assemblage before God and for God." 2. "It consists of those who are consecrated to God in Jesus Christ." 3. "It is thus consecrated through the mighty creative will of God." 4. "Its members are such as call upon the name of Jesus Christ." "These things may exist in connection with many glaring faults in true professing believers, and with many false professions (articles?) of faith, which yet do not necessarily vitiate the claim to be called a true Church of God." Many among the masses escape some at least of the errors of clerical theorizers. Few, perhaps, of the common people identify the Church and the Kingdom. They speak of their becoming united with the Church as a thing of the past, but they talk about their entrance into the Kingdom as a thing of the future.

I recall in my ministry an excellent English brother, a man whose good sense and fluent, admirable use of quaint Anglo-Saxon always interested and often amazed me. Many a time have I been astonished at his marvellous combinations of strong expressive monosyllables, from ten to twenty in number, with scarcely a dissyllable among them, perhaps not a single one. He used to say: "I mean by the grace of God to find a home in the Kingdom." He was right. To him it is a thing of the future. I sincerely trust that he will at least realize his aim and join the ransomed host in the Kingdom of our God. But he had been in the Church forty years.

The Kingdom is everlasting, the Church temporary. If, as has been maintained and we think proved, the Kingdom is an end, as such it is to be everlasting. On the other hand, the Church, as means to an end, cannot be supposed to continue when it has accomplished its design. Gabriel declared to Mary in reference to her Son: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David: and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of His Kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1 : 32, 33). Every Christian believer admits that the first part of the prediction is literally true. He is great. He has been, and is now throughout Christendom, called the Son of the Highest by all who accept the testimony of the Scriptures as trustworthy. It is conceded, also, that of His kingdom in the strictest and most literal sense there shall be no end. Is it legitimate to pare the prophecy all around, and insist that the part thus taken off is strictly literal, and then demand that the very heart of the prediction be made figurative, or rather mystical, or, if figurative, in a figure refusing analysis and leaving one utterly at loss for its real meaning? Not quite! Language has rights that intelligent men are bound to respect.

The proof that the Kingdom is contrasted with the Church rather than identified with it is a great step toward the removal of the claim that the Kingdom is already set up in the world. If it is in the world and is not in the Church, what is it? Where is it? A fair answer to these questions will show that if the Kingdom be in the world at all, it must be subjectively rather than objectively—in a figurative rather than in a literal sense. A few quotations may help us. "For the Kingdom of God is not food and drink, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. 14 : 17), is definitely stated by St. Paul. None will incline to deny that righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost exist on earth. Will any maintain that this is the Kingdom into which the Lord Jesus will bid His saints enter after the judgment? Or that this is the Kingdom which Joseph of Arimathea waited for? or that this is the throne of David?

Men do not enter into righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. These are within them. Of this subjective Kingdom, or fitness of spirit for the objective Kingdom, Christ could probably say the Kingdom of God is within you, or as the margin suggests, is among you (Luke 17 : 21).

LITERAL MEANING OF KINGDOM AND CHURCH.

Without doubt, the Kingdom of God and the Church are in a few cases used figuratively, but even then one is never put for the other. And these figurative uses, fewer than in most words employed as many times, cannot militate against those cases which treat unmistakably of an objective kingdom in space, and time, and on the earth.

Another claim as to the meaning of the Kingdom, is held by a considerable class. These deny that the Kingdom is the Church, or that it is or will be on the earth. They hold that it is heaven itself, and that the righteous pass into it at death. There are fewer difficulties in this than in the church-kingdom hypothesis. And yet it has insuperable difficulties. It completely reverses the terms of that prayer which is upon more lips every day than all other prayers together: "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven" (Matt. 6 : 10). These theorists would need to remodel the prayer thus: "Let us go into Thy kingdom in heaven, and there do Thy will as the angels do." If this is really the meaning of this paragraph, which has been repeated by thousands ever since the early days of the Christian Church, and by tens of millions in later times, we have not yet learned the alphabet of Scripture truth, for who, soberly and thoughtfully, ever inferred that this was what Christ designed by this sentence? "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Alone it constitutes a sublime prayer. Has it been answered? If so, it need not be our prayer longer. In the mind of the great Christian church it is not yet answered. Some sanguine souls are sure that the present economy of Christian work will soon secure that "consummation devoutly to be wished."

About 300,000,000 of the earth's 1,350,000,000 are nominally Christians. But nominal Christianity is not the genuine Christianity. A generous estimate of the number of actual Christians would not go beyond 30,000,000. And more than eighteen centuries have been spent in reaching this. At such a rate through how many scores of centuries is the slow work to drag on? How long! Lord, how long! The missionary spirit of earnest men and women is noble. God be thanked for it. God bless it. But alas! this Christ-like purpose of theirs seems like a skiff urged up mighty rapids and scarcely stemming the torrent. I heard Dr. Macaulay say in Boston, a few years ago, that not three per cent of the working-men of London attended any church regularly on the Lord's day. It is better than that in New York; but what multitudes never enter a church even here, and what is more to be deplored, what multitudes are as destitute of religious teaching as if they were in Central Africa!

And while a few noble spirits are toiling and praying for the success of mission work, what profound apathy possesses the Church as a whole in regard to this vast enterprise. I said just now that a generous estimate of the actual Christians in the world would not be above 30,000,000. What do these do on this line, counting to their credit all that is done fitfully and without method, and without high religious motive among the other 290,000,000 of merely nominal Christians.

Some have deprecated the proclamation of the imminent coming of the Son of man in His kingdom as paralyzing missionary effort. Would it enervate or stimulate the servant who had heard and was heeding the words of his master, "Occupy till I come," to learn that the master was already on his return to take account with him? The danger lies always in the other direction. When men say and believe that the Lord delayeth His coming as Christ shows in one of His parables, why begin to eat and drink with the drunken, and to neglect every duty? Some have been embarrassed to reconcile the text, "My Kingdom is not of this world," with the doctrine that Christ's Kingdom is to be in this world. There is no conflict between them. The Church of Christ is not of the world, but it is in the world. And there is not a hint that the Church will ever be transferred elsewhere. Christ, in that most wonderful prayer (John 17), says, as he prays for His disciples, "They are not of this world, even as I am not of this world." Yet they and Christ were in this world. The declaration, "If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him," does not make it criminal to admire and love the globe as the handiwork of God. You and I may as legitimately delight in the wonders of hill and vale, of forest and plain, of spring and rivulet, as did the Psalmist in the splendors of the firmament. Christ's Kingdom is not to be of the world which we may not love, but is to be on this world which He himself made and declared very good.

Another class of texts has occasioned trouble in the minds of some. John the Baptist and Jesus declared, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." "How," it is asked with some force certainly, "could the kingdom be said to be at hand then, if eighteen hundred years have gone, and it is still not here?" If the word rendered is at hand had been rendered "draweth near," as it is in Luke 21 : 8, and some dozen other passages, it would have relieved the apparent difficulty somewhat. If it had been rendered "approacheth," that is "approaching," as in Luke 12 : 33, Hebrews 10 : 25, the difficulty would have hardly appeared at all. Since the same expression is used of events then expected, which have not yet transpired, it shows that the word may have a wider scope than we naturally give to the first of these translations, Paul says in speaking to the church at Rome, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." If Paul used the word understandingly, either in reference to the disappearance of heathenism or of the resurrection day, it is certain that "is at hand" was eighteen hundred years distant.

James uses the definite expression, the coming of the Lord is at hand, or, as our translators have rendered it, here draweth nigh. The meaning of the original word is the same in both places. If it be said that James must have meant "death is at hand," a just reply is: "No such sense of the phrase has ever been established, nor ever can be." It is in violation of every principle of interpretation to suppose that James could mean "death" by the coming of the Lord.

We ought, indeed, to recollect that we are little skilled in celestial arithmetic. The term which applied to terrestrial distances may seem a great measure, when applied to stellar distances may appear very small. A year, which is to many a child a long period, and is long enough for our earth to journey 578,000,000 miles, is relatively to the vast reach of centuries that measures the period of some of the sextuple stars like one vibration of a pendulum to a lifetime.

The true attitude of the Church must be one of expectancy of the coming Kingdom. In the best days of her history such has been her attitude. The fear of weakening feeble hands by preaching the Kingdom of Heaven is drawing near, is a needless if not a foolish fear. "Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when He cometh shall find watching" (Matt. 24 : 46). Watching for what? For the Master's return. Almost two thousand years must have made some difference in the proximity of the Kingdom. If James could urge as a motive to diligence and an incentive to watchfulness, "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh," how much more we! If Paul was right in preaching, "the night is far spent, the day is at hand," surely the night is farther spent, the day is nearer. Is it unwarrantable to watch eagerly for the first gray of the morning, the spring of the day? In nature God gives us some indications of coming spring besides the calendar, and some note of approaching day besides the clock that has told the passing hours. Disappearing stars and appearing stars tell that the earth still rolls on, and unless they make an unwonted halt the day must soon burst in the East. Are we looking thither? There are heralds upon the mountain-tops; they will see the dawn before those who abide in the valleys. Watchman, what of the night? Let not the unbelief — intense as that that shadowed the world on the eve of the deluge, when the current jest about the old fool that had been waiting for a flood one hundred years, and yet it had never come, passed from lip to lip to evoke a scornful laugh, as it finds expression now—dishearten you. Watch till the light streams up, and shout "the morning cometh."

THE CROSS.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 8th.—Luke 23 : 33-49.
Golden Text, Gal. 6 : 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE are on holy ground in our lesson for to-day. Let us put off the shoes from off our feet, and take our stand by those who were immediately around Him, as we behold the Son of God upon the cross for us. "And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified Him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left." And this was the Son of God. He had counted the cost, and steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem (Luke 10 : 51). "I gave my back to the smiters, and My cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not My face from shame and spitting. . . . Therefore have I set My face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed" (Isa. 50 : 6, 7). "Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down and I have power to take it again" (John 10 : 17, 18).

So spake our beloved Lord. He knew what He was doing; He had seen beforehand the awful cloud of a world's sin as it neared Him. When in Gethsemane the dread reality had wrung tears of blood from every pore. Still He did not draw back, and the words were fulfilled (Isa. 53 : 4–6, literal translation), "Surely He hath borne our sicknesses and carried our pains: yet we did esteem Him smitten, stricken of God, and afflicted. But He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and by His stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all."

In all the mighty universe could there be found no other righteous offering for sin? Had a mere man died for others' sin, God would have been unjust to permit such a transaction. But "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. 5 : 19). He that was sinned against became the willing and the perfect Sin-bearer. Oh, how comes it to pass that every man's heart is not conquered by this nobility—this majesty of love!

On Him, as on the head of the goat on the great day of atonement, our sin was laid. "And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited" (Lev. 16 : 21, 22). He made Himself answerable for all our sins, and the consequences of our sins, and made provision for the destruction in full and in detail of all the works of the devil (1 John 3 : 8; Heb. 1 : 14).

And there between two thieves, numbered with the transgressors, His first word upon the cross is this, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." It was the right of the redemption price He was then paying, and the purchase of the life-blood which was then ebbing out, that sinners should obtain pardon. And so eager was thy Lord, reader, to set thee free from sin, that He claimed thy pardon before the last dregs of His cup of agony were drunk, and before the breath which claimed it had been fully spent. How comes it, then, that they who stand in such unspeakable need of a pardon obtained so hardly should esteem it as hardly worth the while to think about seriously, and put off until the last moment the consideration of a blood-bought salvation?

The chief priests were there, mocking Him and saying, "He saved others; Himself He cannot save" (Matt. 27 : 42), and some cried, "Save Thyself and us" (Luke 23 : 39). Suppose He had saved Himself, what would have become of our cause? But neither the fearful mockery of those for whom He died, nor yet the incomprehensible suffering to Him who "knew no sin" of resting under sin's curse, moved Him from His purpose. One of the very malefactors who were crucified with Him, railed on Him, thinking, perhaps, that it was the only religious act of which he, as a Jew, was capable.

"But the other thief, answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss." What is this? A thief witnessing for the Christ that Peter had denied, and whom all the apostles had forsaken and had fled from? Had it come to this? Was there not one cleansed leper of all the many that had received healing at His hands who could speak a word for Him now? Not one of the many blind and sick and lame whom He had cured that would take up His cause? Was the guilty thief the only one who was found in earth or heaven at such a moment to bear witness, "This man hath done nothing amiss?"

And He who came to be the friend of sinners found a friend in this sinner in His hour of anguish, and there, upon the cross, He received and heard the prayer, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." And He answered it, and said, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise." Our blessed Lord was not so disheartened with the discouragement of His disciples as to be unwilling to add to their number, and it must have been a joy to His breaking heart to win one soul in His dying hours.

And what a description of His suffering at this moment have we in Ps. 22 : 14, 15, "I am poured out like water‘ all my bones are out of joint: my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. My strength is dried up like a potsherd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws." He bore our sins and our sicknesses, and became for the time the embodiment of all the work of the enemy of souls. And when at the sixth hour there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour, it seems as though the heaviest weight of this mighty burden came upon Him, for the light also of His Father's face was hidden, and He cried, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Matt. 27 : 46).

The Man of sorrows had always hitherto experienced one joy, the light of His Father's countenance. Now for our sakes it was withdrawn. We may be called to participate in His sufferings in many other ways, but never in this one. The Man of sorrows alone bore a sorrow which had no counterpoise. But even under such a weight He could think of others. "There stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. When Jesus therefore saw His mother, and the disciple standing by, whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son! Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother!" (John 19 : 25, 27). Thus in all the intensity of His agony He could think of others. Oh, brethren, do we resemble Him?

"After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst" (John 19 : 28). The vinegar they gave Him did not slake His thirst. "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied" (Isa. 53 : 11). His satisfaction, beloved reader, is in you and in me. What has the travail of His soul accomplished for us and in us which can bring Him satisfaction? One other word He spoke, but oh, how important (John 19 : 30)!—"It is finished." "I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do," He had said in His sacrificial prayer (John 17 : 4). He had completed the work of our redemption. All the malice of the devil and all his might was met upon his own ground, that of death, and "through death He destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. 2 : 14). Reader, if all is finished that was needful for thy salvation, what hinders thee from being saved? The death of the Son of God is His witness that He was provided a ransom for thee; what hast thou done with this provision? Shall the Lord of glory suffer all this for thee in vain? Finally the dying Saviour recovered the light of His Father's countenance. It was then no more "My God," but "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit: and having said thus, He gave up the ghost." Besides those who stood around His cross on that day were many of His acquaintances, but they stood afar off. Oh, reader, where do you stand with regard to a crucified Saviour? Can you say with our golden text, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world?"

THE VOYAGE OF THE SHIP EGLANTINE.

—WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

IT was a cold, dreary morning, with a drizzling rain falling fast and thick on land and sea. A group of sailors stood at the corner of one of the narrow streets leading up from the docks to the town—men of the ordinary sailor type, rough and easy and good-humored. But the good-humored element was not so conspicuous as usual; most of them looked excited, some angry.

A handsome carriage, drawn by a couple of bays, came down the street, and they stood aside as it passed, its wheels splashing mud and water over them.

"There he goes!" said one of the men; "look at him sitting in his grand carriage, dashing the dirt over us! A great deal he cares about rotten timber, so long as he gets his money. I should like to send you out in the Eglantine, Richard Hilliard! I wonder how you'd feel?"

"Look you here, Ned Cairns," said another, "I haven't got much faith in your young Hilliard—like father, like son."

"Nothing of the sort. Mr. Christian Hilliard is a good man, and one who keeps his word. I'll trust him, if you won't," replied Cairns; "I knew him when he was a boy, and a better-hearted youngster never breathed."

The occupant of the carriage, ignorant of the remarks, though not unobservant of the unfriendly glances of the men, alighted at his office door. Captain Thorpe stood inside the doorway chaffing the clerks. As Mr. Hilliard came in he stood on one side, and exchanging the ordinary greeting, followed him into his private room.

"I am glad you have been able to come, Mr. Hilliard," he said, as that gentleman motioned him to a seat; "writing isn't a satisfactory way of settling business, especially of this sort."

"What sort?" demanded Mr. Hilliard sharply.

"About the Eglantine," replied Captain Thorpe, opening his eyes at the shipowner's tone; "the men are in open rebellion. Have you got Grant's letter handy?"

"Did you receive my letter this morning?"

"Yes."

"I think I told you in it that Grant's letter merely contained a list of the necessary repairs."

Captain Thorpe shook his head.

"I told the men so, sir, but they won't take my unsupported word. Perhaps if you were to speak to them—"

It was only a suggestion thrown out as a feeler, but Mr. Hilliard ignored it.

"The men are a set of fools!" he said angrily; "don't give way to them."

"They are not all fools. Cairns is a sensible man, and a trustworthy seaman."

"If they are not fools, they are probably worse. You must make them go; the ship is ready to sail, and sail she shall."

Captain Thorpe's anger rose.

"I can not force them to go, Mr. Hilliard."

"Indeed!" was the significant reply.

"I suppose such things have been done," went on the captain; "but I for one should not care to put out to sea with a forced crew. If they come willingly, well and good; if not, get another crew?"

"Where?" asked Mr Hilliard sarcastically.

"Ah, that's the difficulty; sailors fight shy of a ship with a bad name."

"I should like to know who gave the Eglantine a bad name."

"Well, Mr. Hilliard, she is very old, and some of the men who were with her on her last voyage remember in what a dilapidated condition she was, and how rotten some of the timbers were."

"What has that got to do with her now? hasn't she been well repaired?"

Captain Thorpe made no reply, and at that moment the door opened, and Christian Hilliard came in. Young and handsome, with the unmistakable impress of his upright, honorable nature on his face, he formed a striking contrast to his father and the weather-beaten captain.

"You are engaged, sir?" he said, glancing at his father's preoccupied face.

"No, I am not," was the quick reply. "Captain Thorpe, will you kindly obey my instructions to the letter. I have nothing more to say about it."

"I will come and tell you the result," said the captain, rising reluctantly. "I am afraid it will be different from what you expect, sir."

"Do your part, and if that is not sufficient, I will do mine," said the shipowner coldly.

"Well, Christian."

"That's Captain Thorpe, isn't it?" said his son, gazing out of the window after the departing captain. "Has he been about that row?"

"What row?" asked Mr. Hilliard, wondering what he knew about it.

"Among the crew of the Eglantine. They say the ship isn't seaworthy, and he gave his father an account of his interview on the previous night—gave it in a half-laughing, half-serious way, which was little guide to his real feeling.

Mr. Hilliard listened in silence. A slight frown crossed his face as his son spoke of his promise to show Grant's letter to the men, and Christian's quick eye caught it.

"You will have no objection, sir, will you?" he asked, pausing in some surprise.

"Certainly! I should not think of showing it to them. Things have come to a pretty pass if I m always to show written proof of the truth of my word. You should not have promised."

Christian whistled: it was a habit of his when he was perplexed or annoyed.

"That's awkward," he said at last, seating himself on the table. "Where is the letter?"

"At home," said Mr. Hilliard, off his guard. The next moment he would have given much to recall the words.

"Look here, sir; it won't compromise your dignity in the least if I take the letter and just read it to the men. You can not possibly object to my reading it to them on my own responsibility; your name shall not be brought into the affair at all."

"I do object most strongly, Christian; the letter is in my possession, and the fact of your reading it to them proves that I must have given it to you, therefore I am bound to be brought in."

"Well, sir, there is but one way out of the difficulty that I can see," said Christian suddenly, after a short silence; "I must read the letter myself, and then repeat the contents to the men. I think they will take my word for its correctness."

"Why should they take your word when they refuse to take Thorpe's?"

"Because, as I learned in the days of old, familiarity breeds contempt," was the good-humored rejoinder. "They know Thorpe; they don't know me personally—at least not much. It's the way of the world. I promised to see the men to-day. What time are you going home?"

"I can not stay long; my leg is painful to-day. I shall return before noon."

"That will suit me well. I'll come with you, see the letter, and ride back in the evening."

"You can come with me if you like, but as to seeing the letter, that's another thing."

The last words Christian did not hear: catching sight of a friend passing he dashed out in pursuit, heedless of the fast-falling rain, and in his haste nearly tumbled over Captain Thorpe.

"Hullo!" he cried, stopping short; "I'm coming to pay you a visit this evening, Captain Thorpe. I'm going to speechify to your men."

"What about, Mr. Christian?"

"I shall take the Eglantine for a subject, and discourse about rigging, and spars, and planks, and masts," was the laughing reply. "I'm going to hunt up a nautical dictionary, and make sure of my sea terms."

"I wonder what he has to say to the men?" thought the captain, as he walked on. "Mr. Hilliard will give him Grant's letter to read to them, I suppose."

The rain was still falling fast when Christian returned to the office. The carriage was waiting at the door, but Mr. Hilliard was engaged. Two or three sailors were lounging near, watching the action of the bays, and commenting on the livery of the servants.

"I say, mate, what'll you take for your petticoats?" said one, touching the footman's long coat with his stick. "Uncommon comfortable thing in a nor'-wester."

The man, who was a Londoner, vouchsafed no reply, but moved nearer the carriage door with a look of supreme contempt.

The next moment Cairns caught sight of Christian Hilliard standing near, and touched his cap. "Beg your pardon: didn't know you were there, sir."

"All right," said Christian, stepping into the outer office, which was empty, the clerks having gone to their dinner; "just step this way a moment, I want to speak to you."

Cairns followed him, looking somewhat embarrassed.

"You are the man who spoke to me last night. How is it you are not on board?"

"Nothing to do, sir. The Eglantine is ready for sea, and unless something is done, she will sail in a day or two."

"Why have you not spoken before? Why have you left it to the last minute in this way?"

"We didn't leave it, Mr. Christian. As soon as we knew the repairs hadn't gone far enough, we spoke to Captain Thorpe, and he promised to see Mr. Hilliard, and have it attended to at once. He's been keeping us on and off these last few weeks, just playing with us, and at last we got desperate, and took the affair into our own hands. I've been waiting about for you all the morning."

"Well, I have nothing to say to you now. I am coming down to the docks this evening, and will put things to rights then. I thought you'd be on the look-out all day."

One of the inner doors opened, and Mr. Hilliard came out. He glanced at Cairns, and paused as if he would have spoken, but changed his mind and passed on.

"I'm going to have a talk over it with my father, and see Grant's letter," said Christian.

"I shall ride down to the docks this evening, so look out for me, and don't run off to the 'Three Sails.'"

He spoke the last words in jest, and Cairns laughed.

"No fear, sir; we are too anxious for that."

Mr. Hilliard was twice as long as usual over the dinner-table that evening. Christian yawned, and stretched his long limbs, and gave various other signs of weariness, but still his father deliberately sipped his old port and took no notice. At last he pushed back his chair, and Christian sprang to his feet.

"Now for this Eglantine affair," he said, opening the door. "Come along, sir, into your sanctum sanctorum."

"I've told you all there is to tell about the Eglantine," replied his father, coolly taking up the evening paper.

"Yes, but Grant's letter, you know; I want to see it. It is here, somewhere, I suppose; can I get it?"

There was no help for it; the moment had come either for an evasion of the question or for a direct refusal to show the letter.

To this pass had Richard Hilliard's avaricious plot brought him. He must reveal his wicked design to his own son or deliberately deceive him. The surveyor's letter condemned the ship in unequivocal terms, and if Christian read it he would protest against her being sent out, and would denounce his father for entertaining such a project. Mr. Hilliard knew his son's spirit, and was conscious Christian would never respect him again if he knew. Low as he had sunk he could not bear to lose the respect of his son, and he resolved Christian should not see the letter. He must be deceived as to its purport, as the Captain had been deceived. So many falsehoods would have disgusted many men, but when the passion of avarice once takes possession of the soul, it blunts the finer feelings, and renders the man impervious to the prickings of conscience, and capable of any depth of villainy. As St. Paul has warned us (1 Tim. 6 : 10), "The love of money is the root of all evil."

"It is strange, Christian," he said petulantly, "that you can not understand my objection to have that letter read or repeated to those men. I tell you again it contains a list of repairs necessary to make the Eglantine seaworthy; let that be sufficient."

"But I have given my word," said Christian, a shade of annoyance crossing his handsome face. "What on earth can I say to the men? They are expecting me to give them proof as to the ship's seaworthiness, and I must do it."

Mr. Hilliard made no reply.

"Surely you can not object to give me the letter to read, if I merely repeat the contents to them."

"I utterly refuse to have any thing at all to do with it. If you choose to encourage the men in their rebellion, do so; I shall be no party in the matter."

"It is not rebellion, sir; they think the ship is rotten, and surely they have a right to demand proof that she is not so. I am sorry if I have acted contrary to your judgment, but it is too late to speak of that now. As I have given them my word, they are depending upon me, and I feel bound in honor to satisfy them."

Mr. Hilliard continued reading the paper.

"It is very annoying," continued Christian, with irritation. "If I had had the slightest idea that you would object, I would not have promised."

"You know nothing of the business, and should not have interfered."

The word "interfered" jarred on Christian's ear.

"It was scarcely that, sir," he answered coldly. "The men asked me to prove the truth of my father's word, and is it likely I should refuse?"

"I can take care of my own honor."

"Certainly, when you know it is at stake, which I presume you did not in this case."

"My honor is not in the keeping of a rascally crew."

"I can not understand you," said Christian, rising and pacing the floor. "These men risk their lives in a perfectly sound vessel, and it is natural that they should wish to have their safety guaranteed as far as possible. What am I to say to them to-night?"

"Just what you please."

"Shall I, on your authority, tell them that Grant's letter was an assurance of the Eglantine's seaworthiness, under certain conditions, which have been fulfilled?"

"If you like."

Christian grew impatient. "Will you, as a personal favor to me, your son, let me read Grant's letter?"

"I have already said no."

"Is that your final decision?"

"It is."

Christian opened the door and left the room. "Confound it!" he exclaimed angrily, "here's a nice fix for a fellow to be in. How am I to keep my word to these men?"—a question which kept his thoughts fully occupied on his way to the docks. Cairns was leaning over the side of the Eglantine, evidently on the look-out.

"Where's Captain Thorpe?" asked Christian.

"Down below, sir; shall I call him?"

"No, I'll go down." Diving into the cabin, he found the Captain busy with his chart. "Captain Thorpe," he said abruptly, "are you aware of the contents of Grant's letter to my father?"

Captain Thorpe opened his eyes. "I only know what your father told me. I have not seen it, I wish I had; the men would be satisfied then, perhaps."

"You have every confidence in the vessel's soundness, I suppose."

"I have your father's word for it."

"And that satisfies you?"

"Yes."

"Will you come on deck while I speak to the men?" Captain Thorpe rose and followed him in silence. The men were gathered together, quietly talking, but as Christian appeared they turned towards him with expectant looks.

"My men," he began in the cool, deliberate way habitual to him, "I made a promise to one of you last night which I am unable to keep. I promised to repeat the contents of a certain letter to you, but it is not in my power to do so. Not one of you regrets this as I do. Nevertheless, I have something to tell you about this ship. Are you prepared to believe my word?"

There was a whispered consultation among them, and some altercation. At last Cairns stepped forward, cap in hand. "Sir, Mr. Christian, they want to know who is your authority for what you are going to say."

"My father's word is my authority," said Christian proudly, a flush rising to his face. "I am prepared to pledge my honor as to the truth of all I say."

"It ain't no use, sir," said another of the men, sullenly. "We would take your word for any thing you had seen yourself, but if you only tell us what Mr. Hilliard tells you, we won't, and there's an end of it."

"Haven't you seen the letter, sir?" asked Cairns, respectfully.

"No; my father thinks his word ought to be sufficient."

"He said the Pearly Spray was sound," cried a voice from behind Cairns, "and she went down. No, no, sir, we ain't going to take Mr. Hilliard's word. It's an easy thing to send a rotten ship to sea. Sailors' lives ain't worth counting, so as the masters get their money. If you believe the ship is sound, go in her yourself."

"Ay, let him go in her himself," murmured the men, with lowering looks. "He'll take precious good care he don't tread her planks."

"If I do go, will you trust my father's and Captain Thorpe's word? Will you do your part, and take your places like men?" asked Christian, with the light of a sudden resolve in his honest eyes.

"Ay, ay, sir. If you will trust your life, we can trust ours."

"Then I will go!" said Christian, and the men looked at each other in silence.

SUNDAY AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

THE Rev. John Gritton writes from Paris, October 28th:

"It was my duty to spend yesterday (Sunday) afternoon in the various sections of the Paris Exhibition, to see for myself the amount of reverence for the Lord's day manifested by the English-speaking exhibitors. Permit me to lay the results of my observations before your readers. It may influence the progress of thought and the course of events in relation to the pressing questions as to bands, art collections, museums, theatres, and general amusements on the Lord's day.

"Yesterday was the last Sunday but one on which the Exposition will be open. The crowds were immense. The bustle of sight-seeing, of buying and selling, of inspection and display in the foreign sections was amazing. The noise of moving machinery incessant, and the babble of tongues endless. I passed through some of the foreign sections that I might realize the actual extent of French disregard of Sunday as a day of repose. One fact was everywhere patent. English visitors were very few. I did not detect fifty in all, and I made careful observation, looking earnestly and listening attentively.

"At one time I took my stand with an American exhibitor, in a busy avenue, and helped him in the distribution of 3000 Gospels and 600 Gospel tracts, such as 'Venez à Jésus' and 'Mort à son Poste.' The people passed by in a continual stream till our stock was exhausted. Not more than five English people were among them. The abstinence from Sunday attendance on the part of Englishmen was notable, very encouraging and in full accord with my own observation and with reports made to me as to former Sundays.

"When I passed into the sections devoted to exhibits from Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, the United States, and the Colonies of England, a marked quiet was everywhere evident. The immense ranges of machinery were still, many hundreds of exhibits were covered up, attendants were absent, and the stillness seemed to affect the streams of people passing by, for they too moved along quietly, and mostly in silence.

"Standing at the entrance to the machinery annex, I listened attentively to the remarks of those passing in. I saw marks of displeasure in two or three instances, and some shrugged their shoulders, as only French people can, in evident pity for English eccentricities; but the very general tone of remark was not antagonistic to the protest made for Sabbath rest. I was specially interested in hearing several parents reply to the inquiries of their children that the English people thought it right to pay strict and religious regard to the Sunday.

"At the English refreshment buffets the English were conspicuously absent, and the very bill of fare testified that on this one day of the week the money of Messrs. Ind & Coope and the enterprise of their French managers provided for the tastes and wishes of Frenchmen.

"Such, then, is the evidence afforded by the Exhibition to the high estimation in which our English reverence for the Lord's day is held among the most successful merchants and tradespeople of the whole world. Temptations to imitate the conduct of their Continental rivals have been many and great; but they have 'remembered the Sabbath day to keep it separate,' and in doing so have done honor to God, to themselves, and to the great Anglo-Saxon race whose supremacy in the world can be traced to the open Bible and to the reverent keeping of Sabbath law.

"Permit me some remarks as to Paris itself. This city of Sunday gaiety is also the city of Sunday toil. Museums, art collections, and theatres are open. So are the shops and the factories. There are bands discoursing sweet music, and there is the cry of unrelieved toil. I saw yesterday, far into the afternoon, the ordinary business of life in full energy. Shops everywhere open, stone-masons, carpenters, painters, glaziers at work on municipal and private buildings; road-makers and scavengers at their daily toil; dealers in coal and wood cutting up and carrying on their merchandise; carts and wagons moving about with their heavy burdens; hundreds of wretched horses evidently in the last stage of endurance; and, crown—fitting crown of the whole—I saw the vast stream of people issuing at five o'clock from the Exhibition by the Porte de la Seine, cut in two by the passage of contractors' carts laden with bricks.

"Here then are Sunday amusements and Sunday toil; the open theatre and the toiling workman; the trifler, dying with ennui if he be kept an hour from sinful vanities, and the worker near to perishing—slave of the capitalist and more wretched slave of the more tyrannous pleasure-seeker.

"May all statesmen learn the lesson!"

John Wesley at York.—As he travelled to and from odd mistakes sometimes happened. Arrived at York, he went into the church in St. Saviour's Gate. The rector, one Mr. Cordeau, had often warned his congregatio against going to hear "that vagabond Wesley' preach. It was usual in that day for minister of the Establishment to wear the cassock o gown, just as we everywhere in France see th French abbé. Wesley had on his gown, like university man in a university town. Mr. Cordeau, not knowing who he was, offered him hi pulpit. Wesley was quite willing, and alway ready. Sermons leaped impromptu from hi lips, and this sermon was an impressive one. A its close the clerk asked the rector if he kne who the preacher was. "No." "Why, sir, was that vagabond Wesley!" "Ah, indeed! said the astonished clergyman. "Well, nev mind, we have had a good sermon."

William Morley Punshon was born in Doncaster, England, in the year 1824, and has added another name to the already numerous list of distinguished Yorkshiremen. His father was a successful man of business, occupying a good social position, and very highly esteemed as a valuable and influential member of the Wesleyan Connection. It may be said in passing that his uncle, Sir Isaac Morley, was a gentleman of position in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and he certainly had every reason to be gratified as he watched the growing honor brought by his nephew to the old family name.

Before he was twelve years old he was sent to be educated at Heanor, Derbyshire, and HIS SCHOOL DAYS, under judicious care, appear to have been an admirable preparation for the larger education of riper years. At this time, and while afterwards at the Doncaster Grammar School, "he was a stiff, chubby lad, with fresh, curly hair, a full proportion of the love of sport, and, above all, a most extraordinary memory. He would commit to memory, for the mere pleasure of the effort, long passages from 'The Speaker,' and recite them to his schoolfellows; and it is said that he could repeat the names of all the British constituencies, with the names of all the members representing them, without a mistake."

In his fifteenth year he entered the business establishment of his grandfather, a timber merchant, at Hull, and spent some time as a clerk both there and at Sunderland. When about twenty years of age he went to reside beneath the roof of another uncle—a man of some mark both as a missionary and a Cingalese scholar, in his day—the Rev. Benjamin Clough, who at that time was living at Woolwich. There was not a minister in the town more highly respected than Mr. Clough; and when the excitement in those years was rising almost to fever-heat in consequence of connectional heart-burnings and disputes, his influence and example as an able scholar, earnest preacher, and Christian gentleman were of the best and most healing character.

Whether his nephew, upon his conversion, had formed the purpose of devoting his life to the work of the Christian ministry, we are not informed; but there is no doubt that within twelve months afterwards this purpose had become distinct and clear. After a brief course of college training, he passed the necessary examination, was ACCEPTED BY THE CONFERENCE, and completed the regular period of probation in arduous circuit work, chiefly in the North of England. We should like to have heard some of those early sermons of his. His later efforts thousands in Great Britain, America, and Canada are acquainted with, and we all know the marks they exhibit of the most painstaking care as well as of brilliant oratorical power. But from the wilds of Cumberland to, let us say, for example, the Corn Exchange, Oxford, where he delivered the fervent address which excited so much attention, the leap could not have been sudden.

To have seen and heard the youth, Morley Punshon, when there could be no mistaking his Yorkshire proclivities and pronunciation, to have seen and heard him when he was preparing for the eminence which now fairly belongs to him both as preacher and public orator, would have enabled one to trace the growth, if not of the poet's, at least of the preacher's mind.

To many in London, after seven years' ministry in Whitehaven, Carlisle, and Newcastle, he seemed suddenly to spring, fully armed, into A BLAZE OF POPULARITY that was well-nigh dazzling. He could not be announced to preach or to lecture without chapels and halls being filled to overflowing. It would be difficult to say whether his preaching or lecturing excited the deeper interest. He had but to be announced to preach or speak, and, comparatively speaking, every inch of sitting or standing room became valuable.

One of his earliest efforts in the metropolis was his sermon in the old tabernacle, Tottenham-Court Road, on behalf of the London Missionary Society. The large building was usually well filled on these anniversaries, but on this occasion it really could not make room for the crowd desirous of getting any kind of place. Several years have passed since that memorable evening, but the writer sees once more the chapel as it then appeared with the front galleries packed with ministers from all parts of the kingdom, with the pulpit stairs thronged with listeners, conspicuous amongst whom was the late Dr. John Campbell, busily taking notes to be used afterwards in a manner peculiar to himself.

How few who heard that marvellous discourse on "Largeness of Heart" remain now! His comparatively recent sermon on behalf of the same Society at Surrey Chapel will be fresh in the recollection of many; but that grand piece of eloquence years ago has firmly held its ground in our memory against all subsequent sermons and lectures, though they may have been greater and more successful.

His lectures at Exeter Hall before the Young Men's Christian Association, some of which were delivered while he was in Sheffield and in Leeds (in each of which he spent the customary three years), were amongst the most attractive that have been given before the members of that Society. This is no slight praise, when we remember the brilliant array of able men who in the course of years have done the Young Men's Christian Association good service by the topics which they selected, and by their masterly treatment of them.

His first lecture was upon "The Prophet of Horeb," and three years afterwards this was followed by one upon "John Bunyan," which some are disposed to regard as his greatest oration. We shall pronounce no opinion on the matter. We think nothing equal to "John Bunyan" while we are under its spell, but when we open "The Huguenots" we find its influence quite as thrilling and subduing. As the first was delivered twenty years ago, many of our readers will be pleased to read an extract from it:

"Rare times they were, the times of that stirring and romantic era. How much was crowded into the sixty years of Bunyan's eventful life! There were embraced in it the turbulent reign of the first Charles—the Star-Chamber, and the High Commission, names of hate and shuddering—Laud with his Papistry, and Stafford with his scheme of Thorough, the long intestine war, Edgehill and Naseby and Marston, memories of sorrowful renown, a discrowned monarch, a royal title, and a royal execution. He saw all that was venerable and all that was novel changing places; like the scene-shifting of a drama; bluff cavaliers in seclusion and in exile; douce burghers acting history and moulded into men. Then followed the Protectorate of the many-sided and wondrous Cromwell; brief years of grandeur and progress, during which an Englishman became a power and a name. Then came the Restoration, with its reaction of excesses—the absolution of courtiers and courtezans—the madness which seized upon the nation when vampires like Oates and Dangerfield were gorged with perjury and drunk with blood; the Act of Uniformity, framed in true succession to take effect on St. Bartholomew's day, by which 'at one fell swoop' were ejected two thousand ministers of Christ's holy Gospel; the Conventicle Act, two years later, which hounded the ejected ones from the copse and from the glen; the Great Plague, fitting sequel to enactments so foul, when the silenced clergy, gathering in pestilence immunity from law, made the Red Cross the sad badge of their second ordination, and taught the anxious, and cheered the timid at the altars from which hirelings had fled . . . What a rush of history compressed into a less period than threescore years an ten! These were, indeed, times for th development of character—times for th birth of men."

From 1858 we find Mr. Punshon for som years residing in London, first in Bay water, and next at Islington. His popularit was well established, and he used it for t Master he served. It is well known th he was able to present the sumn of 100 ($5000) towards a Wesleyan chapel in Sp tal fields, both from the delivery and t sale of his lecture on "The Huguenots."

The help thus given to the Lond chapel was followed by efforts on behalf of erecting places of worship in other directions, and for five or six years his labors may have been said to have been almost incessant. His friends justly feared that a break-down in health would inevitably result from this chapel-building work. He had, however, firmly resolved to raise ten thousand pounds towards the erection of chapels in the chief watering-places on the coast of England, and though failure of health came at last, he would have been the first to fervently thank God that this did not happen until the work he had set himself to do was fairly done.

Any sketch of Dr. Punshon would be imperfect which contained no reference to his interest in missionary work. It has seemed to many that his speeches on missionary platforms were as carefully prepared as any of his great sermons or lectures. None that heard it can forget the dream which he told about ten years ago in a speech delivered in

EXETER HALL.

He described the insidious spread of Popery as the stealthy rising of waters, until the devoted country was engulfed as in another deluge. After picturing the havoc made by the silent, black, deceitful, treacherous water, he said :

"I should like to know if there is any interpreter here who can read the moral of my dream ? I have wondered whether it were possible that it had any reference to England. I have wondered whether there is any thing in the midst of us at this moment like that stealthy, snake-like, rising, creeping water ! I have wondered whether any of you know any thing like it ; whether there is a system in the midst of us, which for years has been clamoring, and which has always obtained what is clamored for, which has secured its own close houses from inspection, while it has wormed itself into yours ; which has got into your work-houses, into your prisons, which has granted an indulgence for twelve months to people who will only pray for you—pray that you may be converted to what they consider to be the true faith, and which yet is a system which has been a curse and a mildew to every country where it has prevailed !

"Privileged once more to stand on this missionary platform, one of whose duties I humbly think is to bear testimony to the truth, I have wondered whether it was not my duty to tell this dream to you ; and, waking out of it as men do from unsightly visions, with a sense of shuddering and of fear, I have wondered whether I ought not to summon you, though my words be of the feeblest, to arouse yourselves as the heart of one man, and to let your manifesto ring out upon the world. Away with gags, and jails, and proscriptions, and penalties. Our sufferings have taught us charity, and we will not steal the sword of persecution from her to whom it of right belongs ; but to us has been committed a stewardship of truth and freedom, and we will not be faithless to our trust. In sight of the rising tide and of the fatuous warders we will do our duty, and, speaking with a voice too stern for trifling, and too sad for passion, we announce our resolve to-day. In the name of our martyred forefathers, and in the name of the country that we love, and in the name of the sanctities that are habitually violated and of the liberties which are put in peril, and in the name of the slaves that are enthralled, in the name of the souls that are deluded, and in the name of the Gospel of Jesus, which is hindered, and in the holy name of God 'A barred door to Popery, and no peace with Rome.' "

In 1868 Dr. Punshon transferred his ministerial labors to Canada, being at the same time deputed by the British Conference to visit fraternally the Canadian and United States Conferences. It need scarcely be said his reception was as genial and enthusiastic as warm-hearted Americans and Canadians know how to give. While in Toronto he permitted the publication of a volume of lectures and sermons as a memorial volume, and these recall to many Trans-atlantic friends the voice of the speaker now that he is far away.

Although not native to the Dominion of Canada, he learned to identify himself loyally with its interests, and cherishes an unwavering attachment to its people and its fortunes. In 1874 Dr. Punshon filled the honorable post of President of the Conference, and his present position in the Wesleyan Mission House in London is that of Deputy Treasurer and Senior Secretary. His health is not so robust now as it once was, and he only preaches occasionally, and often delivers the same sermon in different Wesleyan chapels, his health and arduous work at the Mission House apparently precluding any frequent preparation of new discourses.

Dr. Punshon has been thrice married ; in the first instance to Miss Vickers, of Gateshead, while laboring in the Newcastle Circuit, whom he lost about ten years afterwards, during his first sojourn in London.

When in Canada, shortly after settling in Toronto, he married his first wife's sister, who for years had, with the utmost devotedness, discharged all motherly duties towards his bereaved children. The law of England still prohibits these marriages, but in Canada they are valid. Strenuous efforts have been made to legalize them in England, but hitherto without success. Session after session, with patient persistency, a bill has been introduced into Parliament for the purpose, but bigotry and narrow-minded prejudice, sometimes on the part of the Bishops, sometimes of laymen, have procured its rejection. A man who finds in the sister of his deceased wife a congenial partner, with no natural bar to render a marriage injudicious, is separated from her by a musty ecclesiastical prejudice, a relic of mediæval superstition. Dr. Punshon had the courage to set it at defiance, and his coadjutors in the Wesleyan ministry, to their own disgrace, marked their disapprobation of his conduct by striking his name off the roll of the "legal hundred."

The union, hallowed as it was by ardent affection on both sides and fraught as it was with happiness, was not of long duration. Mrs. Punshon died October, 1871, after only three years of wedded life. After Dr. Punshon resumed his position in the English Wesleyan ministry he married the daughter of the late William Foster, Esq., of Sheffield.

THE CONVERSION OF D'AUBIGNÉ.

Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, the well-known historian of the Reformation, was a student at Geneva at a time when the Gospel was openly ridiculed by the professors as well as the students. In 1816 he presided at a meeting which indignantly protested against a pamphlet defending the doctrine of the divinity of Jesus Christ. In 1817 Mr. Robert Haldane was honored of God to renew a testimony to the despised Gospel among those students. During his stay at Geneva, Merle d'Aubigné met him at a private house, and heard him read a chapter from the Epistle to the Romans concerning the natural corruption of man. The student of theology was astonished to hear of men being corrupt by nature ; but, being clearly convinced by the passage read to him, he said to Mr. Haldane, "Now I do indeed see this doctrine in the Bible." "Yes," replied Mr. Haldane, "but do you see it in your heart ?" It was a simple question, but it came home to the young man's conscience. From that time he saw and felt himself to be indeed a sinner, and learned that he could be saved by grace alone, through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

CLUB-HOUSES LEGITIMATE AND ILLEGITIMATE.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached December 1st.

THE RESULT OF A MIDNIGHT EXPLORATION OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

"Let the young men now arise and play before us."—II. Samuel 2 : 14.

There are two armies encamped by the pool of Gibeon. The time hangs heavily on their hands. One army proposes a game of sword fencing. Nothing could be more healthful and innocent. The other army accepts the challenge. Twelve men against twelve men, the sport opens. But something went adversely. Perhaps one of the swordsmen got an unlucky clip, or in some way had his ire aroused, and that which opened in sportfulness ended in violence, each one taking his contestant by the hair, and then with the sword thrusting him in the side ; so that, that which opened in innocent, fun ended in the massacre of all the twenty-four sportsmen. Was there ever a better illustration of what was true then, and is true now, that that which is innocent may be made destructive ?

In my exploration of the night side of city life, I have found out that there is a legitimate and an illegitimate use of the club-house. In the one case, it may become a healthful recreation like the contest of the twenty-four men in the text when they began their play. In the other case, it becomes the massacre of body, mind, and soul, as in the case of the contestants in the text when they had gone too far with their sport. All intelligent ages have had their gatherings for political, social, artistic, literary purposes—gatherings characterized by the blunt old Anglo-Saxon designation of "club." If you have read history, you know that there was a King's Head Club, a Ben Jonson Club, a Brothers' Club to which Swift and Bolingbroke belonged, a Literary Club, which Burke and Goldsmith and Johnson and Boswell made immortal, a Jacobin Club, a Benjamin Franklin Yankee Club. Some of these to vindicate justice, some to favor the arts, some to promote good manners, some to despoil the habits, some to destroy the soul.

If one will write an honest history of the clubs of England, Ireland, Scotland, France, and the United States for the last hundred years, he will write the history of the world.

The club was an institution born on English soil, but it has thrived well in American atmosphere. We have in this cluster of cities a great number of them, with seventy thousand members, so called, so known ; but who shall tell how many belong to that kind of club where men put purses together and open house, apportioning the expense of caterer and servants and room, and having a sort of domestic establishment—a style of club-house which, in my opinion, is far better than the ordinary hotel or boarding-house ?

LEGITIMATE CLUB-HOUSES.

But my object now is to speak of club-houses of a different sort, such as the Union League, which was established during the war, having patriotic purposes, which has now between thirteen and fourteen hundred members, which is now, also, the headquarters of Republicanism ; likewise, the Manhattan, with large admission-fee, four or five hundred members, the headquarters of the Democracy; like the Union Club, established in 1836, when New York had only a little over three hundred thousand inhabitants, their present building having cost two hundred and fifty thousand dollars (they have a membership of between eight and nine hundred people, among them some of the leading merchant princes of the land); like the Lotos, the latest rival of the Arcadian, where journalists, dramatists, sculptors, painters, and artists from all branches gather together to discuss newspapers, theatres, and elaborate art; like the Americus, which camps out in summer-time, dimpling the pool with their hook and arousing the forest with their stag-hunt; like the Century Club, which has its large group of venerable lawyers and poets; like the Army and Navy Club, where those who engaged in warlike service once on the land or the sea now come together to talk over the days of carnage; like the New York Yacht Club, with its floating palaces of beauty embroidered with velvet, panelled with ebony, having all the advantages of electric bell and of gaslight and of king's pantry, one pleasure-boat costing three thousand, another fifteen thousand, another thirty thousand, another sixty-five thousand dollars, the fleet of pleasure-boats belnoging to the club having cost over two million dollars; like the American Jockey Club, to which belong men who have a passionate fondness for horses, fine horses as had Job when, in the Scriptures, he gives us a sketch of that king of beasts, the arch of its neck, the nervousness of its foot, the majesty of its gait, the whirlwind of its power, crying out, "Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? the glory of his nostrils is terrrible, he paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength, he saith among the trumpets ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains and the shouting;" like the travellers' club, the Blossom Club, the Palette Club, the Commercial Club, the Liberal Club, the Stable Gang Club, the Amateur Boat Club, the gambling clubs, the wine clubs, the clubs of all sizes, the clubs of all morals, clubs as good as good can be, and clubs as bad as bad can be—clubs innumerable.

No series of sermons on the night side of city life would be complete without a sketch of the clubs, which after dark are in full blast. During the day they are comparatively lazy places. Here and there, an aged man reading a newspaper, or an employé dusting a sofa, or a clerk writing up the accounts; but when the curtain of the night falls on the natural day, then the curtain of the club-house hoists for the entertainment.

A CLUB-HOUSE INTERIOR.

Let us hasten up now the marble stairs. What an imperial hallway! See, here are parlors on this side, with the upholstery of the Kremlin and the Tuileries; and here are dining-halls that challenge you to mention any luxury that they cannot afford; and here are galleries with sculpture and paintings and lithographs and drawings from the best of artists, Cropsey and Bierstadt and Church and Hart and Gifford—pictures for your every mood, whether you are impassioned or placid; shipwreck or sunlight over the sea; Sheridan's Ride, or the noonday party of the farmers under the tree; foaming deer pursued by the hounds through the Adirondacks, or the sheep on the lawn. On this side there are reading-rooms, where you find all newspapers and magazines. On that side there is a library, where you find all books from hermeneutics to the fairy tale.

Coming in and out, there are gentlemen, some of whom stay ten minutes, others stay many hours. Some of these are from luxuriant homes, and they have excused themselves for a while from the domestic circle that they may enjoy the larger sociability of the club-house. These are from dismembered households, and they have a plain lodging somewhere, but they come to this place, this club-room, to have their chief enjoyment. One black-ball amid ten votes will defeat a man's becoming a member. For rowdyism, for drunkenness, for gambling, for any kind of misdemeanor, a member is dropped out. Brilliant club-house from top to bottom. The chandeliers, the plate, the furniture, the companionship, the literature, the social prestige—a complete enchantment.

But the evening is passing on, and so we hasten through the hall and down the steps and into the street, and from block to block until we come to another style of club-house.

Opening the door, we find the fumes of strong drink and tobacco something almost intolerable. These men, these young men at this table, it is easy to understand what they are at, from the flushed cheek, the intent look, the almost angry way of tossing the dice or of moving the "chips." They are gambling! At another table are men who are telling vile stories. They are three fourths intoxicated, and between twelve and one o'clock they will go staggering, hooting, swearing, shouting on their way home.

That is an only son. On him all kindness, all care, all culture has been bestowed. He is paying his parents this way for their kindness. That is a young married man, who, only a few months ago, at the altar made promises of kindness and fidelity, every one of which he has broken.

Walk through and see for yourself. Here are all the implements of dissipation and of quick death. As the hours of the night go away, the conversation becomes imbecile and more debasing. Now it is time to shut up. Those who are able to stand will get out on the pavement and balance themselves against the lamp-post or against the railings of the fence. Those who are not able to stand will have a bed improvized for them in the club-house, or two not quite so overcome with liquor will conduct him to his father's house, and they will ring the door-bell, and the door will open, and the two imbecile escorts will introduce into the hallway the ghastliest and most hellish spectacle that ever enters a front door—a drunken son!

If the dissipating club-houses of this country would make a contract with Inferno to provide it ten thousand men a year and for twenty years, on the condition that no more would be asked of them, the club-houses could afford to make that contract, for they would save homesteads, save fortunes, save bodies, minds, and souls. The ten thousand men who would be sacrificed by that contract would be but a small part of the multitude sacrificed without the contract.

But I make a vast difference between clubs. I have belonged to four clubs: a theological club, a ball club, and two literary clubs. I got from them physical rejuvenation and moral health. What shall we do? What shall be the principle? If God will help me, I will lay down three principles by which you may judge whether the club where you are a member or the club to which you have been invited is a legitimate or an illegitimate club-house.

First of all, I want you to test the club by

if you have a home. I have been told by a prominent gentleman in club life that three fourths of the members of the great clubs of these cities are married men!

That wife soon loses all her influence who nervously and foolishly looks upon all absence as an assault on domesticity. How are the great enterprises of art and literature and beneficence and public weal to be carried on if every man is to have his world bounded on one side by the front-door step and on the other side by the back window, knowing nothing higher than his own attic and nothing lower than his own cellar? That wife who becomes jealous of her husband's attentions to art, or literature, or religion, or charity, is breaking her own sceptre of conjugal power. I knew in this church an instance where a wife thought that her husband was giving too many nights to Christian service, to charitable service, to prayer-meetings, and to religious convocation. She systematically decoyed him away until now he attends neither this nor any other church, and is on rapid way to destruction, his morals gone, his money gone, and I fear his soul gone.

Let any Christian wife rejoice when her husband consecrates evenings to the service of God, or to charity, or to art, or to anything elevated; but let not men sacrifice home life to club life.

I have the rolls of the members of a great many of the prominent clubs of these cities, and I can point out to you a great many names of men who are guilty of this sacrilege. They are as genial as angels at the club-house, and as ugly as sin at home! They are generous on all subjects of wine suppers and yachts and fast horses, but they are stingy about the wife's dress and the children's shoes. That man has made that which might be a heathful recreation, a usurper of his affections, and he has married it, and he is guilty of moral bigamy.

Under this process, the wife, whatever her features, becomes uninteresting and homely. He becomes critical of her, does not like the dress, does not like the way she arranges her hair, is annoyed that he ever was so unromantic as to offer her hand and heart. She is always wanting money, money, when she ought to be discussing Eclipse, and Dexter, and Derby Day, and English drag with six horses all answering the pull of one "ribbon"! I tell you there are thousands of homes in Brooklyn and New York being clubbed to death! There are club-houses in these cities where membership always involves domestic shipwreck. Tell me that a man has joined a certain club, tell me nothing about him for ten years, and I will write his history. Just let me know he is still alive and still a member, and I will write his history. The man is a wine-guzzler, his wife broken-hearted or prematurely old, his fortune gone or reduced, and his home a mere name in a directory.

Here are six secular nights in the week. "What shall I do with them?" says the father and the husband. "I will give four of those nights to the improvement and entertainment of my family, either at home or in a good neighborhood; I will devote one to charitable institutions; I will devote one to the club." I congratulate you.

Here is a man who says, "I will make a different division of the six nights; I will take three for the club and I will take three for other purposes." I tremble.

Here is a man who says, "Out of the six secular nights of the week, I will devote five to th club-house and one to the home, which night will spend in scowling like a March squall, wishing I was out spending it as I had spent th other five." That man's obituary is written Not one out of ten thousand that gets so far a the wrong road stops. Gradually his health wil fail; through late hours and through too muc stimulants he will be the prey of erysipelas an rheumatism of the heart. The doctor comin in will see at a glance it is not only present diseas he must fight, but years of fast living. Th clergyman, for the sake of the feelings of th family, on the funeral-day will only talk in r ligious generalities. The men who got his yacl in the eternal rapids will not be at the obs quies. They will have pressing engagemen that day. They will send flowers to the coffi lid, and send their wives to use words of syr pathy; but they will have engagements els where. They never come. Bring me mall and chisel, and I will cut on the tombstone th man's epitaph, "Blessed are the dead who d in the Lord." "No," you say, "that wou not be appropriate." Let me die the death the righteous, and let my last end be like his "No," you say, "that would not be approp ate." Then give me the mallet and the chis and I will cut an honest epitaph: "Here li the victim of a dissipating club-house!"

I think that damage is often done by the sci of some aristocratic family who belongs to o of these dissipating club-houses. People co ing up from humbler classes feel it an honor belong to the same club, forgetting the fact th many of the sons and grandsons of the comm cial establishments, the large commercial establishments of the last generation, are now, as to mind, imbecile; as to body, diseased; as to morals, rotten. They would have got through their property long ago if they had had full possession of it; but the wily ancestors who got the money by hard knocks foresaw how it was to be, and they tied up every thing hard in the will. Now, there is nothing of that man, that unworthy descendant, but his grandfather's name and roast-beef rotundity. And yet how many steamers there are which feel honored to lash fast that worm-eaten tug, though it drags them straight into the breakers!

2. Another test by which you can find whether your club is legitimate or illegitimate:

ITS EFFECT ON YOUR OCCUPATION.

I can understand how through such an institution a man can make a commercial success. I know some men have formed their best business relations through such channels. If the club has advantaged you in an honorable calling, it is a legitimate club.

But has your credit failed? are bargain-makers more cautious how they trust you with a bill of goods? have the men whose names were down in the commercial agency A1 before they entered the club been going down since in commercial standing? Then, look out! You and I, every day, know of commercial establishments going to ruin through the social excesses of one or two members—their fortunes beaten to death with ball-player's bat, or cut amidships of the front prow of the regatta, or going down under the swift hoofs of the fast horses, or drowned in large potations of Cogniac and Monongahela. Their club-house was the Loch Earn. Their business-house was the Ville du Havre. They struck, and the Ville du Havre went under; or, to take illustration from last Monday night's disaster, their club-house was the Eilian and their business-house was the Pommerania. They struck, and the Pommerania went under.

3. Another test by which you may know whether the club to which you belong, or the club to whose membership you are invited, is a legitimate club or an illegitimate club is this:

ITS EFFECT ON RELIGION.

What is its effect on your sense of moral and religious obligation? Now, if I should take the names of all the people in this audience this morning, and put them on a roll, and then I should lay that roll back of this organ, and a hundred years from now some one should take that roll and call it from A to Z, there would not one of you answer. Now, I say that any association that makes me forget that fact is a bad association. When I go to Chicago, I am sometimes perplexed at Buffalo, as I suppose many travellers are, as to whether they had better not take the Lake Shore route or the Michigan Central, equally expeditious and equally safe, getting there at the destination at the same time; but suppose I hear that on one route the track is torn up, and the bridges are torn down, and the switches are unlocked? it will not take me a great while to decide which road to take. Now, here are two roads into the future, the Christian and the unchristian, the safe and the unsafe. Any institution or any association that confuses my idea in regard to that fact is a bad institution and a bad association.

I had prayers before I joined the club. Did I have them after? I attended the house of God where my parents used to take me, and I stood amid Christian influences before I connected myself with the club. Since that union with the club, do I absent myself from religious influences?

Which would you rather have in your hand when you come to die, a pack of cards or a Bible? Which would you rather have pressed to your lips in the closing moment, the cup of Belshazzarean wassail or the chalice of Christian communion? Who would you rather have for your pall-bearers, the elders of a Christian church or the companions whose conversation was full of slang and innuendo? Who would you rather have for your eternal companions, those men who spend all their evening betting, gambling, swearing, carousing and telling vile stories, or that bright girl who loved you so and whom the Lord took? Oh! you would not have been away so much nights, would you, if you had known she was going away so soon? Dear me, your house has never been the same place since. Your wife has never brightened up, she has not got over it; she never will get over it. How long the evenings are with none to put to bed, and none to tell the beautiful Bible story! What a pity it is that you cannot spend more evenings at home in trying to help her bear that sorrow! You can never drown that grief in the wine-cup, you can never break away from the little arms that used to be flung around your neck when she used to say: "Papa, do stay home, to-night—do stay home to-night." You will never be able to wipe from your lips the dying kiss of your little girl. The fascination of a dissipating club-house is so great that sometimes a man has turned his back on his home when his child was dying of scarlet fever. He went away. Before he got back at midnight, the eyes had been closed, and the undertaker had done his work, and the wife, worn out with three weeks' watching, lay unconscious in the next room. Then there is a rattling of the night-key in the door, and the returned father comes upstairs, and he sees the cradle gone and the windows up, and says, "What's the matter?" In eternity, aye, before that, in the judgment-day, he will find out what was the matter.

O man astray, God help you! I am going to make

A VERY STOUT ROPE.

You know that sometimes a rope-maker will take very small threads, and wind them together until after a while they become ship-cable. And I am going to take some very small delicate threads, and wind them together until they make a very stout rope. I will take all the memories of the marriage-day, a thread of laughter, a thread of light, a thread of music, a thread of banqueting, a thread of congratulation, and I twist them together and I have one strand. Then I take a thread of the hour of the first advent in your house, a thread of the darkness that preceded and a thread of the light that followed, and a thread of the beautiful scarf that little child used to wear when she bounded out at eventide to greet you, and then a thread of the beautiful dress in which you laid her away for the resurrection. And then I twist all these threads together, and I have another strand. Then I take a thread of the scarlet robe of a suffering Christ, and a thread of the white raiment of your loved ones before the throne, and a string of the harp cherubic, and a string of the harp seraphic, and I twist them all together, and I have a third strand. "Oh!" you say, "either strand is strong enough to hold fast a world." No. I will take the three strands and will twist them together, and one end of that rope I will fasten not to the communion-table, for it shall be removed—not to a pillar of the organ, for that will crumble in the ages; but I wind it round and round the end of that rope, round the cross of a pardoning and sympathizing Christ; and having fastened one end of the rope to the cross, I throw the other end to you. Lay hold of it! Pull for your life! Pull for heaven! Oh! choose to-day between the two banquets—the banquet of sin with tankards of death, spirits of darkness the cupbearers, and the banquet of grace, the King of heaven and earth sitting at the table! Room on all sides for the chief of sinners!

The sermons by Dr. Talmage which are published from week to week in this journal are verbatim and unabridged reports. They are published by special arrangement with Dr. Talmage, and are revised by him.

SECOND PART OF THE FIFTH TEMPERANCE ORATION,

By J. B. Gough,

At the Standard Theatre, on October 30th.

A Haunt of the Dangerous Classes—Their Sins of Commission and ours of Omission—Happy Colored People—Thrilling Speech by a Man in Fustian and Corduroy—His Telling Recital of His Reclamation from Drunkenness—What Dick and Tom did—A Scotch Cabman's Gratitude—The Door to Knock at—Killed by Moderate Drinking—A Colonel's Death through Intoxicating Common Wine—The Mouse and the Cat—Do Your Duty.

COME with me, and I will show you a scene I once witnessed. Turn out of this magnificent street of palaces, and look at a new world. Every grade of existence as you advance becomes darker, filthier, fouler, and more degraded: sickening odors, heavy with disease, come from open cellars; oaths ring out from subterranean dens. Here, thronging the filthy sidewalks, are children with no sunshine on their brow—children who are a walking heap of rags—children who often hear a mother swear, but who have never heard her pray—children who will occupy prisons, penitentiaries, poorhouses, or worse. Can they be rescued?

Here they are—bad, precocious. In banter, sarcasm, and bold repartee—your child is a fool to them. What if all these sharp intellects, this acuteness, this strange intelligence, were trained for humanity, for God, for Christ, and for heaven—instead of being trained to inevitably prey on society—for crime, for Satan, and for perdition.

Do we not blunder fearfully as Christians if we do nothing for their rescue? and shall we not pay a terrible price for our neglect? Come and see where they live. Come from your pleasant home, where children trained for purity and heaven climb your knee. Come from your family altar. Come from the comforts and luxuries that God has given you, and see where these children live. Jesus loved little children, and whosoever shall give to one of these little ones a cup of cold water shall not lose His reward. This broken door hangs by a single hinge. No fear of burglars here.

Enter! Is this a cage of wild animals? No, these are men, and women, and children—not beasts and their cubs. Every square foot of the filthy floor has some occupant; the wretched in rags, the drunken in their debauches, gray hair and auburn locks, old and young, black and white, the sick and suffering, the innocent and guilty—all herding together.

Here the robber brings his plunder, the beggar his refuse food; here too the shameless girl—God help her!—brings her horrible earnings. Here they sleep and grovel. Here they drug conscience with poisoned liquors. Here they spend their lives; and here, in the dark, many die. Such scenes are to be witnessed in nearly every large city to-day, within sound of the church bells. Oh! they are a hard set. They drink, and swear, and lie, and resist control. True, their sins of commission are awful: but what of

OUR SINS OF OMISSION?

As we gaze with horror into the abyss where they lie, and shudder at their degradation, must not some of us say, "I am verily guilty concerning my brother?" Do you wish to repair the blunder of indifference and neglect? Read "Haste to the Rescue," "Annals of the Rescued," "Ragged Homes, and How to Mend Them;" read the Reports of Homes of Industry, Homes for the Friendless, Homes for the Magdalens, Night Refuges for the Destitute, Newsboys' Lodging houses, and kindred enterprises of benevolence.

Then see what is being accomplished in the mission schools, and like institutions. But we want something more than mere institutions. Let the rich men, out of their abundance, invest in clean, well-ordered, and cheap lodging-houses. Open parks, where the poor can have the liberty of the rich. Provide for them cheap and wholesome recreation, pleasure excursions, and the like.

HAPPY COLORED PEOPLE.

An old colored servant was asked—although I don't know why we should call them "colored" people, for a negro was once asked whether he was a colored man, and he said, "No, I was born so ; I never was 'colored' "—well, some one went to see this colored woman in her wretched little hut, and said, "I don't see how you can manage to live in such a smoke." What did she say? "Why, honey, I say, thanks to the Lord that I have got any thing to make a smoke with."

Another poor creature said, when some one talked to her about her pains, "Oh, honey! dat is nothing. Don't you know dat is just in de hands of de Lord; and sometimes He whips us. But, bless your heart, just as soon as we cries like a baby, He takes us up and comforts us." Why, we have some of the most magnificent experiences of Christian faith and trust and devotedness among the poor—I think sometimes more than among the rich. There is no degradation in poverty; but oh! my friends, there is degradation in sin. Every thing that defiles the spirit is a degradation; and there is no degradation like the degradation of drunkenness—none in this wide world.

THRILLING SPEECH BY A MAN IN FUSTIAN AND CORDUROY.

I once heard a speech, and it is a much better one than I can give to you, and therefore I will repeat it. I spoke to an audience of eight hundred of the hardest men I ever came across in my life. Well, it was just like, if you threw a joke at them—oh, dear me!—it was like a stone in a bed of mud. You could not move them to laughter, or tears, or any thing else. There they sat, as much as to say, What are you going to do next? All were alike. I sat down very much discouraged, and the chairman said to me:

"Now, Mr. Gough, if you have no objection, I should like to ask a man to come on this platform. You think these people have no enthusiasm, but you will find that they have. You have not yet seen them. There is a man here who can not read or write, but who knows a great deal of the Scriptures, and who preaches wonderfully—hundreds go to hear him. If you have no objection, and would like him to come on the platform, you will see how he can move the audience."

I said, "Objection! I should be delighted to hear him." So up he came, in fustian jacket and corduroy trousers. He had not washed the dirt from his eyes—he had been in the mine—he had just given himself a splash and a dash. He had a good honest eye. And what do you suppose was the first thing he said?

"How do ye do, lads? The gentleman asked me to come on the platform because he thought you would like to have a look at me, and I have come so that you may look at me. I have no objection; you may look at me. Don't you see how fat I am getting? I doesn't drink no beer neither, like you. Look at me. I bean't ashamed. My elbows bean't sticking out of my jacket, and my toes bean't sticking out of my boots. And I wi' tell you, I have got a clean shirt on, and I gets one once a week; and, by the look of some of you, you don't get one once a week.

"You may look at me, if you like. I bean't ashamed if you do. I say, lads, I have made a change. I have changed beer for bread, and brandy for beef, and I have changed gin for good clothes—they are pretty good ones, though they be short-skirted—and I have changed rum for a happy wife and a comfortable home. My wife does not lie no longer on a lot of rotten rags, and my children don't run no more in the streets, learning devils' tricks. I have made a change. You remember the old song we used to sing—

> 'When a man buys beef, he buys bones;
> When a man buys plums, he buys stones;
> When a man buys eggs, he buys shells;
> When a man buys drink, he buys nothing else.'

Ain't it true?

"Ay, lads, that's all true, and every one of you knows it," and they began to shout, "Hurrah! hurrah!"—every one of them. "I don't want you to hurrah. I didn't come here for any hollering. I will tell you what I did the first night, when I put my name on the temperance pledge. I went home and told my missis, and that brightened her up a bit. Then I took my children out of the gutter. Then I got out of the den I was living in, and took a house—a two-roomed house. I am a 'householder' now.

"My children goes to school, and I pays a penny a week for each of them, and they are going to be better educated than their father was. And then I thought I was going to cut a dash, and I did, but I'll never do it again. I got a black pair of trousers, a canary-colored waistcoat and jacket to match, and then I got a stiff hat. And I'll be blowed if it wasn't a stiff 'un; and then I strutted up and down, and when the people that knowed me afore seed me, blowed if they was not putrified, every one of them."

WHAT DICK AND TOM DID.

"Now, look here, I don't want none of your hollering; I want to make this here speech—what some of the learned gentlemen call a practical speech. There's Dick over there. Go it, Dick. He bobbed his head down when I said 'Dick.' Everybody knows Dick. He has just the hand of a man and the heart of a woman. Dick! Everybody knows Dick. Why, he would share his last crust with a brother pitman, and lend his tools to his brother workman if he knowed he'd pawn them the next day. Dick knows it. He is an honest, big-hearted man. But why did Dick bob his head down when I said 'Dick?'

"Dick, my lad, you knows me and I knows you. I want to ask you a question. Do you remember that bitter November night, when the wind was driving the sleet through the thick clothes of a man, and you sent your little girl out, and she had but one garment, and that was hanging about her bare legs, and you sent her with a blacking bottle, and she could hardly stand and put the blacking bottle on the counter, and you sent her with a silver sixpence for gin; and there was your half-starving wife lying on the floor with a new-born babe wailing at her side? Ah, Dick, that was bad. I say 'bad.' Was it Dick did it that night? No, it was the cursed drink. Down with the drink and up with the man! That's my motto.

"And there's Tom there, just like Dick. Tom bobbed his head down when I said 'Tom.' Ah, Tom! he's just such another as Dick. Everybody knows him. I want to ask you a question, Tom. What did you promise the lassie when you took her away from her mother's home? Did not you promise to love her, and cherish her, and protect her? Have you done it, Tom? Who gied her two black eyes three weeks since? Who thrust her down the stairs, and tore the flesh from wrist to elbow, and she covered the place over with her apron, and told people lies to shield you?

"Ah, that's bad, lads. Was it Tom that struck a woman? Was it Tom that threw his wife down the stairs? No, it was the cursed drink that did it. Down with the drink and up with the man! That's my doctrine. I say, lads, do you want to smooth the wrinkles out of your wife's face, like you smooth out the wrinkles in a sheet with a smoothing iron? I have! Put your name on the pledge! That will do it. I say, Dick! Dick is coming! Dick is coming! Tom! Tom! look here! Ah, that's right, Tom! Now, lads, follow a good example!"

And fifty-eight men came tramp, tramp, tramp on the platform. They seized the pen as if it were a pen of iron, and they were 'graving their names into stone.

That man did more work in ten minutes than I could do in ten hours, because his discourse was adapted to the character of his audience. Now, I have been working among such men, and I say again, there is no power on earth that brutalizes a man like the power of the drink. These men are warm-hearted men.

A SCOTCH CABMAN'S GRATITUDE.

Why, I remember riding once in Scotland to a place—I can not pronounce it; I pronounced it once, and they laughed at me: I can spell it—A-u-c-h-t-e-r-m-u-c-h-t-y. A man came to meet me at the Ladybank Junction, and took me six miles in a fly—a one-horse cab. As we sat together I noticed the man was leaning forward very strangely: I saw him take a handkerchief—that was the beginning of it—and tie it round his face.

Then he would sit a little and shake it out, and then tie it another way, still leaning his head forward. Said I, "Have you the toothache?" "No." "Have you taken cold?" "No." "Then will you be good enough to tell me why you lean forward with the handkerchief if you are not cold and have not the toothache?" "Well," he said, "the window of the fly is broken, and the wind is pretty cold this morning, and I am trying to keep it from you." "Why," I said, "you don't mean to tell me you are sticking your head in that hole to keep the wind off me?" "Yes, I am." I said, "Well, I thank you, my dear fellow. I never saw you before."

"No? I saw you; I was a ballad singer, and used to go round with a half-starved wife and a baby in her arms, my wife oftentimes with a black eye. Somehow or another I got to hear you in Edinburgh in 1853, and you told me I 'WAS A MAN;' and I went out of the place, and said, 'By the help of God, whatever it costs, I'll be a man;' and now I have a happy home, and wife and children gathered around me. God bless you, sir! I would stick me head in any hole under heaven if I could do you any good. God bless you!"

Now, call them brutes, will you? Ah, snatching them from the damning influences of drink, and they are MEN. I ask the women, and I ask you, who are the wives of reformed drunkards—men who have drunk for years—to testify if, when your husbands are sober, they are not kind and considerate; and if, when drunk, they are not just what the drink is likely to make every man—insane, mad, and sometimes devilish.

THE DOOR TO KNOCK AT.

Dickens says in one of his novels, "Mrs. Todgers was a very hard woman. Yet, in her heart, away up a great many pairs of stairs, in a very remote corner, there was a door, and on that door was written woman." So in the heart of the worst drunkard that ever stepped on this earth—away up a great many pairs of stairs, in a very remote corner, easily passed by, covered with cobwebs, there is a door. It is our business to find that door. It is our business to seek for it, and, when we have found it, knock! Yes; and wait, and not go away and say, "It is no use!"

Remember Him who knocks at the door of our hearts till His hair is wet with the dew; and remember this is one for whom He died, and that he is your brother. Knock on! And by and by the quivering lip, and faltering tongue, and starting tear, will tell you you have been knocking at the heart of a man—a heart that can be touched by tenderness and love. In my experience of five-and-thirty years I have found that it is the drink that debases and degrades men.

Now, then, I want to say to these, if there are any here who are in bondage, "we come to offer you freedom from the drink. We have a 'Declaration of Independence' for you to sign; and if you sign it, you declare, not that you ar free, but that you will be free." That is it However, there is a fight. I never go to a man and tell him that he can leave off drinking as easily as he can turn over his hand. It is no true. He has to fight. I love a fighter. Som men never fight.

Now WE MUST FIGHT. There is one thing want to say to you who belong to the Gospe Temperance Society, and it is treading on delicate ground, but it is a matter that sometimes troubles us in the United States. I hav heard men say that the love of Jesus or the grac of God has taken away their appetite. Now, have a letter from a gentleman, who says, " had prayed earnestly, and God took from me all desire for drink." Granted that He may do so. But beware! The appetite is physical; and the appetite is produced by the immoderate use of alcohol. And the first drop of alcohol that touches that mysterious something it will respond to.

And there is not one of you who has been a drunkard who can touch it, who can safely take to moderate drinking. I do not care if you call yourselves fifty times a Christian. The grace of God will keep you from the drink; but it will not keep you from THE EFFECTS if you drink. And I say to you, if you think the appetite is gone, Beware how you tamper with the devil that lies there quiet and dormant! for the demon will be ready to rouse into fury at the first drop of alcohol you put in your system.

KILLED BY MODERATE DRINKING.

A man said just before I sailed, "There is John B. Gough, thirty-five years a teetotaller, and he is in bonds, and dare not say the appetite is dead; and I came out of jail six months ago, and I am safe in Jesus." In less than a month he was in an inebriate asylum. He had been mistaken, and thought the grace of God had taken away the appetite; and he had taken to drink a little, supposing he could be a moderate drinker. The appetite is a physical disease, that the grace of God does not cure unless by a miracle, and then it is a miracle, and not what we call the grace of God.

INTOXICATING COMMUNION WINE LEADING TO A RECLAIMED COLONEL'S DEATH.

I knew a man, a colonel in our army, in the regular army—a graduate of West Point. He had been an awful drunkard, but he became a Christian, and was united with the church. On the morning of the communion day, the first Sunday in May, a gentleman said, "Colonel So-and-so communes with you to-day." "Yes, this is the first time in his life." "Well, I am very glad to hear it—very glad indeed." "It is a great change, a wonderful change, and we all rejoice." "What kind of wine do you use at your communion?" "Well, we buy it at the stores." "What! you don't mean to tell me that you use the common wine of commerce at the communion!" "Well, we get it at the stores." "Then I am afraid for the Colonel." "Oh, nonsense!"

That man sat at the communion table, as honest a Christian as ever sat down to show forth the Lord's death till he come—honest, true, and sincere. The wine came to him; he swallowed a portion of it, and it was noticed that he kept the cup to his lips longer than is usual. He went out, got drunk; in ten days was dead, and in less than two weeks from his first communion they buried him.

The one draught, or the one drop, roused the demon into fury; and that is a disease, and he could not help it—could not help it. The drinking he could help, but the results he could not help. You can not help it if you take the drink into your system.

The grace of God did not take away the appetite. That was there; and I tell you, those church members ought to have been careful before they offered him intoxicating drink, especially when you can get the pure, unadulterated juice of the grape. That is wine, and not the wretched, trashy, so-called "wines" of commerce.

In the city of Boston we determined that we would settle this question about the purity of wines. I remember I subscribed for the examination. They engaged the best chemist, the best scientist, I believe, from Harvard College, in Faneuil Hall, to analyze the wines. We procured wines from fourteen different churches, and in ten specimens there was not one particle of the juice of the grape to be discovered by the closest chemical analysis, and in the other four so little that it was hardly worth mentioning.

The common made wine of commerce, the horrible adulterated stuff that men drink and call wine, is not wine at all. A lady wrote to me, calling me rabid and crazy because I spoke about the wines. She said, "The Saviour came eating and drinking. The Saviour, my God," she said —I thought it was blasphemy—"drank intoxicating wine all the days of His life."

At some time or other a time comes to all of us when we have certain opportunities. Opportunities are passing day by day—opportunities of helping others, of doing good, of serving God, of girding ourselves in all the strength of Christian manhood. Duty! Is it your duty to make a sacrifice for others? DO IT. Is it your duty to give up that which is debasing and degrading you, and is bringing your family to poverty, wretchedness, and ruin? DO IT. DO IT. Ah, young men, if I could but prevail upon you in the morning of your life to DO IT!

Young men, thirty-five years ago—nearly thirty-six—I began to speak on the subject of temperance. I was a young man then. I had thirty-six years of life before me. Now those thirty-six years are behind me, and there is not a word I have spoken, not a whisper I have uttered; there is not a line I have written, there is not a mark I have made, that I can change to save my soul. It is my record. And you are making your record.

Some of you turned over a clean, clear page this morning. Look at it now! Are there no blots on it—no marks on it—no stains on it, so that to-night, as you look at your record, you hurriedly close it up? Ah, my friend, you can not close it. You can never remove one single stain from your record. It is there! Sixty years of life! It is an awful thing to live—no good done—a mere life of self-indulgence and sin, leaving the very dregs to be drunk at last, and those dregs bitter beyond description.

Young men, we want you in the strength of your manhood to declare war against this fearful evil. We want all of you. Young ladies, we want you. What a mighty power a woman has! Oh, you ought to help us! Women, you ought to help us. It is an awful thing to see women go into a public-house, and stand up drinking, as I have seen them in this city of London. It shocks us Americans, because we do not see it in America. Women do not go into gin-shops or into public-houses in America. It is awful to see it. And this, too, when we consider what women have to suffer all through the drink.

PARABLE OF A MOUSE AND A CAT.

I remember a little parable—you must not think it out of place—of a mouse that fell into a beer-vat, poor thing! and a cat, passing by, saw the poor mouse struggling. "The mouse said to the cat, 'Help me out of my difficulty.' 'If I do, I shall eat you.' 'Very well: I would rather be eaten by a decent cat than drowned in such a horrible mess of stuff as this is.' It was a sensible cat, and said, 'I certainly shall eat you; and you must promise me, on your word of honor, that I may eat you.' 'Very well, I will give you the promise. I promise.'

"So the cat fished the mouse out, and, trusting to the promise, began to clean its mouth of the abomination, thinking she had better do so before she took a decent meal off the mouse. Meanwhile the mouse darted away, and got into a hole in the corner, where the cat could not get him. 'But didn't you promise me I might eat you?' 'Yes, I did; but don't you know that when I made the promise I was in liquor?'" And how many promises made in liquor have been broken!

I wish young women of this country would be as sensible as one of our own young ladies of whom I spoke at Exeter Hall, who was engaged to a young man to be married. He had promised that he would give up drinking. As they were about being married, she noticed his breath, which smelt of drink, and when the minister said, "Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?" she looked him in the face, and said, "No. You have told me a lie. You promised to give up drinking, and I smell by your breath you have not. And the futue is so black to me if I become your wife, that I take the risk of saying No."

We want all classes to help us. There is a time coming, and coming to us all, when duty is plain. Perhaps some of you will feel it your duty to-night to join in this work and help us. Duty first! DUTY! Your hand in the hand of duty. Let her lead you, whether through storm or sunshine, light or darkness, life or death—DUTY.

Gentlemen and ladies, friends and fellow-citizens, it pays to do your duty—to take the hand of duty in storm or sunshine. It will pay for all time to do duty in the fear of God. DO IT TO-NIGHT, if you clearly see your way.

THE INFIDEL KING FREDERICK AND THE PASTOR.

JOHN VENNING, the celebrated Prussian philanthropist, relates that on one occasion he was in company with the pious pastor Jaenicke at a friend's house. One of the party was endeavoring to palliate the infidelity of Frederick the Great of Prussia, when the good old Jaenicke related the following fact:

King Frederick having invited Voltaire, the noted infidel, to Berlin to propagate his atheistic teachings, a pious clergyman in one of the churches of that town protested against that "viper" and his poisonous doctrines, exhorting his hearers to be on their guard. The king, hearing of it, sent a general to take the clergyman to the State prison of Spandau. The general came and told his errand, and then asked, "What is it you have said in your sermon to offend the king?" The good man spoke to the general with such power of the love of that Saviour whom Voltaire denied, that he declined taking him to prison.

On returning to the king he was asked, "Why, how is it you are so soon back?" The general replied, "If it cost me my life I could not touch a hair of the head of that good man." The king said, "Go back, then, and tell him never to touch on that subject again."

The following Sunday the good pastor again exhorted his congregation to beware of the spreading poison of unbelief that was diffusing its baneful influence over all Germany. The king sent another general on the Monday, with strict injunctions not to enter into any conversation with his prisoner, but to take him to Spandau direct. They set out; but as the road thither is full of deep sand, they travelled slowly. The general at length disobeyed orders, and expressed sorrow at taking him from his family.

The good pastor preached to him likewise Christ crucified; and his great Master gave him power to so deeply impress these important truths on the general's heart that, when about half-way, the latter ordered the driver to turn back to Berlin, set his prisoner free, and went to his majesty, saying, "Order me on any service you please, but I will not touch that good man; I cannot!" The king then contented himself with ordering the faithful preacher to quit Prussia, which he did.

A WHITE FLAG.

THOSE familiar with railway service are glad to see a white flag flung out at the crossings and stations. It tells of safety, and proclaims that all is well. Not so the green flag; that speaks of doubt and uncertainty, and warns the engine-driver to be on his guard; while the red flag tells of danger, collision, and wreck, and arrests the train in its course. One evening, the wife of an old flag-man at a railway station said to her husband, "John, there will be a flag held out to-night—a flag in the hand of Jesus. It will not be a red flag, for there is no danger; it will not be a green one, for, thank God, there is no doubt; but it will be a pure white flag, for all is perfect safety and peace, and I am very nearly at my journey's end." That night she died. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." Reader, would there be a white flag or a red flag held out to-night if you were called to your journey's end? "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord; yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Assembled on Monday, December 2d, for the transaction of public business. The President's message was moderate in tone, and does not suggest any extraordinary measures for legislation. He commenced with a reference to the yellow fever and to the measures he had taken to alleviate the distress it had produced, and recommended Congress to make inquiries as to the best measures to be adopted for averting a recurrence of the plague. He then adverts to the reported intimidations of electors in the Southern States, and announced his intention of taking such steps as would insure to every citizen his just and equal rights. The foreign relations of the Government were stated to be peaceable and generally satisfactory. Mr. Hayes advises that no radical changes be attempted in the existing financial legislation. These points, with comments on the reports from the various Government departments, make up the Presidential message for this session.

The Presidential Campaign.—Although outwardly there is a political calm, yet in the private gathering of our leading politicians there is quite a ferment. The Presidential campaign of 1880 at this early day is being mapped out. Already steps have been taken to secure the Southern delegations to the next National Republican Convention by the friends of the three prominent Republican candidates, General Grant, Senator Conkling, and Mr. Blaine. Notwithstanding many shrewd politicians deny the possibility of General Grant receiving the nomination, it is a fact that he is a great favorite with a large number of the party. At every convention during the fall campaign the mention of his name was greeted with most enthusiastic cheering. Many prominent leaders have declared him to be their first choice, and it may be confidently asserted that if Senator Conkling finds he cannot secure the nomination himself he will throw the whole weight of his influence for General Grant. Some of the leading Republicans do not hesitate to say that Mr. Blaine's day has passed, and that the nomination lies between General Grant and Senator Conkling.

Among the Democrats there is a strong movement in favor of Samuel Tilden, and it cannot be denied that for a few weeks past quite a change in his favor has developed itself not only in a few prominent leaders, but largely among the rank and file of Democracy.

The Greenbackers, so far, have but the one candidate—the indomitable General Butler, who, altogether undismayed by his defeat as their Gubernatorial candidate for Massachusetts, is quietly laying his plans and marshalling his forces for the higher position of the Presidency of the United States.

One Kiss.—In a recent murder trial at Vermont, a certain guilty deacon admitted that he first made the acquaintance of his paramour at a "sociable" at his own house. While old and young were playing an old-fashioned game, the deacon, as a forfeit, was sentenced to kiss Mrs. C. He lays all his troubles to that kiss. After his arrest he stated that until that fatal forfeit he had been true in thought as well as in deed to his wife. The Evangelical Messenger remarks on this that the devil will rejoice to have social evening parties and festivals take the place of prayer meetings and revival meetings.

Mrs. Tait, the wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury, died on Monday, December 2d. The deceased lady was married to Dr. Tait in 1843. Sincere sympathy will be felt for the bereaved prelate, who has previously lost so many members of his family. While head master of Rugby School, in 1856, five of his daughters were attacked with scarlet fever and died in a very short space of time, and only last May his only son, the Rev. Crawford Tait, vicar of St. John's Church, Notting Hill, London, a most earnest and devoted servant of Christ, was carried to his grave.

The loss of the Pommerania, a German steamer, in the English Channel on Monday, November 25th, is another of those terrible disasters with which we are becoming so sadly familiar. The doomed vessel left New York, bound for Hamburg, November 14th, with 109 passengers and a crew numbering 111. She arrived at Plymouth November 24th, where she landed the English passengers and mails; she then proceeded to Cherbourg, where more passengers were landed, after which, in steering towards the English coast, she was enveloped in a dense fog off Folkestone. Suddenly, without any warning, a dense black mass, that afterwards turned out to be the large iron bark Moel Elain, was seen bearing down on her in the darkness, and almost in an instant, while the Pommerania was low in a trough of the sea, the Elain's bow crashed into her side, making a huge rent through which the water poured in such a deluge as sent her to the bottom in twenty minutes. The captain of the Pommerania was on the bridge when the accident occurred, and di all in his power to save the passengers. Hi coolness and presence of mind are said to hav been wonderful. The boats were promptly lowered and filled with the half-dressed, frightene passengers and crew. Rocket signals were fired and a steamer called the Glengarry, which wa providentially near at hand, lowered her boat and rescued many poor creatures who wer struggling with the waves. The captain wa seen at his post when the devoted vessel sank and it was supposed for some time that he wa drowned, but later intelligence stated that h had been picked up by a passing vessel and ca ried to Rotterdam, where he lay dangerously i from the effects of the shock to his nervous sy tem. He is considered an exceedingly able ca tain, and had made 126 voyages in safety betwe New York and Hamburg. It is thought th fifty-six lives must have been lost in the disaste

The British force in Afghanistan is said be in a critical position. It will be recollect that the invasion was made through the Khyb Pass; it is now rumored that the native troo have made a circuitous movement on the fla of the English army, and have occupied the pa in their rear, thus cutting off the invading for from its base and intercepting its supplies. present this is merely a rumor, and à priori mu be regarded as untrustworthy, inasmuch as su a disaster implies culpable negligence so gr on the part of a general as to be almost incre ble. The merest tyro in the art of war would that the protection of his line of communicati was of the first importance. It is probable th the English general relies for his supplies on t Quettah route, or that the reported occupati of the Khyber Pass is untrue.

The members of the American Public Hea Association in session at Richmond do not ag either to as the origin of the late yellow-fe epidemic, or as to the means that should be ployed to prevent a recurrence of the fever. majority of the doctors believe that yellow-fe is always of foreign derivation, and that present epidemic was brought to New Orle by the ship Emily Souder, which arrived th on May 23d, two of whose crew died of yell fever a few days after landing. They also that the only true preventive is absolute n intercourse with infected countries from Apri November, a partial quarantine not being su cient to prevent the disease.

A minority of physicians, including som those who have become most familiar with disease, present a contrary view, almost ide cal with the one reached by the celebrated E lish Yellow Fever Commission many years namely, that yellow-fever is invariably a h product, and not a foreign importation, therefore quarantine regulations are unavai to keep it away from a port where the co tions are peculiarly favorable to its spread. T is, however, no difference of opinion am them as to the value of general sanitary pre tions, and especial attention to drainage and removal of filthy accumulations.

Queen Victoria has cabled a message to her daughter in Canada expressing her satisfaction with the reception given by the loyal Canadians. The message is a model of concise English. It ran, "Delighted with reception. Say so." It would be difficult to express so much meaning in fewer words. The viceregal progress through the dominion has been apparently of the most pleasant character. Everywhere the party have been received with enthusiastic demonstrations of loyalty and respect. Addresses of welcome have poured in, and flags and decorative arches have been displayed with a lavish disregard of expense. Certainly, whatever Lord Lorne's position may have been in his own land, it is clear he is not "de trôp" in the New World. His reception has been characterized by a welcome not to be surpassed for its warmth and enthusiasm in any country on earth.

The dispute between this country and England anent the Fishery Question was the subject of comment in the London Times of November 15th. That organ stated that it was "believed a satisfactory agreement would be effected." The British Government has since then received the $5,500,000 awarded by the commission, so we may presume an agreement has been effected, satisfactory to at least one of the parties to the dispute. It is seldom that both litigants in a suit are satisfied with the result, but Christians of both countries must rejoice that this peaceable mode of settling differences is superseding the mode of arbitration by the sword. Arbitration may from a variety of causes fail in doing justice; the court may be packed with partial judges, it may be incompetent, or may be prejudiced by preconceived ideas, or biassed by the superior eloquence of the representatives of one of the disputants; but with all its faults it is a step in the right direction, for it is in the direction of civilization and Christianity, and however it may err it saves bloodshed and contrasts favorably with the arbitrament of the sword, which ignores right and adjudges the victory to the strongest.

The famine in China, one of the most terrible calamities that ever visited any country, has at length come to an end, the long-looked-for rain having at last descended in copious showers on the parched ground. The number who died from this awful visitation will never be ascertained, but the reports speak of populous towns wholly depopulated, of roads strewn with human skeletons, of frequent cases of cannibalism, and of whole families having no means of subsistence but the bark of trees. Christian philanthropists of all nations contributed liberally to the assistance of the starving millions while the famine lasted, and the Chinese Ministers of State have sent a graceful and grateful acknowledgment of this assistance. The communication has been sent to the Marquis of Salisbury, the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, to be by him transmitted to the donors to the fund. Let us hope that the Chinese people may be led by this act of Christian benevolence, which they appear to highly appreciate, to see also the value of the Christian religion, the principles of which were the motives which actuated the donors in sending the sorely needed help.

Persecution in Spain.—Don Jorge Simeon Bonettiel Tanti, Protestant pastor of Alcoy, has, by the municipal judge of Alcoy, been thrown into the common jail to suffer two months' imprisonment. His offence was that he interfered to prevent the parish priest of the Church of Rome from molesting a dying woman who was a Protestant during her last years. The priest, when the dying woman was all but unconscious, pretended that he had reconciled her to Rome. Then over her remains alcalde and priest struggled against the will of the family, against the entreaties and protests of the pastor, to convey the coffin to a Roman Catholic cemetery. Benottiel was, therefore, accused of having been wanting in proper deference to the alcalde. His cell is a horrible, dark, damp, foul-smelling den, which would not be tolerated in England for the worst criminal.

Rev. Richard H. Storrs, D.D., completed the thirty-second year of his pastorage of the Church of the Pilgrims, in Brooklyn, on Sunday, November 24th. There was no special service commemorative of the anniversary, and possibly very many of the congregation were unaware of the fact until referred to by the Doctor in the course of his sermon. He is universally respected as a Christian gentleman, and his efficiency in the pulpit is attested to by the fact that his church is one of the most prosperous in the city. He has had no other pastorate, and the church has had no other pastor.

A Committee of the English House of Lords has been sitting for some time to inquire into the subject of intemperance. Among the eminent medical men who have been summoned before it to give testimony is Dr. B. W. Richardson, F.R.S., who unhesitatingly condemned the use of intoxicating liquors. After he had given his evidence the following examination took place:

"LORD ABERDARE—I presume it is distinctly your opinion that if all the alcoholic liquor in the world could be tapped and let flow and disappear, the world would be much the better for it?

"I think the world would be much the better.

"And that we should be stronger and healthier?

"I think we should be stronger, healthier, and better.

"And the spirits more cheerful?

"The spirits would be more regular.

"And that life would be lengthened?

"Yes, life would be lengthened; I can come to no other conclusion."

Such an opinion from such an authority needs no comment.

How He got a Situation.—A colporteur in a country district says: "I stopped one morning at a blacksmith's shop. The forge was glowing brightly, and the anvil ringing merrily. But as soon as I opened my bundle and showed them the beautiful new books, the men left their work and gathered round me. One was a young man of twenty-five. He told me that when he first left home to earn a living for himself his mother gave him a Bible. He put it into his pocket and started. He went to shop after shop, but without success; all were full. Not discouraged, he determined to try yet once more; but here came the same cold answer, 'We have enough.' Tired out and disheartened, he sat down upon a block in this shop, and, having nothing else to do, pulled out his mother's Bible and commenced reading. Soon the owner came up, and, observing him, asked, 'What book are you reading?' 'The Bible,' was the reply. 'You can go to work,' said the owner; 'I will give you employment.'" Reader, never be ashamed to read your Bible. "Them that honor Me I will honor, saith the Lord."

Another English Temperance Restaurant was opened at 61 Gracechurch Street, London, by the People's Café Company on November 12th. Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., presided. Mr. M'Dougal, the manager, mentioned the following encouraging facts: "To the coffee-house near the Victoria Docks as many as four hundred workmen go every morning to obtain a cup of tea or coffee before going to work. The Drummond Street house has proved a great success. On Saturday 7*l.* ($35) was taken in halfpence for cups of coffee, etc. Another place for working-men was being fitted up at Rotherhithe. At the Ludgate Hill and St. Paul's Churchyard establishments the charges were extremely moderate, and the quality unexceptionable, and none of the female waiters were allowed to receive fees. They had found it profitable to divide one fourth of the net profits every month amongst their employés. That evening he had to divide 80*l.* amongst the employés at these establishments. At St. Paul's Churchyard restaurant 4000*l.*, and at Ludgate Circus 10,000*l.* per annum was taken, the former being attended on the average by 2200 persons daily. The shareholders of the past as well as the future would receive a good dividend."

PROSTRATE ONES LIFTED UP.

A Discourse by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Jesus came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them."—MARK 1:31.

Healing of the Fever of Peter's Wife's Mother—(1). Christ Similarly Comes in Contact with us by Having Taken the Nature of Man, and by Coming near to Sinful Men, even the Worst, and also by the Preaching of the Gospel—(2). Christ Lifts us up by the Encouraging Facts that He has Saved Others as Bad as we are, and that His Salvation is all of Grace, that He has Cured the Worst Cases, etc.—Anecdote of the Ambassador and the Galley-Slave—The Skilful Physician, etc.

PETER'S wife's mother was sick of a very terrible fever. It was no ordinary fever; but it is called by the evangelist a great fever. Now it is of the nature of fevers to lay their patients very prostrate, weak, and helpless; and Simon's wife's mother was in a state of extreme prostration. Even after the fever departs the patient is generally in this feeble state; but it is clear that our Lord, with the thoroughness which ever distinguished all His miracles, not only intended to heal her and to heal her at once; but He meant that she should have no lingering weakness after the fever had departed—no period of partial convalescence.

I dare say the poor patient had almost given up all hope; and it is very likely that those round about her would also have despaired but for their faith in the Great Physician to heal. It was, therefore, for her encouragement that our Lord stooped over the bed and took the poor patient by the hand, giving her confidence in His powers by showing her that, however malignant the fever might be, He was not afraid.

and she, yielding to the kindly pressure, sat up, not in the prostrate weakness so common after fever has left the sick, but in strength—for she began at once to minister to them, as the good housewife seeking their comfort.

Now I believe there are many in every congregation, and therefore that there are also many here on this occasion, whom Jesus Christ means to bless and to heal of the spritual weakness and prostration under which they are laboring. Like Peter's wife's mother, their hope may be gone, their spirit sinks within them, they can not believe there is healing for them, or that mercy is waiting to go forth on their behalf. They have relinquished all hope, their faith is all gone, and they are full of despair.

Now there are two things which Jesus did in connection with this fever-stricken woman, which I hope He will do for you to-night—He came in contact with her, and then He healed her: and by the word of His servant who now speaks to you, may He show you that He comes in contact with you; and then may He lift you up with some cheering word out of His gospel!

(1) My first point, then, is to tell you prostrate souls that Jesus Christ comes into contact with you. You think, distressed friend, that Christ will have nothing to do with you. You have read and heard about Him, but He seems to you to be a very long way off—

SO FAR THAT YOU CAN NOT REACH HIM.

Neither is it at all probable, as you think, that He will ever come this way and look upon you in your weak and helpless and prostrate condition. Now listen! In the first place, Jesus Christ has come into contact with you, for you are one of the race of men; and Jesus Christ became a man for the sake of men. Do not forget that He is God—"God over all, God, blessed for ever"—and yet He deigned to be born into this world an infant, and to live here under the same conditions as the rest of us—bearing the same sickness, and weakness, and sorrow, and death for our sakes. Now, do not think of Jesus, I pray you, as though He were a spirit, but think of Him as a man like yourselves, eating and drinking as others did; not a recluse, shutting Himself up, BUT A PERFECT SPECIMEN OF OUR MANHOOD ; and so, in this manner He has come near to you. You would not be afraid of speaking to a man : then come to Jesus and speak to Him now. He was not a man of haughty spirit who said] to men, " Stand by, for I am holier than thou !" But He was full of love and affection for men. Even little children came and clustered at His feet ; and, instead of driving them away, He said, " Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

HE NEVER REPELLED EVEN THE WORST OF MANKIND

when they approached Him, but drew them nearer to Himself ; and even to the wicked and rebellious ones in Jerusalem He said, " How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

Come, then, distressed spirit ; see, in the very fact that Jesus was man, incarnate God—see, I say, in that very fact, that He has come near to you, and laid His hand upon you ! " Ah," say you, " I can understand that He has come near to men ; but I am a sinful man, and He will not come near to such as me." Listen ; won't you be lifted up when I tell you that he has come near to sinful men ? His name is Jesus, the Saviour of sinners ; and His object was not to seek saints, but to seek out lost sinners. My Master's errand was not to the good, to the excellent, to the righteous ; no ! It was exactly to the evil and the unrighteous. As He said Himself, " They that be whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance." Ah, friend, if He did not come to sinners, WHY CAME HE AS A SACRIFICE ?

A sacrifice is only wanted for sin ; an atonement is only needed for guilt ; and to you as a guilty one He comes, and puts His hand upon you to-night. He is not far off from you because of your sin, but it was precisely because you were a sinner that He came to save you.

Do I hear you say, as in a whisper, afraid that any should hear you, " I am not only a sinner, but a great one ; beyond the ordinary standard of sin ; and there are points in which the crimson of my guilt is of a deeper dye than that of other men ?" Listen ! Jesus came to save the chief of sinners. Do you see Him on the Cross, suffering those intolerable pangs ? Do you hear Him in His death's agony cry out, " My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me ?" Do you think that all this meant —that such a death was endured only for trifling offences, for mere peccadilloes and insignificant mistakes ? The grandeur of the atonement was that its object was to remove sin, however great it might be. The Son of God was the Saviour, and there must have been to need the Son of God to remove it. The records of His life make it clear that Jesus came in contact with great sinners and His hearers were largely composed of such characters.

THAT HE WAS ONLY DYING FOR LITTLE SINS

Did not the Pharisees say, " This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them ?" They put it on record that Jesus drew sinners unto Him ; they wished it to be known that His preaching attracted such characters ; and Jesus Himself never seems to have been surprised that He did, and He never appears to have expressed disgust that He should have fallen into what the world regarded as such a low and vulgar line of things.

O NO ; HE SWEPT THE HOUSE

for the lost piece of money ; He was ready to receive the wandering son ; He it was who sought the lost sheep ; He came into contact with the very worst of sinners. I want you to feel this : that my Lord Jesus Christ was a man who came to do Him good ; " not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many." He came not to seek benefits for Himself, but to bestow blessings upon others ; not to seek out here and there a distinguished chraracter, but to seek sin-stricken souls and to bless them. So in this respect, also, He is come near to men. Remember this, that His last thought, as He went up into heaven, was for others, for sinners—" Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature ;" and He said further, " beginning at Jerusalem, where those lived that crucified Me, where they live who have stained their hands with My blood. Begin with them, and then go into all the world to every creature, and say, ' Whosoever believeth on Me shall have everlasting life.' "

And there is one solemn thought to-night which I want you to ponder. Having entered this house of prayer to-night, and heard the sermon, Christ is come into contact with you in such a way that you will never lose the impress of that contact, whether you are lost or saved. If you are lost, you will have the guilt of having rejected Him ; neither can you shake it off, do what you may. For, to every one who hears the Gospel there is a saviour in it—to some it is a saviour of life unto life ; to others it is a saviour of death unto death. You can not go out of this house of prayer as you came in ; either the word will heal and save you, or it will be with you as with the Jews, who said, " His blood be on our own heads." To you who reject it, it will be a perpetual curse.

You shall either be cleansed from the guilt of sin by the blood of Christ, or you shall be in the same category with those who nailed Him to the accursed tree. Oh ! be assured of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you."

(2) AFTER JESUS GRASPED THAT WOMAN'S HAND

He began gently to lift her up. She sat upright, and was perfectly healed. Now there are here to-night some prostrate souls who want some one to give them a hand ; and my object is to mention a few things which, if you will consider them, may give you a lift.

You say you want to be saved, but you fear you never will be, and despair and fear paralyze your heart.

Well, remember that others who were much in the same condition as you have been saved. Look round, and find some Christian friend, and tell him your peculiar experience ; and he will say, " That is nothing peculiar, it is just as I was myself." Try whether you can not find some who have been just like yourself, who have nevertheless been saved ; and hence the reasoning for you is very clear indeed. For if A is saved, and B is just like A, then why can not B expect also to be saved in the same way ?

" Ah," you say, " I have very few acquaintances, and so I can not expect to find any one like myself."

Then I will give you another test. Take up your Bible, and see if any of the instances of conversion given in it were not very much like your own case. And if that does not do, turn to the promises of Christ and see if there is not one that seems made for such as you are ; and I think you can not go far without saying, " I think that looks as if it were even written entirely for me. It is such an accurate description that it must mean me." And if you find that Christ has known such, and saved such, then why not you ?

HAVE YOU BEEN A THIEF ? REMEMBER

" The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day ;
And there may I, though vile as he,
Wash all my guilt away."

Have you been a sinner in a very immodest sense ? Remember there was a woman who was such a sinner, who washed His feet with her tears and wiped them with the hair of her head.

HAVE YOU BEEN A SWEARER ?

I think that Simon Peter probably had been a big swearer before his conversion, or he would not have used such words afterwards. It must have been an old habit breaking out afresh ; and yet he was not only saved, but he became one of the very chief of the Apostles. I could mention no sin, but I could also say " Such a one was received and saved, then why not you ? Hence be of good courage, poor sinner, for why should not you also be saved ?"

Let me try to give you another lift up. Salvation is all of Grace—that is to say, it is altogether of God's free favor. God does not save any man because there is any thing in the man that deserves salvation. He saves whom He will save, for this is one of his grand prerogatives, of which he is very tenacious. He says : " I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy ; and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy."

Well now, if it be God's will that He bestows mercy upon whom He will, even upon the vilest of sinners, why may He not save you ? Is not that a lift up for you ? Why should not He show mercy upon you ? You have been reasoning wrongly, and saying, " Why should He save me ?" But God has always saved, and why should He not save you for reasons outside of yourself ? He never has revealed His reasons, and He never will. He says : " Shall I not do what I will with mine own ?" We have all forfeited every particle of claim on the ground of merit ; and when the Lord bestows His mercy, He bestows it where He pleases. And why should He not therefore bestow it upon you and save you ?

FOR REASONS WHICH HE ALONE KNEW ;

I once heard of an ambassador who was and as the soveregin wished to do him honor, he said that any convict he liked to select should be released from being a galley-salve. So the ambassador took the following plan of finding out whom he would release : He went to one and asked, " Why are you here ? What have you done that is wrong ?" " I was led into it," was the reply ; " I was led on by other people." " Ah," said the ambassador, " I must leave you here." On another convict being similarly asked, he replied, " I was perfectly innocent, and never did any crime at all, but was condemned through the evidence of perjured witnesses." He too was passed over. At last the ambassador came to a man who, on being asked why he was there, said he was there because he deserved it. He said he had committed many crimes, and richly merited even a more severe punishment. " Indeed," he said, " I count myself happy that I was not condemned to die." The ambassador at once selected him to be released, saying to him, " You are a great deal too bad a fellow to be in the company of these innocent men." He received a free pardon without delay.

Similarly, when the Lord gives pardon to anybody, it generally is to the man who feels he does not deserve it. " You are the man for me," he says, and at once gives him a free pardon. I wish that might be a lift for you to-night. If there is nothing in you but utter badness ; if you can not say one good word for yourself, you are the man ; for salvation is all of grace, and freely comes from the hand of God. I think that ought to lift you up ! God grant that it may !

If that does not do, we will try again. Faith in Jesus Christ always does save the soul. Nothing but simple trust is needed. Nay, as we were saying,

" He will save you,
He will save you
Just now."

Many souls have tried it, and it has always saved them.

But some people tell us that this is immoral teaching, and that we ought to preach good works. But we say that faith in Jesus Christ saves men from living in sin ; and that we do not act as children who take flowers and stick them in their little gardens, and say, " Come and look what pretty flowers we have got." No, but your faith in Jesus is the seed of all virtue. Faith in Christ saves from the power of sin as well as from the guilt of sin, the habit of sin as well as from its pollution. This can not be an immoral doctrine which has brought millions to Christ and to heaven. You will never perform any good works without they spring from faith in Christ.

But let me yet give you another lift up. You may say, "I know what believing is, but I can not get to it ; I know what praying is, but I can not pray ; I know what repentance is, but I can not repent." Well, here is a text which will be a lift for you : "Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought !" Oh ! can you not look up, and ask that blessed Spirit to come and help you now? What if your heart be hard ; the Spirit of God can make it soft in a moment. What if it seems impossible? What if now you seem to be the very reverse of what you ought to be? Look to Jesus Christ, and the blessed Spirit can change your nature, opening the blind eye and unstopping the deaf ear, taking away the stony heart, and giving you a heart of flesh. Oh, poor soul ! I know you can not help yourself, but my Lord the Holy Ghost can help you. Oh ! thou Holy Spirit, breathe upon these dry bones, and quicken them into life and activity.

But let me try to give you another lift. If you are ultimately lost your punishment will only show the justice of God. But your being saved will show forth the mercy of God ; and "He delighteth in mercy." Jesus loves to do big things, and to show great mercy ; and if there is here an odd man, a corner man, a renowned sinner, let me tell you that the Lord will save you ; for the very devils in hell will know about it, and be vexed and annoyed. "What, old Jack, old Harry, brought to know the Lord?" We like to have such converts, they make such noise among the Philistines, and they ask, "Who next will go?"

When a doctor gets a great name, and patients have to wait from hour to hour to see him, do you think he got his fame by slight cures, such as of sore fingers and warts and chapped hands? Why, there was who was given up by all the others, and his leg had to be amputated. A doctor said, "I understand that case, and will cure it." And he did cure it, and everybody heard about it. Yes, one bad case goes farther than a thousand little ones. And you, big sinner, who have tried all the forms of sin, and run into all the webs and tangles of crime, you don't understand your case yourself, but my blessed Lord and Master has a sacred way of healing ; and heaven and earth and hell shall hear of it, and proclaim His fame.

Again, Jesus Christ has pardoned sinners in an instant ; black as midnight one moment, they are white as noon the next. Have you seen the Laocoon and his sons, with monstrous snakes twisted about their limbs? It was impossible to uncoil the monsters, and it was impossible to drag them off. But look to Jesus, just now, and the monstrous snakes of sin shall drop off at your feet. Neither shall they molest you any more ; for "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." He shall set his foot upon the serpent's head ; and that fearful foot shall crush the life out of your sins, and they shall trouble you no more. Christ will give you light, deliverance, pardon ; and you need not, should not despair. Only trust Him, only trust Him, and He will save you just now.

THE VOYAGE OF THE SHIP EGLANTINE.

CHRISTIAN HILLIARD'S announcement to the sailors that he would go with them in the ship caused a profound sensation among them. The rain had ceased, and the low west was a sea of golden glory. The dark clouds flushed into rosy beauty, and the cold, grey waves grew warm in the glowing brightness. In the fulness of the evening light stood Christian Hilliard, the gleams from the setting sun shining on his rich brown hair and sunburnt face. The rough sailors looked at him in astonishment, and then a murmur of satisfaction rose from their midst. "It ain't likely he'd go if he knew the planks were rotten," they said. "Old Hilliard would take good care he didn't send his only son to sea in any but a safe ship."

Cairns stepped forward, his face glowing with honest admiration. "Do you really mean that, Mr. Christian?"

"I do ; if my presence will be any guarantee of the soundness of the vessel, you shall have it."

It was not without an effort that he said the words. A voyage in this uncomfortable, disreputable looking vessel was not at all to his fastidious taste, and his unconquerable dislike to all the unpleasant evils of a small merchant ship was stronger than ever ; but he was not one to let inclination take predecence of duty. He had promised to give some satisfactory proof of the Eglantine's seaworthiness, and this was absolutely the only means left him of doing so. At one moment the thought had crossed him of doing to Grant, and asking the result of his survey ; but he was in London, and there was no time to write to him, even if he had made up his mind to do so. The course of action he had adopted was the only one that would have the desired effect, to prove to the crew that he thoroughly believed the Eglantine to be seaworthy.

"What do you say, mates?" said Cairns, turning towards them. "Will you go if the young master goes with us?"

"He don't know anything about vessels," shouted the man who had expressed his wish to send Mr. Hilliard to sea with Old Nick. "He don't know a rotten plank from a sound one."

"That is not the question," said Christian calmly. "I do not know much about such things, I confess, but the question is this : Will my presence be sufficient proof that my father has good reason to believe the ship to be seaworthy? Yes or no."

"Yes," was the ready answer.

"Then I shall go with you, and let us hope for a quick voyage, for I'm not fond of the sea, my men. It hasn't served me well in my time. There was a comical look in his brown eyes as he spoke, and the men laughed outright. "Three cheers for the young master!" they cried, and the air rang with the shout.

"He won't go, not he!" said the only one who had refused to join in the cheer. "Wait till he gets home and tells his father what he's done! he'll hear some'ut more about the Eglantine. His father ain't told him everything."

At the insulting words Christian's hot blood was roused. "Who is that man?" he asked imperatively. "Step here a moment."

The man came forward, with a look of dogged resolution on his rugged face.

"Do you wish for a discharge?" asked Christian quietly. The cool, self-possessed tone had its effect, and the man was subdued.

"Not if you really do go 'long with us," he answered, after a moment's pause ; "I reckon we may trust the old ship then. Your father knows what he's about."

The man was right ; Richard Hilliard did know what he was about, but this decision of his son's was not one of the results he had calculated upon ; it was one, however, eminently fitted to bring home to him, and force him to realize, the true nature of his transactions. When he sent his ships to sea, he had calculated what his pecuniary position would be if they were lost, and had insured accordingly ; but he had never taken into his reckoning the tears of parents made childless, the agony of the widow, and the desolation of the orphan which resulted from the foundering of a ship. No insurance covered those ; but with the callous indifference of avarice Mr. Hilliard "cared for none of these things." Intent on making money, he overlooked minor matters, as he considered them. It had seemed as if he would go on until the end and know no awakening of consicence till the dread day when God demanded of him an account of his sailors' deaths, and he vainly asked, as the first murderer did, Am I my brother's keeper? (Genesis 4, 9.) It remained now to be seen whether his son's resolve to go in an unseaworthy ship would open his eyes.

To Christian also this matter was serious. He was staking his life on his father's assurance, and even if the voyage ended safely it could bring him no pleasure, and it involved separation from his friends and from one he loved very dearly.

He was meditating on these things, as he rode slowly up the pleasant road leading to the open country. "I'm booked for a voyage!" he thought. "I wonder what Maud will say to it." A smile lightened the thoughtfulness of his face as he turned up a narrow carriage-drive leading to a pretty rose-covered villa. At one of the low windows stood a girl, with a face lovely as a poet's dream. Rich masses of soft brown hair swept back from the low, white forehead, and large, dreamy eyes, of almost Southern light and warmth, looked up from beneath the long lashes with a glad welcome at the approaching visitor.

"Late again, sir!" she said, with a sunny smile. "I was just going to put on my hat and go out."

"Were you?" said Christian, sceptically ; "I wonder which way you would have gone ; down the Limerick Road, I suppose."

"Indeed, I should not," was the instant reply. "I should have gone in exactly the opposite direction."

Christian laughed : Limerick Road was the one he usually came by. Riding round to the side of the house, he gave his horse in charge of a boy, and returned to the window. "Are you alone, Maud?" he asked, stepping into the pretty little room. "Your father is out, of course, but where is your mother?"

"They are all out," said Maud, the rich bloom mounting to her beautiful face as, laying his hands on her bare white shoulders, he held her at a little distance, looking at her with undisguised admiration. "Mamma has not been well all day, and papa thought a drive would do her good. They have gone to Westbrook."

"So much the better ; I shall have you all to myself for an hour."

"What is the matter, Christian? You look as if something had annoyed you."

"So it has, dear. I don't know what you will say when I tell you."

"Be quick!" she said, raising her laughing eyes to his handsome face. "I was always famous for my impatience ; don't keep me in suspense, there's a dear boy. What is it? Has your favorite horse broke his leg, or has Tycho gone mad? Nothing less could bring that cloud to your face."

"It's less in one way, because nobody is hurt, but in its consequences it may be more to you and me. I'm going abroad, little one—going to Quebec. What say you to that?"

"Christian! then it is you, not Tycho, who has gone mad! What you do mean?"

"I'm sorry to say my meaning is only too plain. I have been down to the docks and booked myself for a voyage in the Eglantine—a dirty, black, tarry hulk," he replied, with a look of disgust at the recollection. "I think I've been a fool, Maud, but as usual I acted on impulse, and of course did the very thing I ought to have avoided."

Drawing her down by his side he told her of his promise to the men, and of his father's refusal to let him see the all-important letter. "What else could I do under the circumstances, darling?" he said, in conclusion. "I was bound to satisfy the men, and that was the only way left. You and I have cause to know what my father is: he never changes his mind."

For three years Christian Hilliard had loved this brown-haired Maud with a passionate love such as few men are capable of feeling. Three long years they had been, and now at the end of them the future looked no brighter, for Mr. Hilliard still withheld his consent, and Mr. Ingleton, Maud's father, angry and indignant, spoke seriously of breaking off the engagement entirely. But Christian had pleaded for a little longer grace. "I will try my father again," he said, "and if he still refuses, I will leave him, and get some employment, and win a home for my wife. It shall not go on like this much longer." They were no idle words, Mr. Ingleton knew, and so he held his peace, waiting for Christian to act. And Christian waited a propitious moment. "I must take my father in a good mood," he said; "I must speak when a vessel has made an extra lucrative voyage." The time had come, he thought, when this unfortunate affair of the Eglantine had turned up, and now Mr. Hilliard was in one of his worst possible moods; angry with Christian, with Captain Thorpe, and with the men of the Eglantine.

"What will he say about this new scheme of yours?—it cannot be called scheme, though," said Maud; "this Quixotic attempt to protect his honor, I ought to say."

"Quixotic?" echoed Christian, reproachfully. "Maud, is that what you call it? I own I was hasty in the first place in promising to show them Grant's letter, and yet even now I cannot blame myself for doing so. It seems the most natural thing I could do under those circumstances. That my father would object never once entered into my head; why should he object? It is only that confounded pride of his that comes in the way. My darling, don't you think with me, that something ought to be done to set those poor fellows' minds at rest? Do you think we, as shipowners, have a right to force men to go in a ship which they fear is not seaworthy?"

"Certainly not, Christian, and yet I cannot bear for you to go in the Eglantine. If anything is wrong——"

"Maud!" interrupted Christian, hastily, "do you think what you are saying? What can be wrong with the Eglantine? Has not Grant, a man who thoroughly understands his business, pronounced her perfectly safe?"

Maud was silent; she could not bear to speak the thought that would force itself upon her reluctant mind—"But you have only your father's word as to the contents of Grant's letter."

"Must you go?" she said at last. "Is there no other way of settling it all? I wish you had not promised."

"My dear, I was obliged to. I could not hear all they were saying about my father, and not take some step in the matter. I could not show them the letter, so I did the sole remaining thing—said I'd go with them. It was the only way of protecting my father's good name and keeping my own word."

"Yes, I suppose it was, but it is not right, Christian: your father ought to have given them the proof they asked; it was a little enough thing."

"Yes," he answered reluctantly, "I suppose he ought, dear." It went against the grain to condemn his father, even to her, for he had always been kind and indulgent to him, humoring his whims, and giving way to his capricious fancies as few parents would have done. Only in this one matter of his engagement to Maud Ingleton had he ever crossed him, and Christian was not without hope that even in this he would yield.

It was later than usual when he left Mr. Ingleton's house that night. He rode quickly along the deserted roads, his thoughts dwelling anxiously upon the impending interview with his father.

"I wonder what he'll say," he murmured. "Surely he cannot object to what I have done now. I cannot help it if he does: I have given my word."

That was enough, he had given his word. People sometimes wondered where Christian Hilliard had got his chivalrous ideas of honor. Not from his father, certainly, for he proverbially believed in being all things to all men, that is to say, among his equals and in the way of business. Few men knew better how to look after his own interests than he. and he looked with a contemptuous pity upon men who would allow an over-strained sense of honor to stand in the way of some lucrative business transaction. The fact was, he could not understand such men; they were out of his world.

His son Christian was often a soucre of wonderment to him, and yet in him he could trace the characteristics of his mother's house; for the rich shipowner had married out of his own rank, and had placed at the head of his establishment the fair-haired patrician daughter of an ancient but impoverished house, and from her Christian had inherited not only his personal beauty, and the indolent grace and ease of manner peculiar to her order, but the high integrity and sense of honor which stamped his character, and won for him universal respect.

Mr. Hilliard sat at his desk, busy with calculations and accounts. It was an anxious time just then, and he gave up most of his evenings to business. He did not look up as his son entered, and Christian silently drew a chair to the table and sat down. He was in no hurry to speak, though he felt that it would be a relief to have the interview over. At last Mr. Hilliard closed his book and looked up.

"Rather late, isn't it?" he said, pushing back his chair, and glancing at the clock. This was the usual signal for going to bed. Christian refused to recognize it.

"It is late, but I have been detained. Well, father, don't you wish to know the result of my visit to the docks?"

For a moment Mr. Hilliard hesitated: he did wish very much to know what course the men were taking; not that he feared much trouble in the matter, for he knew he should have already received notice from Captain Thorpe had the men proved obstinate, but he wanted to know how Christian had quieted them. With concealed anxiety he replied, "I suppose the crew have come to their senses."

"I don't know about that; some of them are not over-burdened with sense at the best of times, and some of them seem to have a pretty fair share; but I don't think either have returned to their senses, for the simple reason that they have never left them. They are all in their right mind now, at any rate."

"Did Thorpe send any message to me?"

"No: he seems a good sort of fellow; we shall get on all right together, I think. What is the etiquette of merchant ships, sir? The captain stands first, I suppose, no matter who is on board? Well, we shan't quarrel about that."

"Who won't quarrel?"

"Thorpe and I. I am going with the Eglantine to Quebec; it was the only way of satisfying the men."

"You are going to Quebec in the Eglantine!" repeated Mr. Hilliard slowly, gazing at his son like a man in a dream.

"Yes; pleasant prospect, isn't it?"

"What do you mean?"

Christian looked up in surprise at the tone. "I was bound in honor to satisfy the crew," he answered quietly. "You refused to let me do so in the way I wished and intended, so I was forced to accept the only alternative. The crew said my presence would be a sufficient guarantee of the vessel's soundness, and that if I went they would trust themselves with me."

"On what grounds? You know nothing of ships."

"No, but you do. My going proves that I believe the ship to be seaworthy, and they know that you are my warrant for the belief. Is not that sufficient security? Why, it is really more satisfactory than showing them Grant's letter. They know I would not trust my precious life to rotten planks."

"Christian, are you mad?" cried his father angrily. "I never heard such a wild, insane idea in my life."

"Nevertheless it was absolutely the only thing left for me to do."

"It was nothing of the kind. The men would have gone fast enough without that. They would not be the first crew who have rebelled and learned to their cost that ships are not playthings, and shipowners children. I would have taught them a lesson."

"How?"

"How! why by putting the law in force against them. The choice lay between that or the prison, and you would have seen fast enough then how much their fears amounted to."

"I cannot agree with you, sir. It is entirely against my principles to force men into actions which their judgment condemns."

"You will not go on board the Eglantine with my consent," returned his father, growing pale with anger.

"Excuse me," said Christian, with the quiet courtesy he never lost, even though his father tried his patience sorely, "I must go: it is no matter of choice now, unless, indeed, you prefer showing Grant's letter. I suppose that would serve them."

"No!" retorted his father furiously; "they shall never see it, and you shall not go."

Christian rose. "It is worse than useless to argue, sir," he said gravely; "I am not accustomed to break my word."

They stood opposite each other, the father and son, both equally determined and resolute. For some moments they were silent, for a fearful suspicion was forcing itself on Christian's mind. Scarcely daring to face his father, he turned his head in another direction. "What is your reason for objecting so strongly to my going?" he asked.

"Reason enough. It is encouraging the men, it is defying my authority," replied Mr. Hilliard, almost beside himself with mingled terror and anger. "Once more, I forbid your going: do you hear?"

"Is there anything wrong with the Eglantine?" said Christian, under his breath, feeling like a traitor as he spoke, yet forced into speech by the overwhelming dread.

"Wrong with the Eglantine? What should be wrong with her?" answered his father, his voice sinking from its pitch of excitement, as he felt the necessity for self-control.

"Is she perfectly seaworthy?" asked Christian, looking full at his father's drooping eyes with his own honest, fearless ones.

"She is seaworthy."

"Then I shall go."

A TRUE CHINESE CONVERT.

KO-SAN-LONE, a converted Chinese, when in America on a visit, was deeply impressed with the little difference he saw between the style of living of many professing Christians and the people of the world. Adverting to the matter on one occasion, he said, making at the same time a large sweep with his arm, "When the disciples in my country come out from the world, they come clear out."

The Thessalonians, too, came clear out; for the Apostle Paul said of them, "Ye were ensamples to all that believed in Macedonia and Achaia" (1 Thessalonians 1 : 7). They did not separate themselves from gross idolaters, and remain united with others less vicious and sinful; but "they turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven."

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE.

REMARKS OF THE REV. DR. TYNG, SR.

I HOPE I may be excused in the opening of the interesting service of this afternoon—a sight so new to me, circumstances so remarkable in my experience—for saying a few simple words in reference to the whole subject now before us. November will finish the fifty-ninth year of my poor laboring in the preaching of the Lord's Gospel. Well do I remember more than fifty years ago when the great truth of a Saviour's pre-millennial coming burst upon my mind. As a young man in the South, travelling long distances to preach His Word, I was met with much—I will not say ridicule, but with kind and affectionate remonstrance. The world was unprepared around me for any such enunciation, and yet it seemed to me to be the clearest sunlight of the page of Scripture, involved in every real promise of the Gospel, and making the one great foundation upon which all the truth and all the hope of that Gospel rested. I looked at it then entirely alone. I scarcely knew a minister of any class around me that would believe it at all. It seemed to them to be an undervaluing of all the efforts of that which they called the Christian Church. I was ready, and I have always been ready, to love those whom my Master loves, and wherever I find the temple in which He dwells. I find the Church which I acknowledge, older in its establishment than Apostolic authority, and grander and wider in its extent than any denominational organization.

In the full conviction that the divine election manifests itself in those whom God had chosen in complete conversion of the soul to Himself, in a Saviour's love, my heart and hand went out as a youthful minister to every servant of Jesus, wherever I met him. Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, all seemed to me like brothers of another name, as I had brothers of almost every name in the large family in which I was born. I looked at them as brothers. They were not less my brothers because not called by my name; not less near to me because called by names which no one around me would seem to acknowledge. They were my brethren. They loved the same Saviour. They had found their peace at the same foot-stool of grace and mercy. They had been created anew with the same power of the Holy Ghost, and they came to me as face answereth face in the waters. I have known no church on earth so absolute as the Church of God's elect. I have known no family of the children of God but that which bears in their very forehead and character the mark of Divine acceptance, the work of Divine power, and the fruits of Divine holiness.

The languages of earth are multiplied, the language of Heaven is but one. I meet my brethren here on that basis. Nothing can be sacrificed. There is nothing to be sacrificed when we come together as the servants of one God—I will not say under the shadow, but the sunlight of our glorious hope. I believe as fully in the personal advent of my blessed Saviour in His own time as in the sunrise of to-morrow morning, and look for it as confidently. It may come in my time. Many things have come within this period. It certainly will come within somebody's time; but anybody's generation in which it does come will find multitudes still doubting, Pharisees still questioning, Sadducees still opposing, and I trust many children of Israel looking for deliverance, and rejoicing in the fulness of the salvation which is presented. Dear brethren, after listening to the brethren who read to us this morning, I went home and felt as if eagle's wings were put upon me; a new flight, a new purpose. I cannot tell you the joy that comes to my lonely mind upon this subject, in hearing such asseverations of the truth. The Lord be praised for this meeting. I freely believe its results will be most important and precious to look at for the blessing to come upon all churches who will receive the truth, while darkness and sadness must rest upon those who will refuse it. The Lord of Heaven be with us and bless us, and in the fulness of His grace accept us and make part and portion with His own presence, when in glory He shall return to gather His flock into one and to set up a dominion that shall be without end forevermore.

THE PRESENT AGE AND DEVELOPMENT OF ANTICHRIST.

Prevalent Delusions as to Antichrist—His Various Forms and Titles—The Beast, the Little Horn—Personality of Antichrist—His Power and Destruction.

IT is quite usual to regard Antichrist as a personification of any thing that opposes Christ. As it is the great power on which Satan relies to forward his cause in this age, he has continued to throw around the word a speculative or mystical or spiritualized sense that takes away the literal and personal power of this mighty adversary. As against this confusion of Satan, let us look at the Antichrist of prophecy. Antichrist is not an abstract principle of evil. Many talk of the fact and thought of evil, and deny the personality of Satan, the grand and subtle enemy of God. So as the Devil has invented many works for the Son of God to destroy, his last masterpiece is this Antichrist, who fills up the prophetic outline of Satan's campaign in this age. The first feature of the prophetic account of Antichrist we notice is suggested by the name itself—in Greek, for, or in place of, Christ; and in Latin, against Christ. If he is predicted as opposing Christ, we may expect that there will be an adroit and plausible attempt to imitate Christ, in order to deceive if possible His own disciples. In the finished work of Christ, wherein He defeated Satan and all his hosts, as arrayed against Himself, He so obtained victory as to furnish us with all needed defence against the future attacks of the same foe on His Church.

Prophecy reveals Antichrist under various forms and separate titles. Just as our Lord is predicted by prophets and priests of the Old Testament, each one presenting some significant trait of His character, some form of His office, some distinct picture of His person, of His coming, and His reign—all of which are completed and compacted in His incarnation—so the pen of inspiration sketches the portrait of this adverse and opposing person, Antichrist, under various forms and separate titles. The Apostle John, in his epistle, speaks of the spirit of Antichrist as then prevailing, and that whoever denies that Christ is come in the flesh is Antichrist (1 John 2 : 18; 4 : 3). He does not call any name, in thus describing the spirit of Antichrist.

It will be more suggestive than any labored exposition, to reveal the truth of Scripture on this subject to turn our attention to several inspired portraits, and see how they fit the thought we are arguing that under separate names and titles the same person is always meant. Thus, in Revelation 13 the Beast is described; in 7th and 8th of Daniel the Little Horn; in 11th of Daniel, King of Fierce Countenance, and in 9th the Prince that shall come; the King of Assyria of 10th, and Lucifer of 14th of Isaiah. The Man of Sin and Son of Perdition (2 Thess. 2). Without explanation let us compare a few of the accents of these separate titles:

Thus as the Beast.	As the Little Horn.
Revelations 13 : 6 : "He opens his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name, and His Tabernacle, and them that dwell in Heaven"; 13 : 7 : "He makes war with the saints and overcomes them."	Daniel 7 : 25 : "He speaks great words against the Most High." Daniel 7 : 21 : "He makes war with the saints and prevails."
Revelations 13 : 5 : "Authority was given unto him forty and two months," i.e., 1260 days.	Daniel 7 : 25 : "The saints are given into His hand until a time and times and the dividing of time," i.e., 1260 days.

Of these separate symbols the same things are declared—and thus, presumably, one person is identified by both. Again we read Antichrist:

As the Little Horn.	As the King of Fierce Countenance.
Dan. 7 : 25 : "Speaks great words against the Most High."	Dan. 11 : 36 : "Speak marvellous things against the God of gods."
7 : 22 : "Shall prevail until the Ancient of days come, and judgment is given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom."	Dan. 11 : 36 : "Shall prosper till the indignation (against Israel and Jerusalem) be accomplished."

Here we observe a similar identity in symbols—and further:

As the King of Fierce Countenance.	As Second Little Horn.
Dan. 11 : 4 : "He shall enter also into the glorious land."	Dan. 8 : 9 : "He waxes great toward the pleasant land."
Dan. 11 : 40 : "Enters the glorious land at the time of the end"	Dan. 8 : 17 : "At the time of the end shall be the vision."
11 : 36 : "He shall prosper till the indignation (against Israel and Jerusalem) be accomplished."	Dan. 8 : 19 : "He shall prosper in the last end of the indignation" (against Israel and Jerusalem."

And again:

The Second Little Horn.	The Prince that shall come.
Dan. 8 : 11 : "Takes away the daily sacrifice."	Dan. 9 : 27 : "Causes the sacrifice and oblation to cease."
Dan. 8 : 19 : "Shall prosper in the last end of the indignation."	Dan. 9 : 27 : "Till that determined is poured upon the desolator."

These prophetic statements seem conclusive against the theory of a growing increase of holiness, and peace, and purity, that shall be universal, previous to the coming again of the Lord. For instead of a gradual victory over the foe, they describe his vaunted resumption of power, until a given time—when the "indignation" against Israel shall be accomplished, and the end of the age be at hand.

Another prophetic statement in 2 Thess. 2 : 4 describes Antichrist "as exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped." And this has currently been applied to the apostate Roman Church, in the assumptions claimed and exercised by the Pope. Without doubt there is here an illustrious and conspicuous and continued representation of the spirit of Antichrist manifesting itself through the age, within the Christian Church, and in the name of Christ. For we must look for this manifestation not outside but within the organized Christian fold. Yet in the prophetic statement of the final anti-Christ, in Daniel 11 : 45, it is said, "he shall plant the tabernacle of his palace between the seas in the glorious Holy Mountain," and in 2 Thess. 2 : 4 he is represented as "sitting in the Temple of God, showing himself that he is God." While this last feature of the reign of Antichrist finds its shadow in the pretensions of the Papacy, we still believe that a more literal and future fulfilment, springing out of present and patent channels of blasphemy and corruption, will be seen in the very temple yet to be built in Jerusalem.

There is another prophecy in the vision of John which bears upon this view, Rev. 17 : 12–14: the ten kings which are to come receive power one hour with the beast, or Antichrist, and they give all their power and strength to him. And then occurs the war with the Lamb and His victory.

THE PERSONALITY OF THIS ANTICHRIST, who has been predicted and foreshadowed by many persons as types, is seen to be real and finally visible in human form, from noting the contrast of personal and moral qualities in Christ, the true Prophet and Victor King.

Christ.	Antichrist.
John 3 : 31 : "Comes from above."	Rev. 11 : 7 : "Comes from below."
John 5 : 43 : "Comes in His Father's name."	John 5 : 43 : "Comes in his own."
Phil. 2 : 8 : "Humbled Himself and became obedient."	2 Thess. 2 : 4 : "Exalts himself above all."
Isa. 53 : 3 : "Was despised and rejected, and we esteemed Him not."	Rev. 13 : 3, 4 : "All the world wonder after the beast, saying, Who is like unto him?"
John 6 : 38 : "Comes to do His Father's will."	Dan. 11 : 3 : "Does according to his own."
John 17 : 4 : "Glorifies God on earth."	Rev. 13 : 6 : "Blasphemes the name of God."
John 10 : 14, 15 : "The Good Shepherd that giveth His life for the sheep."	Zech. 11 : 16, 17 : "The evil shepherd or idle shepherd, who shall tear the flesh."

Christ.	Antichrist.
Phil. 2 : 9, 10 : "God highly exalts Him, and gives Him a name above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow."	Isaiah 14 : 14, 15 : "Exalteth himself above the heights of the clouds, yet is brought down to hell."
Matt. 24 : 30 : "Shall be seen coming in the clouds, with power and great glory."	Isaiah 14 : 16 : "They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake the kingdoms ?"
Rev. 11 : 15 : "Shall reign for-ever and ever."
Heb. 1 : 2 : "The Heir of all things."	Dan. 7 : 26 : "They shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it to the end."
	2 Thess. 2 : 3 : "The Son of Perdition."

Antichrist is not a mere principle, nor a myth. If Christ be a real person in human form, so is he. If Christ is declared and spoken of as endowed with all grace and humility and glory, and having a glorious retinue of the saved and glorified ones—Antichrist is the embodied reality of the very opposite principle, and their malignant supporters, which shall be utterly destroyed in all their usurped empire, and in the very person of their boastful and blasphemous king, in that day when the Faithful and True shall ride forth from the opened heaven with His armies to "judge and make war" (Rev. 19 : 11–14). There is a preparation now going on for this grand and glorious issue, on the part of the enemies of God. In Rev. 16 : 13, 14 we have a description of three unclean spirits, like frogs, coming out of the mouth of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet. There are spirits of demons making miracles, going forth to the kings of the earth and of the world to gather them to the great battle of which we have spoken.

We must remember that the analogy of the ages bids us expect an interval of time in the preparation for the closing and opening of the age. One spirit came out of the mouth of the dragon. This may be infidelity, in its various forms, now so fashionably prevalent—atheism, pantheism, scepticism, rationalism, and all the forms and phases of intellectual speculation which deny the word of the living God to-dav. These are recruiting the forces for Antichrist. Satan's stronghold of delusion from the first has been denial of God's word. "Ye shall not surely die."

The next demon comes out of the mouth of the Antichrist, and represents that alienation from God, independence of God, and opposition to Him, which in these days is so manifest, a worldly spirit, secretly or openly infusing itself in the Church ; that lawlessness spoken of in 2 Thess. 2 : 7, which is so rapidly developing in this and other lands as a lawless and godless Socialism. And then a third demon from the mouth of the false prophet. When men cast off the superstitions of the harlot they will have some religion. When men throw off the external garb of a formal godliness they will seek some refuge of lies. And so Spiritualism is a widely extended phase of modern infidelity.

Then these unclean spirits are recognized by all the children of God. We cannot, my brethren, reason them down, or coax them with the flatterers of a miscalled Christian charity, to cease their dreadful work of preparation for the empire of Antichrist. The sword of the Spirit, the word of God, used in faith—not with superstitious fear—is the only weapon that can prosper against them. And with this in hand we shall not lean upon the arm of flesh, and cry "Peace, peace," when there is no peace, but a radical hate, and determined warfare upon the Son of God.

The duties of our age are plainly declared, as one has well said : "When this our Gentile dispensation will have run the vast round of earth, and have reached again its starting-point, the land of its nativity, and, returning home in grief as it were to die, its cradle will become its grave."

But "in these days the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed." Thus will set in divided glory and gloom the Saturday evening's sun of the present dispensation, briefly preceding the millennial dawn of the new Judaic dispensation, when Jerusalem shall at last dwell safely at rest from her Gentile foes ; when "her light shall go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth "to all the families of the earth, with none to molest or make afraid in all God's Holy Mountain.

Thus shall Antichrist arise and prosper and practise and pass away, and the groaning and travailing earth, now at last relieved, enter upon a Sabbath of peaceful and blessed rest, and Satan be bound for a thousand years.

THE GATHERING OF ISRAEL,

BY BISHOP W. R. NICHOLSON,

Of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Philadelphia.

The Promises are to all the Twelve Tribes—I. The Prophetical Fact—It is yet Future—Why Israel has been Preserved—On Purpose to restore Them —II. The Gathering will be in Two Instalments —The First Prior to Christ's Second Coming—The Final Instalment Subsequent to that Event —III. The Method of the First Gathering—Those Who Return will be Numerous, Unconverted—The Temple will have been Rebuilt by Them—Gathered for Chastisement—Who will Form the Elect Remnant—IV. Method of the Second Gathering—1. Divine and Human Agencies will Combine—2. They also will Return Unconverted—3. Their Conversion will Occur on their Restoration—4. The Blessed—5. Spiritual Blessings will be Outpoured.

By Israel is here meant, as the Scriptures speak, "Both the houses of Israel" (Isa. viii., 14) ; by the gathering of Israel is meant the gathering back of all the twelve tribes of Jacob from their dispersion, continued through so many ages, to their own covenanted land, Palestine, and the resettlement of them there as one nation. Is this restoration of Israel a foreshown fact in prophecy ? And if so, what circumstances of the regathering, if any, are at the same time predicted ? This is our subject.

I. As regards the prophetical fact of the restoration. In giving answer to this question, I find myself in the midst of an embarrassment of riches. It is impossible to exhibit within the limits of this paper the full strength of the prophetical proof, since in that case I should have to quote an immense proportion of the Bible. We can consider but a very few references, a mere sample of the whole ; these, however, shall be in themselves exhaustive and all-sufficient.

We turn to Ezekiel 36, 22 : 28 ; "Say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God . . . I will take you from among the heathen and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land." Here how positively stated is the purposed fact of their restoration. But this restoration cannot be the return from the captivity in Babylon ; for, besides that it takes place "out of all countries," instead of only one, it is attended with the converting power of the Holy Spirit, giving new hearts to the restored ones, and causing them to walk in all obedience to God ; blessings of the Spirit, which were not fulfilled at the return from Babylon.

Nor is it the setting forth, whether typically, symbolically, or otherwise, of the conversion of the Gentiles and their restoration from Satan to God, or the establishment of the Christian Church among the Gentiles and its spiritual prosperity ; for it is expressly "the house of Israel" whom God here addresses, and the land to which restoration is effected is identically that which "God gave to the fathers" of that house, a land which, as God goes on to say in the subsequent verses, has been "waste and desolate," and filled with "ruined cities," but which is now to be "tilled," and to abound in "corn, and the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field ;" literally the land of Israel then, and not typically or symbolically something else.

Thus the gathering of Israel spoken of in this passage can possibly refer only to the literal Israel, and to their restoration to Palestine. And since, as we have seen, it did not take place at the return from Babylon, by the same token, there never having been any other restoration of that people, it has as yet never taken place at all. It is yet in the future.

Ezekiel 37 : 15–22 : "The word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land ; and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel ; and one king shall be king to them all ; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." Anything more conclusive than this it is not possible to put into language, or even to conceive of. Both divisions of Israel are expressly mentioned, Judah and his companions, and Ephraim and his companions ; they shall be taken "from among the heathen (the nations)" and be gathered "on every side," (out of all nations) ; they shall be "brought into their own land, the land upon the mountains of Israel," and in that land the two divisions shall be made "one nation," and never more shall they become "two nations," or be "divided into two kingdoms." Reference to literal Israel could not be more demonstrated, nor the fact of their restoration to Palestine more positively stated ; meanwhile the impressive effect of both the literalness and the positiveness is made superlative, by means of the symbolism of the two sticks, bearing each the name of one of the two houses of Israel respectively, and joined together in the hand of the prophet. And that this restoration is not the return from Babylon is beyond question from what follows in the chapter ; for God immediately proceeds to say that, upon the occurring of this restoration of Israel to their own land, He "will make a covenant of peace with them, an everlasting covenant with them," and "will set His sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore," and "they shall walk in His judgments and observe His statutes," and "they shall dwell in the land that He has given unto Jacob, wherein their fathers have dwelt, they and their children, and their children's children forever ;" none of which things were true of their going back from Babylon. Both houses of Israel are yet to be regathered out of all nations to their own land.

WHY HAVE THEY BEEN PRESERVED ?

In the sixth chapter of the prophecy of Amos, at the ninth verse, the Lord says : "For, lo I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth"—a vigorous description of their divinely wrought marvellous preservation as a people, although scattered through all nations during all those terrible ages of suffering. Now for what purpose have they been so preserved ? The Lord Himself answers in the fourteenth verse, "And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them ; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof ; they shall also make gardens, and eat the fruit of them ;" that is, He would preserve them in their national identity on purpose to return them to their national territory ; to a land, their entrance into which would be His "bringing them again ;" a land whose soil they should cultivate into vineyards and gardens, and whose grapes and vegetables they should enjoy ; literally a land, then, and their own land, literally the tribes of Jacob gathered back to where they had nationally dwelt along centuries before.

Has this restoration of that people ever been effected ? Nay, for the Lord continues, "And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." But their dispersion among the nations is a living experience before our eyes to-day ; therefore, never did occur their restoration as spoken of in this passage from Amos : they have yet to be so planted in their land, as that they shall no more be pulled up out of it. The land is still waiting for them, and they are being kept of God for the land.

So far we have but tasted of Old Testament teachings on the point before us. Isaiah and Jeremiah are full of testimonies every whit as strong as the ones we have examined; and so are many others of the prophets. But we now pass to the New Testament Scriptures, wherein is clearly recognized that there is yet to be a re-gathering of Israel to their own land; although, consistently with the purpose and character of what we call the Christian dispensation, it is not so pervasively there as in the Old Testament.

In Romans : 9 4, 5, St. Paul, having mentioned the "Israelites," says that to them appertain "the adoption, and the covenants, and the promises; and the fathers." He expressly identifies the Israelites of whom he is speaking as "his kinsmen according to the flesh;" therefore literal national Israel. There is "the adoption," he says. But if their adoption or sonship as a people be only a past fact, having no influence for the yet future, how can it still be to them, as a people, a matter of privilege and blessing? Theirs are "the covenants," he says. But one of those covenants—is it not God's arrangement with Abraham to give to him and his seed "all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession"? (Gen. xvii.) Must they not, therefore, be reinstated in that land? Theirs are "the promises," he says. But what promises can belong to them as a distinct people, save such as those of which we have had a sample from the Old Testament?

Theirs are "the fathers," he says. But what are Abraham and Isaac and Jacob to them as a people, if they, the descendants of those fathers, are forever nationally defunct? So inevitably implied in St. Paul's enumeration of the privileges of his kinsmen according to the flesh is the prophetical fact of the gathering of them back to their own land. And did not the Lord Jesus advert to the same prophetical fact, when he said to His Apostles (Matt. 19 : 28), "In the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel"? For how shall the Apostles rule over the twelve tribes, if, as twelve tribes, they shall then have no existence, or if they be not gathered together as a nationality?

Let these instances suffice, as regards the New Testament, for the prophetical fact of Israel's yet future restoration. Other citations might be given; especially, almost the whole of one entire book, the great prophetical Apocalypse, in which this fact is the underlying element, the very centre around which revolve its terrors and its grandeurs. As, however, I shall have occasion to refer to that book in another part of our subject, I here conclude the direct argument for the general fact. Limited though our selections of proof have been, they yet are ample. Undeniably, both houses of Israel, as one nationality, shall yet be re-established in Palestine, the land of their ancient inheritance. Moreover, the argument for the fact will be continually expanding and strengthening, while we shall be considering the predicted circumstances of the fact.

THE GATHERING OF ISRAEL.

II. The gathering of Israel will be accomplished in two instalments.

1. One movement in the process of their restoration will have taken place previously to the Lord's Second Coming. "Behold," saith God in Zechariah (xiv.), "the day of the Lord cometh. For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city." Now, if Israel be not there, why are the nations there to fight against them? For that it is Israel against whom this battle is waged is sufficiently suggested by the word "nations," as designating the attacking party; in fact, however, the whole chapter is express as to the presence of Israel. But it is in connection with this battle that "the day of the Lord cometh." And the prophecy proceeds, "Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations. And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east." This is the Second Coming, and, lo, Israel are already in their own land. Nor, as it would seem, will it be more than a very few years before the Lord's coming that this restoration of Israel will have been effected. It is in the last of Daniel's Seventy Weeks that they are presented to our view as nationally established in their own land; and that seventieth week is the seven years immediately preceding the Advent. It must be borne in mind, however, that some several years may be required before the beginning of that last week, in order to their regular settlement as a State.

2. But all Israel will not have been gathered back to their land before the Advent; a second and finally complete movement in their restoration will occur subsequently to that great event. Isaiah 11 : 11, 12, 15, 16: "And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea." At what time is it appointed for this magnificent description of Israel's restoration to be realized? We learn from the fourth verse, After the Lord with the breath of His lips shall have slain the wicked one. Now from II. Thess. ii. 8, we learn that "the Lord shall destroy that wicked with the brightness of His coming." After the coming, then, shall this restoration of Israel have place.

Thus there will be two distinct stages in the process of their gathering; the first, before the great Epiphany of the Lord Jesus; the second, after it: the first, partial; the second, complete. How utterly vain to atempt to make the passges which describe this second gathering apply to the return from the Babylonish captivity.

METHOD OF THE FIRST GATHERING.

III. Particulars of the first gathering.

The number of them will be considerable. This is indicated by the immense armies which Antichrist will bring together for the siege of Jerusalem (Joel 3, 1, 2, 9, 14). But also Ezekiel describes the land as being, by reason of this first gathering back of the people, a land of villages, and the people as having silver and gold, and cattle and goods (38, 11–13).

They will be gathered back in their unconverted state. According to Zechariah 12, 10, it will be only at the Lord's coming, only in connection with "their looking upon Him whom they pierced," that "the spirit of grace and of supplications" shall be poured out upon them. Previously to the coming of the Lord, therefore, it will be still as rejectors of Christ and rebellious to God that they will occpuy their land. And it is as speaking of them at that very time, that Isaiah ascribes to them pride and haughtiness, the loftiness of the cedar of Lebanon, and the stiff sturdiness of the oak of Bashan (2).

They will have rebuilt their temple and re-established their temple services, before the coming of the Lord. For, according to the words of Jesus in the 24th of Matthew, they will "see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory," only after "the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet," shall have stood "in the holy place."

The object of their gathering is ultimately their conversion, but, primarily, their chastisement and suffering. In connection with the setting up of the abomination of desolation in the temple, Jesus said (Matt. 24), "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." "Therefore thus saith the Lord God (Ezekiel 22, 19 : 22), Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore, I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. And ye shall know that I the Lord have poured out my fury upon you."

Their terrible sufferings, when ended, will have reduced them to a remnant. "Except those days should be shortened," said Jesus (Matt. 24), "there should no flesh (no Israelite) be saved; but for the elects sake those days shall be shortened." Those elect ones will be but a remnant. Only "the third part shall be brought through, the fire, and be refined as silver is refined" (Zech. 13, 9). This elect remnant, is identical with the "hundred and forty and four thousand sealed" ones of the seventh of the Revelation. For those sealed ones are all Israelites; it being expressly said that they are taken from among "the tribes of the children of Israel," and, besides, the twelve tribes being all enumerated by their names, as "the tribe of Judah," "the tribe of Reuben."

And now comes to pass their conversion to God. "They will have witnessed the terrors of the reign of Antichrist, will have seen the plagues of the Revelation poured out upon the nations under his control, will have beheld the heavens darkened, the Lord descend in glory, the graves open, the saints taken, the Day of the Lord come upon Jerusalem, the heavens and the earth shaken. They will see, and yet find themselves protected through all these things." "They will look on Him whom they have pierced;" God will pour upon them "the spirit of grace and supplications;" they shall mourn for their sins; and "there shall be a fountain opened to them for sin and for uncleanness." They will believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and they shall be forgiven; and not forgiven only, but accepted in all the preciousness of that Name, which they and their nation had rejected and abhorred.

IV. Particulars of

the gathering subsequent to the Advent.

1. It will be effected by both human and Divine agency. Partly by human : Isaiah 10, 9, 22, 23; 16, 19, 20. Partly by Divine : Isaiah 11, 15, 16. In this latter circumstance it will contrast with the first gathering, for it is the unvarying implication of Scripture that Israel's recovery before the Advent will come about in a natural and ordinary way. The conviction of its expediency, and the stroke of a pen, on the part of one or two of the leading continental powers, and the deed would be done." Even now we may almost speak of England's protectorate of the Holy Land. God's providence is moving apace, and evidently is rapidly nearing the crisis of Israel's first recovery. But their second restoration will be effected as well by miracle as by human agency.

2. In this second gathering, as in the first, returning Israel will as yet be unconverted. Ezekiel 36, 24–38,

3. Immediately upon their restoration, however, they will be converted. "And so," exclaims Paul, "all Israel shall be saved." Then it is that that glorious anthem, the 12th of Isaiah, will peal from the lips of an entirely converted nation.

4. And Israel's land in that day shall answer back to the Gospel holiness of its inhabitants. In extent it will be according to the covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15, 18). As to fertility and beauty, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose" (Isa. 35). As to universal harmony: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them" (Isa. 11, 6–9). And as to duration, God said to Abraham, "I will give to thee and to thy seed after thee all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession" (Gen. 18, 8).

5. The spiritual blessings of millennial Israel will be the same as are ours now.

Dr. Nicholson closed with a brief resumé of the fearful persecutions and sufferings to which Israel has been subjected, and through which they have been so marvellously preserved, and earnestly appealed to his hearers to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem."

THE WALK TO EMMAUS.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 15th.—Luke 24 : 13–32. Golden Text, Luke 24 : 32.

"THAT same day," writes the evangelist, "two of them went to a village called Emmaus." What an eventful Sunday was that for the little flock of bereaved Christians! It is difficult to realize, even faintly, what their feelings must have been that day. The recent events had followed each other with startling rapidity. Only a few evenings before, their revered Master had been amongst them, talking familiarly with them, had supped with His most intimate associates, and had walked out with them to a garden, as He often did, to meditate and pray. Then He had been betrayed to His enemies by one of themselves, had been hurried from one court of justice to another, finally condemned, and speedily executed. What consternation must have filled their hearts, for they obviously hoped to the last, that in some way He would be delivered from death! Then came the Sunday's surprise; for Mary Magdalene and the other women had come to the little company with extraordinary news. They had been to the vault with the last tribute of their love and had found it empty, and they professed that angels were there, who told them that their dead Teacher had risen; they had reminded them, too, of certain words He had spoken in His lifetime (which they recollected), predicting that He would rise. Upon this Peter and John had run to the spot, and they also found the tomb empty. Here was perplexity upon perplexity. No wonder that, with their material ideas of Christ's mission, they were lost in amazement, and knew not what to expect or hope.

With the mystery still unravelled, two of them, Cleopas and another (probably Luke himself) start for a walk to Emmaus, talking as they went of the subject which filled their minds. The village was about eight miles from Jerusalem, and the two men as they walked pondered over the strange events and reasoned about them. Their reasoning seems to have brought them no light (reasoning on matters of faith seldom does bring light), for, when they are joined by One who is apparently a stranger, they are unable to furnish any thing more than a narrative of the events as they had occurred, and a statement of their own futile hopes. They lay before Him the disjointed fragments of the puzzle in utter perplexity and hopelessness, when, to their surprise, the stranger takes up the scattered pieces, and with marvellous wisdom shows them the key to the whole. Nothing had occurred that should cause their faith to stagger; nothing had transpired that had not been foretold; their Master's work had been consummated, not frustrated, by His death; and that which they thought so untimely, had really come in the appointed fulness of time. He openly upbraids them for their folly and their sluggish hearts, and tells them these things that perplexed them appeared dark only because of their own defects of heart and understanding. Light had come to them from a passing Stranger; no wonder that when they arrive at their destination, they urge Him to enter with them. He complies, and now, as He sits and breaks the bread and blesses it, they suddenly see with whom they have been conversing. But before they can salute Him He is gone, and with eager steps they hasten back to the city, to tell their friends the wonderful news and give them, too, the key to the mystery—to them a mystery no longer; Jesus Himself had taught them, and as they pace that road to the city they trod but a short time before, they remind each other of the heartburning they had felt as their difficulties and perplexities vanished in the presence of their divine Teacher. Such are the circumstances of the narrative to which our attention is called by the lesson of the day. What practical lessons can we draw from it?

I. That difficulties in matters of Providence and religion are not to be accounted insuperable because our minds fail to find the clue for their disentanglement. When scientists demonstrate conclusively (as they think) that this or that portion of the Bible must be false, because they, in their wisdom, have discovered some truth which appears to controvert it, we may safely cling to our Book and our God, for the key to the apparent discrepancy is in our Lord's hands, and we shall have it in the fulness of time. When mysteries of Providence arise in our experience, and we see the righteous in trouble, the pious poor in adversity, and the good man bereaved and desolate, while "the wicked flourish as a green bay tree," we need not lose our confidence in our Father's love, for some day we may learn that the chastened ones "ought to have suffered these things before entering into glory." If we listen to the teachings of this lesson there seems to strike our ears a voice like that of

"A sentinel
Who moves about from place to place,
And whispers to the worlds of space,
In the deep night, that all is well."

II. That in Christian company and in Christian conversation where Jesus is the theme He is often present Himself to open the Scriptures, though our "eyes are holden that we cannot see Him." Many a time has the child of God, feeling his heart cold, his love failing, his faith growing weak, entered a meeting of believers, and has come away refreshed and invigorated, his heart burning within him," for Jesus has been there with him, and has shown him "things concerning Himself."

III. The question of Jesus, "what things?" is an incentive to prayer. Our Lord would have us tell Him what our difficulties are. True, they are already fully known to Him, as are all our needs, our faults, and all that concerns us, but He asks now as He asked the two sorrowful wayfarers then, "What manner of communication are these that ye have one to another, and are sad?" He invites our confidence; He would draw us into communion with Himself; and who that has accepted His invitation has come away without a blessing? Even the world recognizes the influence that has been exercised on the Christian who avails himself of his privilege and spends much time in prayer. His character reflects the divine attributes, as the face of Moses reflected the refulgent light on which he had gazed on the top of the Mount, as Cowper sings:

"When one who holds communion with the skies
Has filled his wine where those pure waters rise,
And once more mingles with us meaner things,
'Tis e'en as if an angel shook his wings;
Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide,
That tells us whence his treasures are supplied."

IV. Jesus should be invited by those who desire His prolonged stay. He made as if He would have gone further, but His hearers longed for more communion and begged Him to abide with them. He accepted their invitation, and then, and not till then, was He recognized and known as their dear, precious Saviour. So now does He accept the Christian's invitation as he cries to Him—

"I need Thy presence every passing hour;
What but Thy grace can foil the tempter's power?
Who like Thyself my light and stay can be?
Through cloud and sunshine, oh! abide with me."

The Traveller and the Torn Book.—Mr. S. A. Blackwood, an official in the London Post-Office, relates an instance in which a word was made efficacious to the saving of a soul. He was travelling on the top of a coach from London to Croydon, and after discussing the topics of the day with one who sat beside him, he turned the conversation to the things of heaven, to the disgust of another passenger sitting near, who talked of "canting hypocrites," etc., and when the coach stopped left his seat. In descending, the pocket of his coat opened, and Mr. B. dropped in it the little book, "Eternal Life." When the gentlemen reached home and emptied his pockets he at once guessed who had placed it there, and in his rage he tore it in pieces and threw it inside the fender. When he returned from town the next day his ire was increased by finding the pieces placed on his toilet table. He immediately rung the bell and asked the servant "Why they had not been destroyed." And when she replied that in gathering them up she had seen the word "Eternity," and did not like to burn them, she was in anger ordered from his presence.

When the servant was gone he began to look for the word that had so arrested her attention, and then he sought to connect sentences by strips of paper that one buys round postage stamps, and managed in this way to fasten the book together, and became converted by reading it.

One day, when Mr. Blackwood was walking in Cheapside, he was statrled by the exclamation, "You are the man! You are the man!" and a ragged book was held up to his astonished gaze. He disclaimed all knowledge of that particular book, and was then informed of the circumstances related above, and of the spiritual change in the heart of the gentleman that had taken place by means of it.

THE BEREAVED SHOE-BLACK.

A TOUCHING story comes to us from Detroit. A poor shoeblack, who was generally supposed to be as innocent of any thing sentimental as a stone, walked into a group of his acquaintance a few days ago, and offered his stock of tools for sale. They consisted only of two brushes, a box, and a pot of blacking, and they realized twenty-five cents. Some curiosity was evinced as to the object he had in view, and what he was going to do with the quarter-dollar. But Tim said nothing then; he started off with his money to the newspaper office and had the following notice inserted, for which he paid the quarter his effects had produced:

"Died — Litul Ted—of scarlet fever; aiged three yeres. Funeral to morrer, gone up to Hevin; left won bruther."

"Was it your brother?" asked the cashier.

Tim tried to brace up, but he couldn't. The big tears came up, his chin quivered, and he pointed to the notice on the counter and gasped:

"I—I had to sell my kit to do it, b—but he had his arms around my neck when he d—died!"

He hurried away home, but the news went to the boys, and they gathered in a group and talked. Tim had not been home an hour before a barefooted boy left the kit on the doorstep, and in the box was a bouquet of flowers which had been purchased in the market by pennies contributed by the crowd of ragged but big-hearted urchins. Did God ever make a heart which would not respond if the right chord was touched?

A ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

Numerous and very interesting letters have lately appeared in the London Standard from employers and servants who are daily swindled by many registry offices in London, which make them pay a fee and never satisfy their requirements — being, in fact, nothing but establishments living by fraud. One lady writes as follows:

"Nineteen years ago I found myself an orphan through the sudden death of my father, who had only just gone to London to live from Canada, and after his funeral I was nearly penniless and sixteen years of age. I could not indulge in sorrow, but had at once to begin my weary tramp after work of some kind, so day after day I walked the streets trying shops, asking them if they wanted a sewer (it was all I knew), without success; they all wanted experienced hands.

"At last I went into an imposing-looking office with 'Registry Office for Servants' in large letters in the window. I went in and inquired of the man if he knew of a vacancy for me, when he told me I must have my name on the books, and the fee was 2s. 6d., without which he could not tell me any thing. With a sob I handed him my last half-crown, leaving myself literally penniless, and begged him to be quick to tell me of some one who wanted a nurse-girl, or any thing, I did not care what, so long as it was work.

"The villain, with a leer, told me to call again in a few days, and perhaps he could do something for me. I with tears begged for the return of my money, telling him I had not tasted food that day, but he affected not to believe me, and told me he should call in the police unless I left quietly, which had the desired effect, for I went out, but I do not remember how or any thing else until some weeks afterwards, when I found myself in bed with a dear old lady nursing me.

It seems I had wandered unconsciously into a gentleman's office—who since married me—and he seeing me took pity on me, and took me at once to his mother's, where I was ill of brain fever brought on by anxiety and want of food. I need not trouble you with any comment; the Registry Office is nothing but a trap to get money. I trust my experience will benefit some poor child similarly circumstanced."

DR. LIVINGSTONE, The Great Christian Explorer.

David Livingstone was born at Blantyre, a village on the Clyde, a few miles above Glasgow, in Scotland, on the 19th of March, 1813. His father and mother were poor, and found it hard to make both ends meet in the support of their family; and so their boy was taken from the village school and sent to the cotton factory as a "piecer." He was then only 10 years of age. And as those were not the days when beneficent acts of Parliament regulated the hours of children's labor in factories, he was at work from 6 o'clock in the morning till 8 o'clock at night. Happily, even at that early age he had received a sound elementary education, and the love of learning was strong within him. The pride with which his anxious mother saw his first week's wages was not greater than the joy with which a part of them was given to the purchase of Ruddiman's "Rudiments of Latin" for him.

The fatigues of the long day he spent in the mill did not abate the ardor with which he went to learn Latin at evening school from 8 till 10 o'clock. Even during the day he contrived to join the labor of his hands to the labor of his head; for by fixing the book he read on the spinning-jenny he had to work at, he picked up sentence after sentence, and made steady progress in knowledge, undisturbed by the roar of the machinery. When opportunity offered, he read with an eager eye some of the leaves of the book of nature as they lay before him in the woods and rocks and valleys of his native Clydesdale, with special reference to botany and geology. Thus the poor boy toiled on and on, hard and long, until his 19th year, when his acquirements would have reflected credit on a youth spent under the most careful scholastic training.

In that year he became a cotton-spinner in the works at Blantyre, in which he had been for years one of the humbler "hands," and presently, on the savings of a summer's work at Blantyre, and on the foundation of the knowledge which he had so laboriously gained, he passed into a winter's session at Glasgow College, and continued doing so from year to year till he finished his course as a medical student, and was admitted a Licentiate of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons. His real conversion of heart and experience of becoming "born again" was in his 17th year, of which he wrote: "Great pains had been taken by my parents to instill the doctrines of Christianity into my mind, and I had no difficulty in understanding the theory of our free salvation by the atonement of our Saviour; but it was only about this time that I really began to feel the necessity and value of a personal application of the provisions of that atonement to my own case. The change was like what may be supposed would take place were it possible to cure a case of color blindness. The perfect freeness with which the pardon of all our guilt is offered in God's book drew forth feelings of affectinate love to Him who bought us with His blood; and a deep sense of obligation to Him for His mercy has influenced, in some small measure, my conduct ever since. . . . In the glow of love which Christianity inspires, I soon resolved to devote my life to the alleviation of human misery. Turning this idea over in my mind, I felt that to be a pioneer of Christianity in China might lead to the material benefit of some portions of that immense empire; and therefore set myself to obtain a medical education in order to be qualified for that enterprise."

His fondly cherished Chinese plans were frustrated by the outbreak of the Opium War. But under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, he was ordained as a missionary in Albion Chapel, London, and embarked for Africa in 1840, in the 27th year of his age. His destination was a mission station called Kuruman, in the Bechuana country, about 700 miles from Cape Town. After a voyage of three months he reached Cape Town, and then made the long overland journey thence to Kuruman, where he found himself associated with tried and honored missionaries like Hamilton and Moffat. Retiring from Kuruman, the chief station, to a place called Lepelóle, he shut himself out from European society for six months, in order to learn for himself the language, the laws, the ways of thinking, the habits and customs of that section of the Bechuanas, the Bakwains, among whom he intended to live and labor. But, as he was taking steps to settle amongst them, an outbreak of war drove them from Lepelóle. After some delay he planted a mission station in the valley of Mabotsa, amongst the Bakatla tribe of the Bechuanas, in 1843.

Here an incident occurred by which the life of Livingstone was nearly lost. He went out with a party of the tribe to help them to drive away the lions by which their herds were attacked. As they were returning without success to the village, Livingstone saw one of the lions sitting on a piece of rock. Being about thirty yards off, he says, "I took a good aim at his body through the bush, and fired both barrels into it. The men then called out, 'He is shot! he is shot!' Others cried, 'He has been shot by another man, too. Let us go to him.' I said, 'Stop a little till I load again.' When in the act of ramming down the bullets I heard a shout. Starting, and looking half round, I saw the lion just in the act of springing upon me. I was upon a little height; he caught my shoulder as he sprang, and we both came to the ground below together. Growling horribly close to my ear, he shook me as a terrier dog does a rat. The shock caused a sort of dreaminess, in which there was no sense of pain or feeling of terror, though quite conscious of all that was happening. Besides crushing the bone into splinters, he left eleven teeth wounds on the upper part of my arm."

Among the various African tribes with whom Dr. Livingstone tarried in his missionary labors from time to time, he wrought with his own hands in the building of dwelling-houses, schools, and churches, in cutting down trees, in welding iron, in carpentering, in gardening, and in other forms of out-door labor. He kept school for them from day to day, and taught them the first simple elements of Christian truth. He visited them in their sickness, and prescribed for them. He gave food and help to their poor and wretched. He spared no available means of ministering to their wants, and showing them kindness and friendship. Thus did he push forward the outposts of missionary enterprise in South Africa. Thus did he secure for himself the affection and respect which led the tribes of Africa to speak of him in their own simple but significant way as "the right sort of white man."

In 1849 Dr. Livingstone began a series of journeys further into the interior of Africa, and in the course of his travels frequently underwent unparalleled hardships.

It was not the mere love of adventure that prompted Livingstone thus to travel. It was the true missionary spirit. It was the deep conviction that he was called to seek out the children of Africa in their utter heathenism, to go after them into their furthest retreats, to make known to them the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and to do all he could to raise them from the sore evils under which they groaned.

On one occasion he wrote, "I have been recently in closer contact with heathenism than I had ever been before, and though all, including the Chief, were as kind and attentive to me as possible, and there was no want of food (oxen being slaughtered daily, sometimes ten at a time, more than sufficient for the wants of all), yet to endure the dancing, roaring and singing, the jesting, anecdotes, grumbling, quarrelling, and murdering of these children of nature, seemed more like a severe penance than anything I had before met with in the course of my missionary duties. I took thence a more intense disgust at heathenism than I had before, and formed a greatly elevated opinion of missionary exertion."

On the 12th of December, 1856, Livingstone "was once more in dear old England." By his laborious explorations he had found a pathway from Central Africa to the Indian Ocean on the East Coast, and also to the Atlantic Ocean on the West Coast, and thus had opened a way for missionary enterprise. The newspapers hailed his return. Learned societies, headed by the Royal Geographical Society, were proud to do him honor. London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other cities vie with each other in the expression of their interest in himself and his labors. The friends of Christian missions, and those who had long specially labored for the suppression of slavery and the slave-trade, were glad to learn of him, and to take counsel with him concerning the new fields of work which his travels had opened to them. Admiration and gratitude towards him spread from the highest to the hum blest classes of the people.

His stay at home was brief, from 12t December, 1856, to 10th March, 1858 During that time he wrote his "Missionar Travels in South Africa." As to the labo of writing it, he said, "I think I woul rather cross the African continent agai than undertake to write another book. In that book, he poured out a treasury information such as the world never r ceived before concerning the tribes, th features, the products, the resources, an the capabilities of Africa. Already ha that information been turned in many pra tical ways to the good of Africa, and othe are sure to follow.

On the 10th of March, 1858, Dr. Livin stone sailed from England on an exped tion which occupied the next five years is life. He undertook it at the request of he government, and with the active assistnce of the Geographical Society. Its obect was to explore the whole region of the ambesi, with a view to obtaining information as to the condition of the natives, heir industrial pursuits, their commercial elations, and to promote their elevation rom barbarism and slavery, and the introuction among them of the knowledge and he blessings of the Gospel. A full and nteresting account of it has been given in "The Zambesi and its Tributaries." This expedition was saddened on the 27th f April, 1862, by the death of Mrs. Livngstone, the daughter of Dr. Moffat, the minent missionary, whose devotion to the welfare of down-trodden Africa was no less ntense than that of her husband.

Livingstone returned to London on the oth of July, 1864. On the 14th of August, 865, he left England on another expedion, which proved to be his last. His feelngs on setting out may be gathered from he following entry in his journal, March 6th, 1866 :

"The mere animal pleasure of travelling n a wild unexplored country is very great. When on land of a couple of thousand eet elevation, brisk exercise imparts elasicity to the muscles, fresh and healthy blood circulates through the brain, the mind works well, the eye is clear, the step s firm, and a day's exertion always makes he evening's repose thoroughly enjoyable.

"We have usually the stimulus of remote hances of danger either from beasts or men. Our sympathies are drawn out toward our humble, hardy companions, by a community of interests, and it may be of perils, which make us all friends.

"The effect of travel on a man whose heart is in the right place is that the mind s made more self-reliant ; it becomes more onfident of its own resources—there is greater presence of mind. The body is oon well knit ; the muscles of the limbs grow as hard as a board, and seem to have no fat ; the countenance is bronzed, and here is no dyspepsia. Africa is a most wonderful country for appetite ; and it is only when one gloats over marrow-bones or elephant's feet that indigestion is possible. No doubt much toil is involved, and fatigue of which travellers in the more temperate climes can form but a faint conception ; but the sweat of one's brow is no longer a curse when one works for God : it proves a tonic to the system, and is actually a blessing. No one can truly appreciate the charm of repose unless he has undergone severe exertion."

Such were Dr. Livingstone's emotions as he expressed them on starting on his last exploration in Africa, the journey that terminated with his death, May 4th, 1873. His journals, with their daily entries, scrupuously and regularly written up, have been almost miraculously preserved, and are full of details of the most interesting character. They describe adventures over which the reader pores with breathless interest ; dangers and difficulties from which ordinary men would have shrunk appalled, but over which the indomitable courage and unwavering determination of this devoted servant of Christ gloriously triumphed.

In December, 1866, he was at great straits for food, and the whole party were very faint and weak from hunger ; a famine prevailed everywhere, and grain was not to be had. In this plight, matters were made worse by the loss of the goats Dr. Livingstone had with him : he had found their milk very refreshing, and felt much depressed by their loss. He subsequently found they had been stolen by a native to whom he had been kind. He met some men January 10th who had killed an elephant, and who sold him some of the dried meat at a high price, and this formed their Christmas dinner, which had been postponed from the proper day through lack of the necessary materials. The next day another danger was near the intrepid traveller, from which he had a narrow escape. Sitting down to rest under a large tree, he fell asleep, and on waking found, to his horror, that a huge cobra (one of the most deadly of the serpent tribe) was coiled up in the sprouts at its root, within a foot or two of his head. Fortunately the creature was benumbed by the cold or that sleep might have ended fatally for Dr. Livingstone.

One of the most harassing featues of Dr. Livingstone's journey, and the cause of serious inconvenience and loss to him, was the desertion of his men : they deserted in small parties without assigning any reason for doing so, and as each party generally contrived to steal some part of the explorer's property he found his losses from this cause a serious matter. The most terrible loss was the medicine-chest ; this was stolen by two natives who deserted him in January, 1867. They had noticed the great care that had always been taken of the package containing the chest, and they doubtless thought it held some treasure of a marketable character. To be deprived of the precious quinine in such a climate was a grievous thing, and Dr. Livingstone writes in his journal, "The loss gnaws at my heart terribly."

The country traversed was of a very marshy character, and several times a halt had to be made in consequence of Dr. Livingstone's illness. Fever and dysentry attacked him, and as he had no medicines his recovery was very slow. He still persevered, however, resolved to complete his journey, if it were possible. During the early part of 1869 he was unable to walk, and was carried in a kind of litter, suffering tortures all the way. In March, however, he was better, and pours out grateful thanks to the great Father in heaven.

In August, 1871, Dr. Livingstone was in imminent danger from the hostility of the natives, who were under a misapprehension of the objects of his expedition. On one occasion, passing through a wood, he writes, "As we went along a narrow path with a wall of dense vegetation touching each hand, we came to a point where an ambush had been placed, and peering through the foliage a dark shade could sometimes be seen ; this was an infuriated savage, and a slight rustle meant a spear ; the trees had been cut down to obstruct us while they speared us. A large spear from my right lunged past, and almost grazed my back, and stuck firmly into the soil. I do not know how it missed, for they are very expert with the spear, but the good hand of God was upon me and I was saved." In another part of the vast forest the natives had placed fire to the root of a large tree which they calculated would fall on the party led by the white man. "It came to the ground," writes Dr. Livingstone, "only one yard behind me, and, breaking into several lengths, covered me with a cloud of dust. Three times in one day was I delivered from impending death."

In October, 1871, he was ill, dispirited, and destitute, and compared himself to the man who, going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among thieves ; and his plight was almost as bad, when, to his delight, he met a party bearing the American flag and carrying a store of supplies which gladdened his heart to witness. This was Mr. H. M. Stanley, who had been sent out to discover him. The effect on Livingstone was marvellous. He writes, "Appetite returned, and instead of the spare, tasteless two meals a day I ate four times daily, and in a week began to feel strong."

Mr. Stanley found Dr. Livingstone at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, on the 10th of November, 1871. To the great traveller himself, shut out for five years from all the pleasant ways of civilized man, this meeting with Mr. Stanley was an unspeakable relief. The sympathy, the help which it gave him, revived his sinking strength and restored the gladness of his heart. In the new and favorable circumstances in which it placed him, he resolved to go back on the westward course of exploration in which he had been arrested. He thought that a few months would suffice to finish his work, and to "sum up the whole discovery" as to the fountains or sources of the Nile, and that he would then be free to set his face towards home. He parted with Mr. Stanley at Unyanyembe on the 14th of March, 1872 ; and on the 24th of August, of the same year, having received the men whom Mr. Stanley sent him from the coast, he set out in the face of great difficulties to finish his work.

After travelling for nine months, his strength gave way, and he said to his attendants in Ilala, on the shores of Lake Bangweolo, "Build me a hut to die in ; I am going home." On the third day he said, "I am very cold ; put more grass over the hut." And there, in the very heart of Africa, on the 4th of May, 1873, he died. No Christian friend was with him to speak to him a word of comfort. Only He was with him who had been his Shepherd, and who had promised to make His grace sufficient for him. And so, falling asleep in Him, he entered into rest, made perfect from sin and fear, from conflict and pain. His death amongst the people whom he pitied and loved was in keeping with the life which he had spent.

His faithful African followers carried his corpse to the sea-coast, whence it was sent to England, and buried in Westminster Abbey on the 18th of April, 1874.

The devotion with which Livingstone went to Africa burned in him till he died, the devotion of a missionary of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Whether he travelled, or explored, or discovered, or wrote, he was true to his first desire and first consecration to be a pioneer of Christianity in the dark places of the earth which are full of the habitations of cruelty, and to benefit and save the benighted Africans.

THE THIRD WATCH OF THE NIGHT.

Two grand divisions of time. The one of sunlight, the other of shadow; the one for work, the other for rest; the one a type of everything glad and beautiful, the other used in all languages as a type of sadness, and affliction, and sin.

These two divisions were made by the Lord Himself. Other divisions of time may have nomenclature of human invention, but the darkness held up its dusky brow to the Lord and He baptized it, the dew dripping from His fingers as He gave it a name—"and the darkness He called night."

I have spoken to you in this series of sermons about the first watch of the night and the second watch of the night in our great cities. I propose now to speak to you of or from twelve o'clock to three o'clock in the morning.

I am encouraged to go on with this series of sermons because the Lord has greatly blessed it in the salvation of many young men not only in this city but in other cities, and this week, travelling at the far West, I found in every direction that God had blessed this series of discourses, and so I proceed, speaking to you this morning more especially about the third watch of the night.

The thunder of the city has rolled out of the air. The slightest sounds cut the night with such distinctness as to attract your attention. The tinkling of the bell of the street car in the distance, and the baying of the dog. The stamp of a horse in the next street. The slamming of a saloon door. The hiccough of the drunkard. The shrieks of the steam-whistle five miles away. Oh! how suggestive, my friends, the third watch of the night!

There are honest men passing up and down the street. Here is a city missionary who has been carrying a scuttle of coal to that poor family in that dark place. Here is an undertaker going up the steps of a building from which there comes a bitter cry which indicates that the destroying angel has smitten the first-born. Here is a minister of religion who has been giving the sacrament to a dying Christian. Here is a physician passing along in great haste, the messenger a few steps ahead hurrying on to the household.

Nearly all the lights have gone out in the dwellings, for it is the third watch of the night. That light in the window is the light of the watcher, for the medicines must be administered, and the fever must be watched, and the restless tossing off of the coverlid must be resisted, and the ice must be kept on the hot temples, and the perpetual prayer must go up from hearts soon to be broken.

Oh! the third watch of the night! What a stupendous thought—

A WHOLE CITY AT REST!

Weary arm preparing for to-morrow's toil. Hot brain being cooled off. Rigid muscles relaxed. Excited nerves soothed. The white hair of the octogenarian in thin drifts across the pillow, fresh fall of flakes on snow already fallen. Childhood with its dimpled hands thrown out on the pillow, and with every breath taking in a new store of fun and frolic. Third watch of the night! God's slumberless eye will look. Let one great wave of refreshing slumber roll over the heart of the great town, submerging care, and anxiety, and worriment, and pain.

Let the city sleep. But, my friends, be not deceived. There will be thousands to-night who will not sleep at all. Go up that dark alley, and be cautious where you tread, lest you fall over the prostrate form of a drunkard lying on his own door-step. Look about you, lest you feel the garroter's hug. Look through the broken window-pane, and see what you can see. You say, "Nothing." Then listen. What is it? "God help us!" No footlights, but tragedy ghastlier and mightier than Ristori or Edwin Booth ever enacted. No light, no fire, no bread, no hope. Shivering in the cold, they have had no food for twenty-four hours. You say, "Why don't they beg?" They do, but they get nothing. You say, "Why don't they deliver themselves over to the almshouse?" Ah! you would not ask that if you ever heard the bitter cry of a man or a child when told he must go to the almshouse.

"Oh!" you say, "they are

and, therefore, they do not demand our sympathy." Are they vicious? So much more need they your pity. The Christian poor, God helps them. Through their night there twinkles the round, merry star of hope, and through the broken window-pane they see the crystals of heaven; but the vicious poor, they are more to be pitied. Their last light has gone out. You excuse yourself from helping them by saying they are so bad, they brought this trouble on themselves. I reply, where I give ten prayers for the innocent who are suffering I will give twenty prayers for the guilty who are suffering.

The fisherman, when he sees a vessel dashing into the breakers, comes out from his hut and wraps the warmest flannels around those who are most chilled and most bruised and most battered in the wreck; and I want you to know that these vicious poor have had two shipwrecks—shipwreck of the body, shipwreck of the soul—shipwreck for time, shipwreck for eternity. Pity, by all means, the innocent who are suffering, but pity more the guilty.

Pass on through the alley. Open the door. "Oh," you say, "it is locked." No, it is not locked; it has never been locked. No burglar would be tempted to go in there to steal anything. The door is never locked. Only a broken chair stands against the door. Shove it back. Go in. Strike a match. Now, look. Beastliness and rags. See those glaring eyeballs. Be careful now what you say. Do not utter any insult, do not utter any suspicion, if you value your life. What is that red mark on the wall? It is the mark of a murderer's hand!

Look at those two eyes rising up out of the darkness and out from the straw in the corner, coming toward you, and as they come near you, your light goes out. Strike another match. Ah! this is a babe, not like those beautiful children this morning presented in baptism. This little one never smiled; it never will smile. A flower flung on an awfully barren beach. Oh! Heavenly Shepherd, fold that little one in Thy arms. Wrap around you your shawl or your coat tighter, for the December wind sweeps through.

Strike another match. Ah! is it possible that that young woman's scarred and bruised face ever was looked into by maternal tenderness? Utter no scorn. Utter no harsh word. No ray of hope has dawned on that brow for many a year. No ray of hope ever will dawn on that brow. But the light has gone out. Do not strike another light. It would be a mockery to kindle another light in such a place as that. Pass out and pass down the street. Our cities of Brooklyn and New York and all our great cities are full of such homes, and the worst time the third watch of the night.

Do you know it is in this third watch of the night that criminals do their worst work?

IT IS THE CRIMINAL'S WATCH.

At half-past eight o'clock you will find them in the drinking-saloon, but toward twelve o'clock they go to their garrets, they get out their tools, then they start on the street. Watching on either side for the police, they go to their work of darkness. This is a burglar, and the false key will soon touch the store lock. This is an incendiary, and before morning there will be a light on the sky, and cry of "Fire! fire!" This is an assassin, and to-morrow morning there will be a dead body in one of the vacant lots. During the daytime these villains in our cities lounge about, some asleep and some awake, but when the third watch of the night arrives, their eye keen, their brain cool, their arm strong, their foot fleet to fly or pursue, they are ready.

Many of these poor creatures were brought up in that way. They were born in a thieves' garret. Their childish toy was a burglar's dark-lantern. The first thing they remember was their mother bandaging the brow of their father, struck by the police club. They began by robbing boys' pockets, and now they have come to dig the underground passage to the cellar of the bank, and are preparing to blast the gold-vault.

Just so long as there are neglected children of the street, just so long we will have these desperadoes. Some one, wishing to make a good Christian point and to quote a passage of Scripture, expecting to get a scriptural passage in answer, said to one of these poor lads, cast out and wretched, "When your father and your mother forsake you, who then will take you up?" and the boy said, "The perlice, the perlice!"

THE GAMBLER'S WATCH.

In the third watch of the night gambling does its worst work. What though the hours be slipping away, and though the wife be waiting in the cheerless home? Stir up the fire. Bring o more drinks. Put up more stakes. That commercial house that only a little while ago pu out sign of copartnership will this winter b wrecked on a gamblers' table. There will b many a money-till that will spring a leak. member of Congress gambled with a membe elect and won $120,000. The old way of gettin a living is so slow. The old way of getting fortune is so stupid. Come, let us toss up an see who shall have it. And so the work goe on, from the wheezing wretches pitching pe nies in a rum-grocery up to the millionnaire gan bler in the stock market.

In the third watch of the night, pass down th streets of these cities, and you hear the click the dice and the sharp, keen stroke of the ba on the billiard-table. At these places mercha princes dismount, and legislators, tired of ma ing laws, take a respite in breaking them. classes of people are robbed by this crime, t importer of foreign silks and the dealer Chatham Street pocket-handkerchiefs. T clerks of the store take a hand after the shutte are put up, and the officers of the court whi away their time while the jury is out.

In Baden-Baden, when that city was the gre est of all gambling-places on earth, it was unusual thing the next morning, in the woo around about the city, to find the suspend bodies of suicides. Whatever be the splen of surroundings, there is no excuse for t crime. The thunders of eternal destructi roll in the deep rumble of that gambling tenp alley, and as men come out to join the long p cession of sin, all the drums of war beat the de march of the thousand souls.

In one year, in the city of New York, th were seven million dollars sacrificed at gaming-table. Perhaps some of your frie have been smitten of this sin. Perhaps so of you have been smitten by it.

Perhaps there may be a stranger in the ho this morning come from some of the hotels. Look out for those agents of iniquity who tarry around about the hotels, and ask you, "Would you like to see the city?" Yes. "Have you ever seen that splendid building up town?" No. Then the villain will undertake to show you what he calls the "lions" and the "elephants," and after a young man, through morbid curiosity or through badness of soul, has seen the "lions" and the "elephants," he will be on enchanted ground. Look out for these men who move around the hotels with sleek hats—always sleek hats—and patronizing air, and unaccountable interest about your welfare and entertainment. You are a fool if you cannot see through it. They want your money.

In Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, while I was living in that city, an incident occurred which was familiar to us there. In Chestnut Street a young man went into a gambling-saloon, lost all his property, then blew his brains out, and before the blood was washed from the floor by the maid the comrades were shuffling cards again. You see there is more mercy in the highwayman for the belated traveller on whose body he heaps the stones, there is more mercy in the frost for the flower that it kills, there is more mercy in the hurricane that shivers the steamer on the Long Island coast, than there is mercy in the heart of a gambler for his victim.

THE DRUNKARD'S WATCH.

In the third watch of the night, also, drunkenness does its worst. The drinking will be respectable at eight o'clock in the evening, a little flushed at nine, talkative and garrulous at ten, at eleven blasphemous, at twelve the hat falls off, at one the man falls to the floor asking for more drink. Strewn through the drinking-saloons of the city, fathers, brothers, husbands, sons as good as you are by nature, perhaps better.

In the high circles of society it is hushed up. A merchant prince, if he gets noisy and uncontrollable, is taken by his fellow-revellers, who try to get him to bed, or take him home, where he falls flat in the entry. Do not wake up the children. They have had disgrace enough. Do not let them know it. Hush it up. But sometimes it cannot be hushed up, when the rum touches the brain and the man becomes thoroughly frenzied. Such an one came home, having been absent for some time, and during his absence his wife had died, and she lay in the next room prepared for the obsequies, and he went in and dragged her by the locks, and shook her out of the shroud, and pitched her out of the window.

Oh! when rum touches the brain you cannot hush it up. My friends, you see all around about you the need that something radical be done. You do not see the worst. In the midnight meetings at London a great multitude have been saved. We want a few hundred Christian men and women to come down from the highest circles of society to toil amid these wandering and destitute ones, and kindle up a light in the dark alley, even the gladness of heaven.

Do not go wrapped in your fine furs and from your well-filled tables with the idea that pious talk is going to stop the gnawing of an empty stomach or to warm stockingless feet. Take bread, take raiment, take medicine as well as take prayer. There is a great deal of common-sense in what the poor woman said to the city missionary when he was telling her how she ought to love God and serve Him. "Oh!" she said, "if you were as poor and cold as I am, and as hungry, you could think of nothing else."

A great deal of what is called Christian work goes for nothing for the simple reason it is not practical; as after the battle of Antietam a man got out of an ambulance with a bag of tracts, and he went distributing the tracts, and George Stuart, one of the best Christian men in this country, said to him, "What are you distributing tracts for now? There are three thousand men bleeding to death. Bind up their wounds, and then distribute the tracts."

We want more common-sense in Christian work, taking the bread of this life in one hand, and the bread of the next life in the other hand. No such inapt work as that done by the Christian man who, during the last war, went into a hospital with tracts, and coming to the bed of a man whose legs had been amputated, gave him a tract on the sin of dancing! I rejoice before God that never are sympathetic words uttered, never a prayer offered, never a Christian almsgiving indulged in but it is blessed.

There is a place in Switzerland, I have been told where the utterance of one word will bring back a score of echoes; and I have to tell you this morning that a sympathetic word, a kind word, a generous word, a helpful word uttered in the dark places of the town will bring back ten thousand echoes from all the thrones of heaven.

Are there in this assemblage this morning those who know by experience the tragedies in the third watch of the night? I am not here to thrust you back with one hard word. Take the bandage from your bruised soul, and put on it the soothing salve of Christ's Gospel and of God's compassion. Many have come. I see others coming to God this morning, tired of the sinful life. Cry up the news to heaven. Set all the bells ringing. Spread the banquet under the arches. Let the crowned heads come down and sit at the jubilee. I tell you there is more delight in heaven over one man that gets reformed by the grace of God than over ninety and nine that never got off the track.

I could give you the history, in a minute, of

ONE OF THE BEST FRIENDS I EVER HAD.

Outside of my own family, I never had a better friend. He welcomed me to my home at the West. He was of splendid personal appearance, but he had an ardor of soul and a warmth of affection that made me love him like a brother. I saw men coming out of the saloons and gambling-hells, and they surrounded my friend, and they took him at the weak point, his social nature, and I saw him going down, and I had a fair talk with him—for I never yet saw a man you could not talk with on the subject of his habits, if you talked with him in the right way. I said to him, "Why don't you give up your bad habits and become a Christian?" I remember now just how he looked, leaning over his counter, as he replied: "I wish I could. Oh! sir, I should like to be a Christian, but I have gone so far astray I can't get back."

So the time went on. After a while the day of sickness came. I was summoned to his sick-bed. I hastened. It took me but a very few moments to get there. I was surprised as I went in. I saw him in his ordinary dress, fully dressed, lying on the top of the bed. I gave him my hand, and he seized it convulsively, and said: "Oh! how glad I am to see you. Sit down there." I sat down, and he said: "Mr. Talmage, just where you sit now my mother sat last night. She has been dead twenty years. Now, I don't want you to think I am out of my mind, or that I am superstitious; but, sir, she sat there last night just as certainly as you sit there now—the same cap, and apron, and spectacles. It was my old mother—she sat there." Then he turned to his wife, and said, "I wish you would take these strings off the bed; somebody is wrapping strings around me all the time. I wish you would stop that annoyance." She said, "There is nothing here."

THEN I SAW IT WAS DELIRIUM.

He said: "Just where you sit now my mother sat, and she said, 'Roswell, I wish you would do better—I wish you would do better.' I said, 'Mother, I wish I could do better; I try to do better, but I can't. Mother, you used to help me; why can't you help me now?' And, sir, I got out of bed, for it was reality, and I went to her, and threw my arms around her neck, and I said, 'Mother, I will do better, but you must help; I can't do this alone!'" I knelt down and prayed. That night his soul went to the Lord that made it.

Arrangements were made for the obsequies. The question was raised whether they should bring him to the church. Somebody said, "You can't bring such a dissolute man as that into the church." I said, "You will bring him in church; he stood by me when he was alive, and I will stand by him when he is dead. Bring him." As I stood in the pulpit and saw them carrying the body up the aisle, I felt as if I could weep

TEARS OF BLOOD.

On one side the pulpit sat his little child of eight years, a sweet, beautiful little girl that I had seen him hug convulsively in his better moments. He put on her all jewels, all diamonds, and gave her all pictures and toys, and then he would go away as if hounded by an evil spirit, to his cups and the house of shame—a fool to the correction of the stocks. She looked up wonderingly. She knew not what it all meant. She was not old enough to understand the sorrow of an orphan child.

On the other side the pulpit sat the men who had ruined him; they were the men who had poured wormwood into the orphan's cup; they were the men who had bound him hand and foot. I knew them. How did they seem to feel? Did they weep? No. Did they say, "What a pity that so generous a man should be destroyed?" No. Did they sigh repentingly over what they had done? No; they sat there, looking as vultures look at the carcass of the lamb whose heart they have ripped out. So they sat and looked at the coffin-lid, and I told them the judgment of God upon those who had destroyed their fellows. Did they reform? I was told they were in the places of iniquity that night after my friend was laid in Oakwood Cemetery, and they blasphemed, and they drank. Oh! how merciless men are, especially after they have destroyed you! Do not look to men for comfort or help. Look to God.

But there is a man who will not reform. He says, "I won't reform." Well, then, how many acts are there in a tragedy? I believe five.

ACT THE FIRST

of the tragedy: A young man starting off from home; parents and sisters weeping to have him go. Wagon rising over the hill. Farewell kiss flung back. Ring the bell and let the curtain fall.

ACT THE SECOND:

The marriage altar. Full organ. Bright lights. Long white veil trailing through the aisle. Prayer and congratulation, and exclamation of "How well she looks!"

ACT THE THIRD:

A woman waiting for staggering steps. Old garments stuck into the broken window-pane. Marks of hardship on the face. The biting of the nails of bloodless fingers. Neglect, and cruelty, and despair. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

ACT THE FOURTH:

Three graves in a dark place—grave of the child that died for lack of medicine, grave of the wife that died of a broken heart, grave of the man that died of dissipation. Oh! what a blasted heath with three graves! Plenty of weeds, but no flowers. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

ACT THE FIFTH:

A destroyed soul's eternity. No light. No music. No hope. Anguish coiling its serpents around the heart. Blackness of darkness forever. But I cannot look any longer. Woe! woe! I close my eyes to this last act of the tragedy. Quick! Quick! Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. "Rejoice, O young man! in thy youth, and let thy heart rejoice in the days of thy youth; but know thou that for all these things God will bring you into judgment." "There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof is death."

OUR SOCIAL DUTIES.

An Oration in London by J. B. Gough.

We are our Brother's Keeper—Scene of a Slave Sold at Auction—The Slavery of Drunkenness Worse—The Cobbler of Portsmouth—How to Elevate the Masses—Sunday Excursion Trains—How they were Stopped in New England—Schools of Vice—Evil of Music Halls and Dancing Rooms—A Scotch Castle, "Nae Hope"—Mr. Gough's Recollections of Poverty and of his Mother.

THERE is a social responsibility that is recognized by society everywhere. The law of the land holds men responsible for the loss or injury to life, or limb, or property, by malice, carelessness, or ignorance. If a chemist gives poison instead of the right prescription, through ignorance, you hold him responsible for the results. If a man throws a stone at a passing railway train, it will not do for him to say, "I did not think."

It is every man's duty to think what may be the consequences of his acts. If a sentry sleeps at his post, and owing to his carelessness and want of watchfulness mischief ensues, that sentry is held responsible. I might go on to illustrate this by the case of engineers, of light-house keepers, and of all those occupying positions in which their carelessness or want of thought may cause harm and damage to others. But there is a social responsibility recognized and enforced by the higher law of God, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

It is of this responsibility that I would speak more particularly to-night. Men of the world are generally opposed to the recognition of this responsibility, and they cry out with Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" But I address myself to-night to those who I trust profess to acknowledge God's law as supreme and paramount to all others; therefore I speak with some degree of encouragement, and hope that I shall receive sympathy while endeavoring to illustrate and enforce this responsibility.

And yet, among Christians, we find sometimes this question still asked—"And who is my neighbor?" I hold it to be a truth that every human being on the face of this earth, whom God .has made in His own image, is my brother. We justly feel indignation against those who do not choose to call the black man their brother. I spoke in Quincy in Illinois, one winter, some years ago, and I said, "I look upon every man, whether black or white, bond or free, as my brother," and they hissed me. It was on the borders of the Mississippi River, within a stone's throw of Missouri. You feel indignation at this want of recognition of the colored people as brethren; but, gentlemen, if you please, look not quite so loftily as only to see across some twenty-five hundred miles of ocean and a thousand miles of land, but look about you and around you, in this metropolis, at those who are the slaves of strong drink.

A SLAVE SOLD AT AUCTION.

Ah! I once saw a colored man sold, and I stood by the auction-block, while my wife, at a hundred yards' distance, was trying to comfort a little mulatto woman, because her master would not let her see her husband again. A trader from the south wanted to take the man down the river, and a benevolent man in the vicinity wanted to buy him to keep him with his wife and child. I shall never forget the look of agony with which he gazed upon the trader, and then the ray of hope that seemed to illumine his face as he looked upon his friend; but, presently, the trader offered a sum that shut out all hope, for his friend turned upon his heel and departed.

Then that man folded his arms, and I saw the twitching of the fingers, and I saw the convulsive workings of the throat; I saw the white tooth brought upon the lip, as if he would press the blood from under it; I saw the eyelids swollen with unshed tears; I saw the veins standing out like whipcords upon his brow, and the drops like beads upon his forehead—and I pitied him. It was human agony—and I pitied him. But as I looked at him, occasionally from his bloodshot eye there flashed a light that told of a wild, free spirit there—that told me there was a soul there that no human power could enslave; and then, black as he was, bought and sold as he was, he loomed up before me in the glorious attitude of a free man, compared with the miserable tobacco-chewing, whiskey-drinking, blaspheming slaves of lust that were bidding for their human brother.

THE SLAVERY OF DRUNKENNESS WORSE.

The most pitiful slave on the face of God's footstool is the man that is "bound by the cords of his own sin," that has sold himself for naught. There are many of your brethren in this city that are festering in the moral pool of degradation, and the question is, what shall we do for them? They are your brethren. Ay, see that poor miserable creature staggering through your street, the image of God wiped out, and the die of the devil stamped there; the body smitten with disease from head to heel, till he is as loathsome as Lazarus when he lay at the rich man's door. Though ye gather your garments about you as ye pass him, he is your brother, and you have a responsibility resting upon you in reference to him and his degradation.

See that heap of rags lying in that corner, with the bonnet pressed upon the face, covered with the mire of the streets; there lies your sister.

"But," you say, "she is drunk."

Ah! madam, I do not say it would be so, but perhaps if you had been brought up with all the horrible surroundings that she has, if you had been exposed to the temptations that she has, you would be drunk too.

I ask you, is there not something noble and glorious in the fact of seeking out our brethren, not amid the circle of society in which we move, not looking at our visiting-lists to find them, not looking around the pews in our places of worship to see them, but seeking for them in the midst of the haunts of vice and misery, making inquiries not only as to the fact of their degradation, but as to our responsibility in reference to that degradation? The most glorious men and women on the face of the earth have sought for their neighbors and their brethren out of their own circle.

JOHN POUNDS, THE COBBLER IN PORTSMOUTH, that used to go down upon the wharf to find his neighbors among the wretched, ragged, miserable children, and bribe them with two or three roasted potatoes to come into his little shop, eighteen feet by six, that he might teach them to read, and mend their clothes, and cook their food—he was a noble man, and John Pounds was the founder of ragged, schools. John Howard found his neighbors in lazar-houses of Europe; William Wilberforce and his glorious compeers found their neighbors among the negroes of the West India plantations.

Elizabeth Fry found her neighbors among the half-mad women of Newgate; and the heroine of the nineteenth century found her neighbors among the bruised, battered soldiers of the Crimea, and many a soldier in the hospitals of Scutari died with his glazed eye fixed with love and reverence on the angel-face of Florence Nightingale. These are your noble men and women—these are God's heroes. And when we would bring the matter right down to our own personal responsibilities, the question arises, and I have asked it many times myself—and there is not probably a benevolent man or a philanthropist but has asked the question—What shall be done to elevate the degraded masses?

That is the point—what is doing? Ragged schools—good! with all my heart I say good! And God bless their patrons! Model lodging-houses—good, as far as they go. But you cannot make a model man by putting him in a model house. You have got to elevate the man to the house, or he will bring the house down to his level. It must be by elevating the man that the work will be done; and the working classes of this country must elevate themselves. Oh, if we could only inspire them with that! The glory of it!

TO ELEVATE THEMSELVES!

Men of the world look with contempt on what is doing to elevate the degraded classes in a moral point of view. Some of our philanthropists, who "do love the working classes so much," propose to elevate them by excursion trains on the Sabbath. Now, I say you can never elevate a man nor a race by violating the law of God. "Remember the Sabbath-day, and keep it holy," is God's command. "But," they say, "these working classes, pent up in their wretched homes, need recreation and fresh air." Did you ever see

A SUNDAY RETURN EXCURSION TRAIN?

I went one Sabbath evening in the summer for the purpose of seeing a company of men and women return from "rational recreation"—and such a sight it was! There you would see a man with his hat brought down over his eyes, and a thorn stick under his arm that he had cut from the hedges, tottering along in a most pitiable state; then you would see a woman wih a child fastened upon her back with a shawl, and two or three more little ones coming along after her, crying, and dirty, and miserable. I never saw a set of men returning from twelve hours' hard labor that looked as jaded, as dispirited, and as miserable as that whole excursion party.

Now, I say that is not the way to elevate the working classes. Look at New England. And when I say New England, I point you to a portion of the United States that is standing up in all its glory with the principles of the good old Puritans; and to those that sneer at Puritanism I say, God send us more of it, if it teaches men to honor the Sabbath.

HOW SUNDAY TRAINS WERE STOPPED NEAR BOSTON.

In New England there is not an excursion train running on the Sabbath-day. I remember on one occasion, when an immense quantity of freight was to be brought from New York to Boston, they undertook to run on the Sabbath-day. They came up with a large load of cotton, and on coming near to M—— a bale caught fire, and there were not hands enough to roll it off; they then drove up to M——, and rang the bells, and the people came down to the number of three hundred. "Help us," said the railway people, "to put out the fire." "No, you have no business to run that train on the Sabbath." They then sent up to one of the directors, and said, "If you speak a word, these men will bring us water; there is property being destroyed." "I voted in the board of directors," he replied, "against this running on the Sabbath, and if you burn the whole freight I will not raise a finger." And the two car-loads of cotton were destroyed; the company had to pay for it, but they ran no more trains on the Sabbath.

I remember when they started a train from New York to Boston, and from Boston to New York, at four o'clock on Sunday afternoon, to satisfy those wonderfully busy merchants that wanted their letters early on Monday morning. Indignation meetings were held all along the line; and in New Haven they decided on three things—first, to petition the government to send no mail that day; next, to petition the directors to send no train that day; and then, if that did not answer, they resolved on taking advantage of an old clause in their city charter, to attach the locomotive as a nuisance, and not let it pass through their city.

Now look at our American working classes! I tell you, gentlemen, there is scarcely a country on the face of the earth—I believe there is none—that can show such a mass of honest, moral workingmen as native Americans. I am not speaking of imported monstrosities. Do not imagine I am saying a word against emigration to the United States: but let me say this, in regard to it, that it goes through a sifting process in our cities, so that the dregs are left there and in the vicinity, while the best emigrants go west and get land and work. Whatever the foreign emigrants may do, the born citizen, the peasantry, the working classes, are in favor of a strict Sabbath observance.

There are many ways of morally elevating the lower classes; but we will look, if you please—for I want to speak plainly—at the schools for the lower classes in this metropolis; and I say this, whether you believe me or not, that every man is responsible for the existence of these schools of vice who does not with all his heart and voice protest against them. If you please, let us rend asunder and expose to view some, perhaps to you, secrets of these charnel-houses.

EVIL OF MUSIC HALLS.

Let us have a protest against sinks of iniquity, "licensed by Act of Parliament." If you enter modern music halls, immediately on your entrance you will see persons looking like gentlemen (for they all wear white neckerchiefs, like a minister), and they will come to you with, "Your orders, gentlemen; your orders, gentlemen!" Drink. Ay, and over there they could not sustain the place without the drink. Drink everywhere. What do you see? Young men, boys and girls, seated with their ale, their porter, or their spirits and water before them, looking at a place called a stage, from whence comes forth some individual to sing a comic song to the horribly discordant thrum of an old pianoforte; and if you have patience to listen to that song, will find such a strain of immorality running through it that you put your hand to your ear and walk out, and thank God if you can get a breath of fresh, pure air.

Enter another place—licensed again! To be sure, all these places are licensed, they are according to law, and I maintain, therefore, the nation is responsible for them. We will not go into every corner of it; but there will be found a girl dressed in boy's clothes holding a dialogue with another girl, so impure that I say, gentlemen, if your daughter heard the words you would shudder for the consequences; and yet there are men and women and girls, and babes in arms, breathing in a horrible atmosphere of tobacco-smoke, drink, and impurity. Licensed!

Go, if you please, to another of these places; it is very magnificent, and I understand that a public speaker, at its opening, rejoiced that such a building was erected for the amusement and instruction of the working classes. You will see perhaps a thousand persons seated there. Drink! Drink! Drink! Drink! all the way through. "Your orders, gentlemen; your orders!" Young girls are there, not fifteen years of age, and the matron who brings her children with her. Then some one comes forth to sing a comic song, as it is called, but a song, when I hear it, that would make me weep as bitterly as I should weep if the singer was my own brother and I followed him to the grave.

ASSEMBLY ROOMS FOR DANCING.

Visit another, just of the same kind; and then go lower, and lower, and lower, and lower down, until the disgusting exhibitions are enough to make a man mad. Then, as a wind-up, we will go and see young men—young men! Where are their mothers? Where are their sisters? Oh, young men! I hardly suppose there is one here that flaunts and dances upon an open floor in sight of the spectators in the gallery with women he would not dare to speak of in the home circle. Ah! when that young man lays his impure hand on that vile woman, does he think of his sister? does he think of his mother. at whose knee he has knelt and felt her warm hand on his head as she taught him his prayers? And does he think of this, "Thou, God, seest me"?

Oh, if young men that are dancing the dance of death, while they whirl their painted partners round that room, could realize the awful presence of Him who is the Eternal Present, it seems to me they would sink upon their knees, and fall upon their face and cry, "Woe is me!"

But this is licensed! licensed! And as you pass out of that, what do you see? A drunken brawl; fighting and quarrelling; a poor wretched heap of rags, that looks like a woman, taken away upon a stretcher. Ah, yes! it is a sliding scale down, down, down, and here is the degradation.

Now I say this, gentlemen, that the degradation is not to be attributed to birth or to blood, but to education. Birth! A man may have a pedigree as long as the Irishman's who said he was "perfectly independent of Misther Noah;" for, said he, "in the time of the deluge, one of my ancesthers saved himself in a boat of his own kinsthruction." I hope I shall not be misunderstood as throwing any slight upon the nobility or the aristocracy of this land. When I went once to Manchester, and saw 7,000,000*l.* sterling worth of art treasures exhibited that the workingman might look at for a shilling or sixpence, I felt that the nobility of Great Britain were noble more than in name to do that for the benefit of the poor.

But I do say—and you will excuse me for saying it, for I want to go as high as I dare—you may take a boy, born to ducal honors, in a ducal palace; he shall be baptized by the archbishop, and you shall take him at three weeks of age, and give him into the hands of one of the drunken hags in the slums of your city, and let him be brought up with all these horrible surroundings; let him be educated as those children are educated, and the son of a duke will become a thief as quickly as the boy born in the slums.

There is as much human depravity in the one as in the other; but here is a hotbed in which the seeds of original sin sown in our mortal body take root, and spring up, and fructify, and bring forth, and we are shocked at the harvest. Let us look at the cause of it; let us drain these horrible hotbeds, and go to work like men to remove the cause. I know we speak of the lower classes as being degraded; so they are, and it seems to me, sometimes, as if there was a gulf between them and respectability, over which they never could leap, and society has broken down the bridge.

I WAS ONCE IN A CASTLE, IN SCOTLAND, and they told me that in a dungeon, a hundred feet below me, on the walls, were scratched these words, "Nae hope." And may not many who are in the debased and degraded classes of this city grave upon the walls that society has built up between them and respectability the words, "Nae hope"? Now I say, brethren, if you are all the children of one common Father, help us in this work. I asked, Was it birth, or was it blood, or is it poverty, that makes this degradation? I thank God there can be poverty with no degradation.

Yes, my earliest recollections are recollections of poverty—hard, bitter, grinding poverty. When, arriving from America, I revisited my native village, Sandgate in Kent, in 1853, I went in the midst of a glorious English harvest, and I went out into the wheat-fields; it seemed as though the hedges were the same that they were twenty-three years ago—as if the farm-houses were the same; and, for the pleasure it afforded me, I selected one wheat-field, and walked up and down eight or ten times. Why? Because I remembered a little old woman, the schoolmistress of the village, with her hand upon her weary back, and her two children, my sister Mary and myself, who gleaned in that field the ears left by the reapers; and we were to have a half-holiday to thrash our wheat and take it to the mill.

And I remember the face of that blessed mother of mine, who, though she was poor, was never degraded; she was one of the Lord Jesus Christ's nobility; she had the patent signed and sealed in His blood. When He saw fit to try her, He put her in the crucible, and when He saw His image reflected in the gold, He took her home. Oh, there was no degradation there! I remember how her face has brightened, and she would thank God, when I used to come in and say, "Mother! good news; flour is down, and the loaf has fallen a penny."

Ah, yes, poverty! but, thank God, no degradation. I grant you that the poor man's lot is a hard one, from the beginning to the end; struggling to gain the meat that perisheth; living from day to day, fighting for food in a rough and heartless world; it is a hard lot. But the poor have this honor, that they are Christ's legacy to His Church: "The poor ye have always with you." And His mission was to the poor.

Now you will allow me, if you please, to state what I consider to be the great cause of the degradation of those who are termed the lower classes; and I express my own opinion freely and fully.

I BELIEVE THAT INTEMPERANCE IS THE GREAT DEGRADING CURSE OF THE COUNTRY;

the very vice itself is debasing and degrading. Drunkenness—what is it? I have attempted sometimes to describe it, but I always feel that I have made a great failure of it. A drunkard—a man, with a man's capacities, with a man's sources of enjoyment, with a man's intellect and a man's reason, a man's heart and a man's soul, lowering himself below the level of the beasts, over whom God gave him dominion—is a most pitiful sight.

Mr. Gough, in speaking at Sheffield on October 22d, said: "William Noble is doing great work at Hoxton Hall, in London (hear, hear). I went there to one of his meetings, and took with me Dr. Taylor, of New York. I never shall forget it—one thousand debased, ragged, wretched beings. The gallery filled with those who probably came just to look on out of curiosity. Dr. Taylor had asked me where I could take him that night. I said to the Hoxton Music Hall. 'Oh, dear me,' said he, 'you don't go to such places as that, do you?' 'Yes,' I replied, 'I will go to night.' 'What do they do?' 'They sing.' 'Well,' he said, 'I will go with you.' When we stood on the platform, and they sang 'Oh, I am so weary of sin,' my heart went out to them. Then Mr. Noble said, 'Let us sing our favorite hymn;' they sang 'When I survey the wondrous cross.'

"Dr. Taylor could not restrain his feelings of emotion at the scene. And when Mr. Noble said, 'Those who will sign the pledge come forward,' many eagerly advanced. 'Now,' he said, 'before you take the pledge we will have two minutes of silent prayer.' I said to myself, 'This is a risky business with many rough-looking characters.' But you could have heard a whisper during the whole two minutes; you heard some sighs and some soft aspirations, and that was all. Well, I never had my heart so stirred in my life as I did when I looked upon them, and realized the work that was being accomplished by the means of Mr. William Noble (hear, hear), and the whole country ought to help him and support him in that grand, noble work. It reminded me of similar scenes that I had witnessed in America."

Knocking away Props.—"See, father," said a lad who was walking with his father, "they are knocking away the props from under the bridge; what are they doing that for? Won't the bridge fall?" "They are knocking them away," said the father, "that the timbers may rest more firmly upon the stone piers, which are now finished."

So God often takes away our earthly props that we may rest more firmly upon Divine supports. God sometimes takes away a man's health that he may rest upon Him for his daily bread. Before his health failed, though he perhaps repeated daily the words, "Give us this day our daily bread," he looked to his own industry for that which he asked of God. That prop being taken away, he rests wholly upon God's Providential bounty. He receives his bread; he receives it as a gift of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress seems almost at a stand-still. Instead of despatching the large amount of work left over from last session, each party is busy laying plans to control the organization of the next session.

Besides the bills preparing or already offered, there were four hundred and thirty-two bills left over from the previous session in the House, besides three special orders, nine resolutions, and one hundred and sixty-four bills from the Senate.

Among the bills to be considered by both houses are some which are very important—a bill to provide for the survey of the land and water route, and canal, from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean; to amend the Texas Pacific Railroad Act; to establish the Territory of Lincoln, and provide a temporary government therefor; to repeal all that part of the Resumption Act which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency; to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for the President and Vice-President; and many other bills of vital interest to the people. It would be well if party interests could be laid aside and the real interests of the country attended to.

Socialism.—The German Government is determined in its opposition to Socialism. Active measures have been commenced for the purification of their country from this insidious evil. They have begun the enforcement of the new laws against it by banishing all the leading Socialists from Berlin, and by suppressing every newspaper of Socialistic views or tendencies. The consequences will be a greatly increased immigration of that class to this country, and a further degradation of public sentiment by the admixture. In Europe the great object of Socialistic attack is the monarchy; in this country its efforts are directed against the rights of property in any and all its vested forms, against a strong government in any shape, and against those customs and habits of society that have conduced to the growth of civilization. Their actions are calculated (whatever their designs may be) to reduce the upper classes to the level of the lower, not to assist the lower classes to rise to a higher level.

The Subjugation of the Cuban Insurgents.—Notwithstanding the declaration by the Spanish Government that order is completely restored, it is not yet effected; peace in that island is far from being a settled fact. A large body of Cuban republicans are again in arms, and the prospect of a renewal of the war for independence seems imminent. A number of secret meetings of the exiled patriots have been held in this city, where plans have been perfected, material aid raised, and promised co-operation given to an extent indicative of a hope of success. Meanwhile, active hostilities have commenced in Cuba. In Cinco Villas, on the 15th of November, an encounter took place between the Cuban forces under Col. Bonachea and a Spanish cavalry force under Col. Machin. Col. Machin and seven men were killed and thirteen others wounded. Also from St. Jago de Cuba telegrams received at headquarters in Havana report a fierce encounter in the Eastern Department, on the 17th, between the insurrectionary forces under Brig.-Gen. Jose Maceo and a detachment of Spanish troops. The Spanish column had forty-five men and two officers killed and wounded.

Gen. Campos was despatched from Havana to inaugurate a vigorous campaign against Col. Bonachen, and Gen. Dabau has taken the field to organize the pursuit of Maceo and his band.

Don Manuel Pardo, ex-President of Peru and President of the Peruvian Senate, was assassinated at 2 P.M. on November 19th, as he was about entering the Senate Chamber, by Sergeant Melchor, of the Guard of Honor, who, it is conjectured, was actuated by motives of personal animosity. Although a young man, barely forty-four years of age, he had attained great prominence in the political affairs of his country, to whom his death will prove a severe loss.

At the time of the war between the Peruvians and Spain Señor Pardo was appointed Provisional Dictator of Peru; at the close of his second year in office a revolution broke out against him, and he resigned his office and embarked for Chili. For four years the country remained in a disturbed condition. On the restoration of order, Señor Pardo was recalled from exile and almost unanimously elected President. Under his administration confidence was restored and every branch of national industry prospered. Railroads were built, river navigation begun, education placed within the reach of all, telegraph lines constructed, and the finances reorganized. While Mayor of Lima, some years ago, the yellow-fever became epidemic in the city. While all the wealthy inhabitants fled, he remained at his post, preserved order in the city, and visited the hospital and the poor sufferers daily, and was able to alleviate much suffering. This conduct endeared him to the people, who loudly call for vengeance upon his murderer.

Another English Bank has succumbed to the prevailing depression of trade. This time it is the West of England and South Wales District Bank, having its headquarters at Bristol, that has closed its doors. The bank paid a dividend last year of eight per cent on its shares. It will cause a widespread calamity, as the shares were of small amount and are principally held by the middle classes. such as professional men and tradesmen, and it is precisely these persons who, in the present position of English society, are least able to bear such a loss. They find retrenchment more difficult than any other class, and they are less able to increase their incomes to meet a sudden strain. The failure of the bank is attributed to the depression of business long prevailing in the iron districts of South Wales.

Mr. Mapleson, the Operatic Manager, is again in trouble with his artistes. Miss Minnie Hauk, his principal vocalist, writes to the press in justification of herself, and claiming the sympathy of the public. It appears that Mr. Mapleson required her to sing at a Sunday concert, and Miss Hauk refused. A threat that if she persisted in her refusal she would be fined a week's salary failed to move the lady, and the concert took place minus the principal attraction. Miss Hauk claims, in her letter, the Sunday as her own, for the purposes of "rest and devotion," and considers that whatever country she may be required by her manager to visit, she has an inalienable claim to that day. It is not for us to decide as to the sincerity of the lady's motives, but we are glad to see that a protest is made against the desecration of the Lord's day by these notorious Sunday concerts. They are a disgrace to a Christian city, and are preparing the way for Sunday theatrical representations and the other abominations that go to make up a Parisian Sunday. We trust New York will never be seen following the pernicious example of her dissolute sister-city in making Sunday a day of amusement and frivolity.

Distress in Sheffield.—The distress and destitution among the working people in Sheffield, England, are now far more serious and more extensive than was the case last year. To give an idea of the scarcity of work, it may be stated that at one place where formerly 1200 men were engaged only 40 are now employed. It is also feared that the government contracts for plates have left the town, inasmuch as the large firms cannot compete with Barrow, Middlesbrough, Swansea, and Newport houses, who have the advantage of carriage by sea. The last contract for 20,000 tons of plates went into South Wales, and thus $1,500,000 is lost to Sheffield. The destitution among the working people is appalling. Hundreds are living in houses stripped of furniture, without fire, and are dependent upon the generosity of the neighbors. Prompt measures of relief are being taken. Soup-kitchens will be opened and children's dinners supplied in a few days.

Ladies' dress has unexpectedly become a subject of unpleasant prominence in the Viceregal Court of Canada. The Princess Louise has requested the ladies attending her receptions to appear in a costume of the same kind as that in vogue at her mother's drawing-rooms in England. This fashion consists, so far as the shoulders and chest are concerned, in a state of nudity, relieved by a jewelled necklace, which, however costly and ornamental it may be, is not of much utility when worn as an article of dress. Something more than this is needed to protect the delicate vessels of the throat and breast from the sharp, nipping blasts of a Canadian winter. If the Princess persists in her absurd command, it may issue in an alarming outbreak of bronchial and pulmonary diseases among the fair daughters of the Canadian aristocracy, and may cause many a sad and untimely death. It will be sad indeed if the unwise introduction of the punctilio and ceremony of English Court life into Canada should carry sorrow and mourning into the homes of the people. That would be a gloomy reminiscence for the Canadians to preserve of a régime so heartily and loyally welcomed. It is to be hoped that those gentlemen who will be the advisers of the illustrious pair, and who, if report speaks truly, are familiar with English customs as well as with Canadian life, will dissuade the royal lady from her foolish notions of court etiquette, which will be very unwelcome if not ridiculous on this side the Atlantic. There are moral and social reasons also why the innovation should not be introduced into Canada.

The English Parliament met December 5th. It is not usually summoned until nearly the close of February, but the outbreak of the Afghan war has this year rendered a winter session necessary. According to the English Constitution, the monarch possesses the sole right of making war and concluding peace; but as money is one of the essential necessaries of war, and as that cannot be raised except by the authority of the House of Commons, a declaration of war and a meeting of Parliament are closely connected. The Queen's speech at the opening ceremony simply stated the circumstances which had involved the necessity of summoning Parliament, and the usual formal address in reply was voted by the houses. It is expected that the session will be short and occupied almost exclusively with the questions relating to the Afghan war. The leaders of the Liberal party expressed their intention not to embarrass the government in the prosecution of the war, but a notice of motion hostile to the Afghan policy was subsequently given by an independent member of the Liberal party. The government propose to draw the expenses of the war from the Indian exchequer; a protest was, however, made against that course by Henry Fawcett, the faithful friend of India, who opposes it on the ground that it places a heavy burden unjustly on the shoulders of a poor and an already overtaxed people. Lords Derby and Carnarvon criticised the government with the vigor and animosity which usually characterizes the attacks of friends who have become enemies.

A Praying Sailor Boy.—When Sir James Anderson, commander of the Great Eastern, went to sea in early life, his mother made him promise to say his prayers on shipboard, no matter what opposition or ridicule he might meet with. One sailor boxed the boy's ears and affected to regard him as a hypocrite, whereon another, one of the saddest scapegraces on board, championed the boy, invited the bully on deck and gave him a tremendous thrashing, adding a grim warning that he would serve any one else in the same way who would prevent the boy from saying his prayers. Next night the gentle-hearted boy, to avoid strife, undertook to say his prayers in his hammock, whereon his protector lugged him out by the back of the neck and gave him plainly to understand that he was not to shirk his duty; that when his champion did the fighting his protégé would have to do the praying; and he kept him duly to his task.

Mr. D. L. Moody, in connection with ministers of various denominations in Baltimore, has issued a request to the Christian churches of this country that special prayer may be offered during the month of January next for a revival of God's work in our midst. The call is signed by seventeen prominent clergymen of different evangelical bodies, and asks that a general and united effort may be made, by intercession with God, for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the churches of our land.

Already a large number of clergymen and laymen in New York, Philadelphia, and other places have given a hearty response to this appeal, and every day the expectation strengthens that the ensuing month will be consecrated by all Christians, publicly and privately, to earnest pleading at the throne of Heavenly Grace for a general revival throughout the length and breadth of our land. A project so hallowed will surely find favor in every Christian's heart, and will be remembered in the closet and in the sanctuary. United, earnest prayer for such a blessing never failed yet, and we are justified in expecting from a widespread effort such as this the most glorious results.

Mrs. M. Baxter writes from Stuttgart, which is the capital of Würtemberg: "God was with us in the women's meetings at Heilbronn. We have a room here in Stuttgart which has been used for the meetings of the Social Democrats. It is blessed to sing God's praises where meetings of such an opposite character have been held. Pray for us, we have women's meetings every evening this week."

A Calamitous Flood occurred at Norwich, Eng., on Sunday, Nov. 17th. It rained for several days, and the river Wensum burst its banks and overflowed the greater part of the city. Four or five miles of streets were converted into rivers. Hundreds of houses, besides factories, mills, warehouses, breweries, ironworks, and churches and chapels having been flooded with a great depth of water, and the destruction to property is estimated at 50,000*l*. The distress is so great that many schoolrooms and chapels have had to be appropriated as temporary places of refuge for the large number of people who have had to turn out of their homes. Measures have been adopted for giving food and shelter to the families who had to be removed by boats from the upper windows of the houses.

Pathetic Yellow Fever Incident.—The Chicago News relates that recently a bright-eyed, pretty little fellow, of four years of age, was taken by the conductor of a train to the Palmer House, Chicago. The child was quiet and obedient, but occasionally the tears would stream down his cheeks, and though he did not cry aloud, the heavy sobs shook him him while the tiny hands tried vainly to hide the baby face. He was all alone in the world, and the love and kindness of strangers were all that comforted him. About his neck was a ribbon, to which was attached a card with the following inscription: "To the Masonic Fraternity—Forward the orphan to San Francisco.—Howard Association, New Orleans." Very tenderly did the ladies at the hotel care for the child, petting and caressing him until he forgot his sorrow. He was the last survivor of the family of Henry E. Wilcox, of New Orleans. In the past three weeks his father, mother, four sisters and brothers had died of yellow fever. The association, learning that he had relations in San Francisco, telegraphed as to the disposal of the child. The answer was prompt. He would be fondly loved by friends in that city, and they wanted him at once. There was but one way to send him, so the poor little fellow was committed to strangers for the long trip of nearly 4000 miles. Everywhere he had met with the greatest attention, passengers on the various cars taking entire charge of him and attending to all his wants. Ladies in Chicago took him to the west-bound train, and after giving him a bountiful supply of toys and dainties, left him to the kindly care of the conductor.

SEEKING AND FINDING GOD.

A Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"If thou seek Him, He will be found of thee."—I. CHRON. 28 : 9.

1. Our Greatest Need, God—This World Unsatisfying—2. How that Need may be Supplied—Not by Money or Good Works, but by Believing in Christ—Unbelief makes God a Liar—London and its Provisions—Praying not always Believing—The Sunday Beggar—Faith the Cup of the Fountain—The Blind Man at the Bank Crossing—The Dog in the Garden—3. THESE were among the last words of David—weighty words, the words of a great man, when he came to die. There was a special emphasis in them; and David is speaking them to you and to me from his dying bed to-night, and saying, "If thou seek him, he will be found of thee."

These words were spoken to his son—one of the wisest of men, and David would not give him instruction in what was commonplace or in that which was at all doubtful; but speaking to his son and heir, in whom he took much pride, he said solemnly, My son, if thou seek him, he will be found of thee." He knew that sometimes he wanted God, and he was glad to be able to tell him that the mercy of God was to be had for the seeking.

and I trust have begun to seek him. My object and desire is that God the Holy Spirit may help me to find these people out, and that they will find the Saviour or be found of him. May God grant it, and he shall have the glory.

There are three or four things which I wish to speak to you about. First, our text indicates our greatest need—God. What we need above everything else in this world is God. We are creatures of God, and we are so created that we cannot get on without him. We may try, but God has so constituted us that if we live at all without him it cannot be life—it is only a wretched existence. Just as the branch separated from the vine cannot bring forth fruit, so, separated from God, our nature can never rise to its true standard, and never can enjoy true and perfect happiness. We want God. Possibly there are some here that used to be satisfied with the pleasures of the world, but a little something has come over them, they don't know what; they have got discontented—unrest has taken possession of them.

YOU USED TO ATTEND SCENES OF GAYETY,

you used to be perfectly satisfied with your business, and the income which you derived from it, but now you want something further. There is in your heart an aching void which the world can never fill. I believe that what you want to fill you is God, nothing else will do it, and I trust you will to-night say, "The peace of God overflows my soul, and now can I rest and be at peace." You want God the Father. You want the Father's love, the Father's care, the Father's provision, and you must have it or else you will be like the prodigal—far away, unable to fill yourself with the swine husks, and die of starvation.

You want Jesus Christ, the Son of God. You may not know it, but your greatest want is his blood to wash you, and then his righteousness to clothe you. You can never be what you should be till you get Jesus Christ. You want the third person of the blessed Trinity, namely, the Holy Spirit, to come and soften your hard heart and work repentance and faith in you. You want him to come and lift those eyes upward that have been looking downward like the beasts that perish. You want him to give you noble aspirations, chaste desires, pure longings, and to make you like Jesus Christ, in the image of God. In a word, you want Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and you can't be right until you get these three persons of the Divine Unity.

Thou, O Lord, art all I want,
More than all in Thee I find.

Secondly, our text, after indicating our need, tells us how it may be supplied. "If thou seek him, he will be found of thee." Now we cannot get God by any process except that of seeking. It is not said, "If thou earn his favor, he will be found of thee." No money payments could possibly be of any value to God. If you gave all you possessed to the cause of God, it would be idle to dream that it would be anything to him; for what does he say? "If I were hungry I would not tell thee, for the cattle on a thousand hills are mine." It is also said of him that Lebanon, covered with forests as it was, would not be sufficient to furnish the wood for a sacrifice, and if the whole mountain were to be an altar, the beasts thereof, though there were flocks of sheep and cattle, all of them put together would not be sufficient for a burnt-offering for him. There is nothing to bring to God with which we can sue for his favor. Let not the rich man glory in his wealth, for in that city like unto transparent glass, you cannot imagine that your paltry money would be worth anything to such a King as that. The text does not say anything about buying it, nor does it say anything about trying to deserve the favor of God. Nor does it say it is to be secured by the sacraments, or anything of the sort.

WHERE EVERY PAVEMENT-STONE IS OF PURE GOLD,

The New Testament teaches us the true seeking of the Lord, and that it is to be found in believing. A man has rebelled against God, and God says to him, "I have given my Son to die. He has forfeited for you his life, notwithstanding all your sins. Will you trust me now, will you believe in him? Will you repose upon the love of my heart as I show it in his bleeding wounds?" As soon as the man does trust God it begets a change in his entire nature. The way of truly seeking the Lord is to take what he says to be true, and believe it, especially to take what he says about Jesus Christ to be true.

I meet with some who say, "I cannot believe I have tried to do it, but I cannot." Now, if I were your neighbor and you knew me, and whenever I propounded a statement you always shook your head and said, "I don't believe you," I do not know anything more insulting, for it is calling a man a liar. Supposing you say "Now I have tried to believe you and I cannot," that is to say, "You are such an awful liar that, although I try sometimes to think you do speak the truth, I really cannot." Would that be reasonable? And although some of you may smile, I ask you to apply that to yourselves; for you really mean it when you have said to God, "I cannot believe it. I have tried to believe it and I cannot."

What says the Apostle John? "He that believeth not hath made him a liar because he hath not believed in the Son of God." An unbeliever does, in the bottom of his heart, make God a liar. If a person sits down and says, "I want to believe a thing," he cannot make himself believe it without an effort. Sitting still won't make you believe it. I want you to consider from this Book, and from the testimony it contains, whether Jesus Christ be not worthy of your trust. To those who have sat at the foot of the Cross and are saved, it seems harder to doubt than to believe, and I will show you why.

IN LONDON WE HAVE ABOUT FOUR MILLION INHABITANTS.

When you ride through those miles of streets which cross and intersect it everywhere, you very likely say at the end of the day, ".I am so tired by riding about this big city, and I can't make out how all these people get sufficient bread and meat to eat. It seems impossible that they should be supported from day to day." When, the next morning, you are up, and take a walk to the cattle, vegetable, and corn markets, you say, "I can't make out where the people come from to eat all this."

Don't you see you have altered your views because you have changed the subject of consideration? If you consider your sins, you will say, "I can't understand how an atonement sufficient can ever be made for this guilt," and the more you investigate sin the more you will marvel how an adequate atonement could be provided to put away such sin. But when you come to look at Christ, and see him there, God over all, blessed forever, whom angels worshipped and loved, ere sun and moon and stars were born, the blessed God veiled in human flesh, which he took of the Virgin, and hear him cry in the weakness of manhood, "I thirst," and "My God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" in the strength of awful agony, and when you see him at last bow his head and give up the ghost, you say, "Lord, I can trust thee with my soul, and if I had a thousand souls I could trust them all, and I understand how thou couldst save a perishing world, for the atonement offered by one so august in character, so perfect in motives, and so disinterested must have merit in it that will blot out ten thousand times ten thousand sins." You now believe the Saviour's precious blood can not only put out the flame of sin in this one world, but in thousands of worlds, if God see fit to use it so.

SEE HIM HANGING ON THE CROSS,

Thus you see that seeking the Lord is believing in him. Well, says one, "I understand that, but I thought we were to pray." Yes, it is a good thing to pray, but I do believe some people put prayer in the place of believing.

I WAS TALKING TO A MAN IN A ROOM ALONE, and putting the Gospel before him. I said, "My friend, you understand that Jesus Christ has offered an atonement for sin to all those who trust in him, and if you trust him now, you will have present salvation. "Well, sir," he said, "will you pray for me?" I started back and said, "No, I have put this before you, that Jesus Christ has made atonement for sin, and I bid you trust in him. If you refuse to do that, what do you want me to ask God to give you? Am I to ask God to alter his plan of salvation to please you? Am I to ask him to do more than he has done in giving his own Son?" "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Praying unbelieving prayers won't help any one a bit. At the same time, if any of you have a little spark of faith, and want to get nearer to God, I would say: "Be much in earnest prayer, for you cannot pray too much." One way in which a man can pray is to do what very often beggars in London do. They must not beg.

I SEE A MAN EVERY SUNDAY WHO NEVER BEGS, but who sits down against a crossing, holding a broom. I never saw him use it. He shows his toe through his boot, a piece of his knee through his trousers, and his elbow through his coat. He never begs, he only shows his poverty, and that is the very finest begging. There is more got in that way than in any other. If you cannot do anything better than that, go and show with all your poverty what a poor soul you are. An excellent prayer is: "I am a poor ragged sinner, and do not know how to pray." Jacob's ladder reached to heaven, but the bottom rested on the earth, and it is just so with the sinner. God's mercy is within reach, and stretches all the way to heaven. Whatever your state and condition may be, the love of God is prepared to deal with you just where you are. "If thou seek him, he will be found of thee." Our prayer becomes a blessed help in the matter of faith. Remember that faith is the main thing, and it is that which saves the soul.

FAITH IS TO CHRIST WHAT THE CUP IS TO THE FOUNTAIN.

For instance, there is a fountain, but the thirsty man cannot drink of it because he cannot get the water to his lips. The cup does not quench his thirst, but he gets the water to his lips by means of the cup, and drinks. So with faith: it holds the cup of the fountain of divine love, and so the soul drinks. Hast thou no faith to-night, poor soul? Canst thou venture to trust Christ? Canst thou, with much timidity and fear, believe and drink away? As an illustration of what faith is, I will give you another anecdote.

I WAS ONCE AT THE BANK OF ENGLAND, and wanted to get across the street. There are six or seven streets just there, and a person cannot cross without great inconvenience. As I stood there, I heard

A POOR BLIND MAN REPEATING, "PLEASE LEAD ME ACROSS."

Nobody seemed anxious to undertake the task. But he caught hold of me, and said, "I feel sure you will lead me across, kind gentleman." I was in for it, and could not help it. I was bound to take him across, because he trusted me. I, perhaps, did not like to be selected, but I was bound to get him across somehow. And whenever a poor soul comes and says, "Lord, I am a poor wicked soul, and trust in thee to save me," he will do it, and will never let faith outstrip him. If thou canst believe a little, God will do great things for thee, and if thou canst believe greater things, God will do greater things for thee. Another story may show you in a very broad light the power which faith exercises over us even in the case of the lower animals.

I WALKED DOWN MY GARDEN SOME TIME AGO, WHEN THE FLOWERS WERE NICELY OUT, AND SAW A BIG DOG, and as I was sure he knew nothing of gardening, I threw my walking-stick at him, and gave him some recommendations to go home. To my intense surprise and shame, the dog picked up my stick, and, wagging his tail, dropped the stick down at my feet. He beat me altogether. I said to him, "Good dog!" and I told him he could come when he liked, if he was a dog of that sort. I felt I was the worst dog of the two. He quite conquered me by trusting me, and it came across my mind in a moment—dog as I am compared with my great and gracious God, I'm sure if I trust Him I shall be more than a match for him. He will be sure to deal gently, kindly, and tenderly with me if I can but believe in him. How the dog should trust me after I threw the stick at him, I do not know, and when the Lord has been smiting you, when you have been sick and ill and lost your property, it is just as if the stick had been thrown at you. Bring it to him and say, with Job, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

Thirdly, the text assures us of the success of the search—"If thou seek him, he will be found of thee." I believe that to be true because God has said so, and has said, "Seek ye the Lord when he may be found, call upon him while he is near." "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thought. Let him turn to the Lord, he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." Again: "Whosoever believeth in him shall be saved, but whosoever believeth not is condemned. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." And he said further to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Now, if you have God's word and faith, it is all you want; believe him and you must be saved. If you seek the Lord, you will find him, first because he is really near to you. Sinner, he is near to you.

I HAVE HEARD OF A VESSEL THAT CROSSED THE SEA AND SAILED UP THE RIVER AMAZON, which is so broad as to seem like the sea itself. The vessel was short of water, and they watched till another vessel went by, and hav ing hailed her through a speaking trumpet said that they were in want of water. Th answer came back, "Dip it up, you are in th river." All around you is fresh water, whic you thought was the briny sea. You have noth ing to do but dip the bucket over. Now yo poor sinner, say, "O that I could find God !" Here he is in this very place. You have not t feel this for months, or years, but believe now for God is here, present, waiting to be graciou Well may seekers find him when he is so nea

Another reason is that God delights to be found, and if you want to find him you are pretty sure to meet him. Moreover, if you are seeking him, it is because he is seeking you.

DID YOU EVER HAVE YOUR BOY BRINGING A MAGNET HOME, and thinking he is showing you great wonders when he is drawing a needle with the magnet under the table? So it is with our Father's love. The needle moves, but there is a sacred magnet underneath, and a poor soul seeks the Lord because he is seeking him. But few understand the secret why they are drawn towards him. I am sure you will find him for one more reason. There never was a sinner who sought the Lord in vain, and who sought him by faith in Jesus.

I REMEMBER HEARING MY MOTHER SAY, when I was seeking the Saviour—she did not know I was—that she did not believe that there was ever a man lived who dared say, "I sought the Lord with all my heart through Jesus Christ, and he refused me." When she said that, I exclaimed, "I know I have sought him with all my heart and cannot find him, and I shall be the man who will say that." But I never did, for ere long I found the Lord to my heart's content. I do not believe there is a soul in hell who can say, "I did believingly seek the Lord, and yet could not be found of him."

I will close with the last point, which is to take my text, and use it as a finger beckoning to reach unconverted persons in this place to-night, one by one. I cannot go round to you and take you all by the hand, but I would say to each one present, "If thou wilt seek him, he will be found of thee." I should like to pick out first of all the young people now present. It is a great mercy to see a number of young men and young women coming to hear the Gospel, and I would say to you, you have a promise of your own in the text which says, "They who seek me early shall find me." You old people who love the Lord, always think of the young people, and try to cheer and encourage them.

WHEN I WAS A LITTLE BOY, ABOUT NINE OR TEN YEARS OF AGE, and lived with my grandfather, who was a minister, Mr. Knill came round and preached in his chapel, and made collections for the missionary society. I used to read at family prayers, and in the evening Mr. Knill called me to him and said, "Where do you sleep?" He asked me if I would get up in the morning, and I was of course delighted. He said, "I shall come at six o'clock and call you up, and you must go with me." I remember our walking down my grandfather's garden, and his talking to me about Jesus Christ. My grandfather had two arbors made of yew-trees, trimmed like sugar-loaves, and Mr. Knill put his arms round me and urged me to love the Lord Jesus Christ. On Sunday morning he did the same thing, and again on Monday morning. (If old people would do this with young people, what a blessing would come of it.) And when Mr. Knill called upon my grandfather, before leaving, he said,

"THIS LITTLE CHILD WILL PREACH TO MORE PEOPLE IN MODERN TIMES THAN ANY OTHER MAN. HE WILL PREACH IN SURREY CHAPEL AND WOOTTON-UNDER-EDGE."

He gave me sixpence to learn the hymn "God moves in a mysterious way," and he said, "When you preach there, give that hymn to the people to sing." I did preach in those chapels, and we sang that hymn, and Mr. Knill lived to hear me, and to rejoice at what he had done. Look after the young people, ministers, for you don't know what may come of it.

The other Sunday evening I said I was afraid that some Christians never prayed for their children. I said, "Mother, did you never pray for Jane? if she is alone and asleep, wake her up to-night and go and pray with her." Next Lord's-day there was a good woman in the vestry with her daughter; she said, "I have brought my daughter to our church;

HER NAME IS JANE, AND YOU SAID LAST NIGHT, SPEAKING OF JANE, 'Go home and wake her up.' I went home and woke her up, and spoke to her about her soul. I had not been speaking to her many minutes when she said, 'I have loved the Lord Jesus Christ this six months, and I should have told you, but I thought you did not want to speak to me about such a thing?'" Parents, you don't know what influence God has given you in your own home. If you find your child unconverted, begin to pray for that child from this very moment.

And now lastly, to you who have found him, I will set you at work. If you have found the Lord, go and tell him to others. As soon as you have found grace, your first business is to tell your brother and sister where Jesus is to be found. Let us try and carry this out, and I will close with this simple illustration.

IN THE DESERT OF ARABIA, WHEN A CARAVAN is threading its way across the sand, and they run short of water and are likely to perish miserably beneath the burning sun, they will sometimes select the quickest dromedary and put a man upon its back who will go in front seeking after water. The camel's instinct leads him onward. Another man is placed on a camel at a sufficient distance behind him to hear his voice so as to be within reach as soon as the first has found water. He stoops down and drinks to make quite sure it is not the mirage. When he has freely drunk he turns directly and says "Come!" The man on the camel behind says "Come!" and the one behind him cries "Come!" till they make the whole wilderness echo with the sound of "Come!" and they come and rush to the water, and they all drink.

NOW WE ARE ALL A CARAVAN HERE, travelling over the sands of life, and the blessed Spirit has found the water, and He says "Come!" Then the Bride, the Church of Christ, has found the water, and her daily cry by her ministers and servants is "Come!" and "Whosoever will, let him come and take the water of life freely." But the moment he has taken it, let him begin also to cry "Come!" and never cease crying "Come!" till he has made the deaf to hear, and God Almighty's power has made even the dead to start beneath the voice of his invitation. May you all come to Christ and live! Amen.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

CHRISTIAN HILLIARD stated his intention to sail in the Eglantine clearly, firmly, and resolutely although very respectfully, for he recollected that he was speaking to his father. True, his voyage was, he considered, necessitated by his father's incomprehensible obstinacy in not producing Mr. Grant's certificate, which would have settled the matter, though not in the way Christian thought it would; yet obstinate as Christian considered his father to be, he was still his father, and as such was entitled to his respect. Having said he should go, and said it in a way that could leave no doubt in his father's mind that he went on the faith of his father's assertion that the Eglantine was seaworthy, and that he went to prove his confidence in his father's honor, he turned round and without another word went upstairs to his own room.

Long after his son had retired, Mr. Hilliard sat in utter silence, his mind a chaos of conflicting feelings: rage, fear, doubt, indecision. One thing was certain—Christian would go in the Eglantine unless he took some instant step to prevent him. What could he do? Protest, argument, entreaty, would all go for nothing he knew full well, and it was too late for diplomacy or stratagem.

From his heart he cursed the "meddling sailor" who had stopped his son that dark night and told him the story of rotten planks and over-heavy cargo. For one moment the thought occurred to tell him the truth and bind him to silence, but it instantly sank in the knowledge of its utter futility.

To tell Christian the truth would be to unload the Eglantine, and probably break her into pieces, besides exposing himself as an unscrupulous. dishonorable master, worse than careless of the heavy responsibilty resting upon him.

His imagination pictured the universal hatred and execration that would follow him all the days of his life; all the contempt and abhorrence that would be his portion forever after; and regardless as he was of the opinion of others, he shrank with pitiable cowardice from the picture. Even had he the wish, he had not the moral courage to face the undisguised horror which a revelation of the truth would create; he dared not attempt to retrieve the past. Bitterly now he regretted not selling the Eglantine; breaking her up never once entered his mind, for his fears only, not his conscience, were touched.

He had been a shipowner for nearly forty years, and had never yet broken up one of his vessels. The rotten ones had been caught by the fierce cyclone and scattered over the mad waters, or had been dashed upon rough Norwegian rocks or far-off coral reefs, or had been sold to some equally unscrupulous but poorer shipowner, who had sent them out again, to take their chance, with their freight of human lives, on the mighty deep, amid the wild storms of wind and wave.

Plan after plan suggested itself, but only to be rejected as useless. The wild thought of bribing Grant to write a reassuring letter was dismissed, as he remembered the man's dangerous illness and absence from home. To hire another surveyor who would guarantee a favorable verdict (he knew where such men were to be found) would also be of no avail, as the ship was loaded, and the men knew no thorough examination could be effected.

Slowly passed the weary hours as the wretched man fought against the fatal truth: He must sacrifice either his son's life or his own good name. Look which way he would, there was no other alternative. If he quietly ordered the Eglantine to be unloaded and repaired or sold —supposing any one would dare to buy her under such notorious circumstances — what would that be but a tacit acknowledgment that he had been on the point of sending to sea a vessel which he knew to be unseaworthy? It meant loss of commercial reputation, loss of moral character, or rather of the semblance of it, loss of influence and social position, and, what he dreaded more than all, the loss of his son's respect.

He could not do it. Large drops of perspiration rolled from his forehead, and his cold damp hands wandered nervously among the papers on the table. His face grew haggard, and worn, and old in the agony of mental conflict, and even Christian would hardly have recognized his usually stern, self-possessed father.

He rose at last and went upstairs. At his son's door he paused and listened. Not a sound was to be heard, and, turning the handle softly, he stole quietly in. Drawing the curtain noiselessly aside, he let the cold gray light of early dawn fall on the bed. Christian lay asleep, his beautiful classic profile showing clear against the white pillow. There was a restful repose about the whole attitude that his father envied with a keen and bitter envy.

Never before had he so painfully realized the gulf between them; the impassable barrier separating his old age, of dark deeds upon which the light of uprightness had never shone, from this young life with its stainless honor and truth.

There rose before him the vision of past years. He saw the boy in his happy childhood, when his grave, innocent eyes had touched the fount of feeling and brought to his father's heart resolves for a better, truer future, a higher and nobler aim.

He saw him at school, standing prominent among three hundred boys; winning from them love and friendship, and from his masters respect and thorough regard. He remembered well his own pride in the boy's handsome patrician face and bearing; his exultation on hearing the murmur of admiration among the visitors to the school, as, in answer to his name, Christian Hilliard walked forward, time after time, amid the plaudits of his companions, to receive from the hands of some well-known statesman or noble lord the prizes which fell to his share. Then he thought of his college days, when his name had appeared high in the list of wranglers, and when still his character for chivalrous honor had won for him the knightly nickname, Sans peur et sans reproche.

He had always been proud of the boy, always loved him in a fashion of his own. He could scarcely believe that he might in a day or two look his last upon the one face his stern, hard nature had learned to love; touch for the last time the hand whose cordial grasp he had that night spurned in anger. If the struggle had been hot and fierce downstairs, it was hotter and fiercer as he stood by that silent, motionless form, with the peace of a conscience at rest on the quiet, dreaming face. Must his be the hand to seal the death-warrant? Must he be the one to voluntarily surrender to the pitiless waves this life so full of promise? What was the alternative? Disgrace and ignominy.

At that moment Mr. Hilliard stood at the crisis of his life. Would he turn and retrace his steps, braving the shame and the ignominy, or would he go on to the bitter end? Such moments come to every sinner at some time in his life, as if God were resolved that he should not go to his doom unwarned. The loss of property; the illness or death of some dearly loved relative; some crushing calamity falling at their right hand and only just missing them—all these things are trumpet-calls from the throne of grace, saying, "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?" They are the messages of mercy from a merciful God who "has no pleasure in the death of a sinner; but that he should turn from his wickedness and live" (Ezekiel 33 : 11). God does not coerce men; he does not drive them into his fold; and when the Holy Spirit strives with the sinner and he resists him, how fearful is the risk he incurs! These strivings are not prolonged indefinitely, and some day the last time comes, and then there is no hope left, nothing but "a fearful looking for of judgment."

Mr. Hilliard hesitated at this critical moment, and as he contemplated the results of repentance in his tarnished name and honor, he drew back and looked about him for a middle way. "Was the Eglantine doomed?" he said to himself. "Was her wreck a certainty? The thought brought a gleam of hope. She might weather the waves yet; worse than she had done it. He could remember vessels whose condition was a disgrace to their owners, yet which had braved many a wild storm and reached their haven in safety; then why not the Eglantine? His anxiety for Christian was making him weak and fearful in his old age. Eagerly he clung to the hope as a wrecked sailor from one of his own rotten ships might have clung to a floating spar. Surely the vessel might go safely to her destination, and if she sustained much damage on the voyage out Christian would not let her come back. Heavy loss to himself there would be, of course, but for once the sense of it would sink in the presence of his son's safety; he could put up with a heavy pecuniary loss better than with the loss of his only son or the forfeiture of the world's respect.

"So be it, then," he murmured to himself; "he must go and risk it." Slowly he turned and left the silent room. As he closed the door, it seemed as if he shut out all light and wrapped himself in the gloom of a dark and heavy shadow. He had made up his mind to let the Eglantine go, and what her fate would be he knew not.

The next morning Christian rode down to the docks. The sun was shining brightly, and the morning air was fresh, and pleasant, and inspiriting. There was little time to spare, and there were many things to be seen to before the Eglantine sailed. His cabin must be fitted up somewhat more in accordance with the luxurious style to which he was accustomed. His rooms were marvels of artistic taste. In his wanderings in foreign lands he had gathered together many an almost priceless bit of statuary and rare old carving. His walls were hung with gems of the old masters, and lovely little modern landscapes, and idyls, and poems on canvas.

And yet he was no Sybarite; his inherent love for the beautiful led him to surround himself with all that charms the eye and suggests to an artist or poet mind ideal loveliness and grace; but he could at will throw it all aside, and delight in the freedom of a Bohemian life; in the charm of a bivouac on the banks of the Amazon, or the wild excitement of a chase on the western prairie. He was no slave to an effeminate love of ease and indolence, though the dolce far niente had a certain attraction and charm.

In the matter of a voyage in his father's black-looking craft he resolved to make the best of the necessary evils, and render them as endurable as possible. Near his father's office he met Captain Thorpe.

"Well, Thorpe, how goes the world with you this morning?" he asked, reining in his horse. "I am coming to look at my quarters: I suppose you have some sort of a nook in which I can stow myself and my belongings."

"Then you really mean to come with us, Mr. Christian?" replied Thorpe in a slight tone of incredulity.

"I suppose you won't believe it till we have fairly started," said Christan, "and then you will expect me to hail the first homeward-bound vessel and come back."

Captain Thorpe laughed. "Not you, sir! you are not the sort to turn back, once you have really taken anything in hand. The men are all on the look-out this morning."

"What for? Me? I'll go and show myself, then. Are they all right?"

"Well," said the captain, dubiously, "some of them have been grumbling and growling this morning. The fact is, they think you will back out at the last moment. Lucas has put the idea into their heads that your going is all a ruse to quiet them; that you never intended to go. He and Cairns pretty nearly came to blows over it last night."

"I'll soon show them whether it's a ruse or not. How long before you come down?"

"I'll follow you at once. I'm just going to leave a message here for Mr. Hilliard." Christian rode on, and Thorpe went into the office. As he came out some one touched his elbow. It was a shabby, nervous-looking little man, who had been standing at the office door for the last twenty minutes.

"Do you want me?" asked the captain, in his blunt, straightforward manner.

"Is Mr. Christian Hilliard going to Quebec in the Eglantine?" said the man, with nervous, trembling eagerness.

Thorpe looked at him curiously: "What do you want to know for?"

"I beg your pardon, sir," was the humble reply. "Mr. Christian has been very good to me, and—and—" He stopped, evidently not knowing how to excuse his apparent curiosity.

"Then why didn't you ask him yourself? you must have seen him talking to me a few minutes ago."

"But he didn't see me, sir, and I didn't like to force myself upon his notice, because he—he always gives me something," stammered the man, confusedly.

"Well, you are something out of the common!" exclaimed the captain. "That would be most men's reason for doing the other thing. Yes, he's going in the Eglantine, sure enough: young men take strange whims into their heads nowadays."

"But he has some reason, he must have some reason!" said the man, with growing excitement.

Further Proceedings of
at Holy Trinity, New York.

REMARKS OF REV. DR. E. P. GOODWIN.

DR. E. P. GOODWIN, pastor of the First Congregational Church, Chicago, delivered an extempore address on the foundations of prophetic belief, and related some of his own experiences in coming to the convictions he now had in the matter. In the course of a long and eloquent address he said: It cannot but occur to me that in such a gathering as this there should be a good many in the attitude where I was a few years ago raising sincerely the question in their own minds with reference to the interpretation of the Word. If any such are here, troubled as I was troubled, let me say out of my experience one simple thing: In the olden time when these views first came before me they came as matters of theological opinion largely, matters of theory, and I, rather to my surprise, found when I became acquainted with the individuals holding them that they were matters implanted in their hearts, matters that had been born in the cause of convicion, faith that had been rooted into them by their prayerful and earnest studies of the Word of God; that theories were to them as nothing, opinions to them as nothing; the one grand question of all questions ruling them by day and by night, holding them steadfastly in their inquiries and in their beliefs, was supreme loyalty to the Word of the living God. On that plan of inquiry let me suggest to you that these brethren who are here, and they who hold like precious faith with us in my conviction and in theirs, do earnestly stand. I confess to you that for myself I have no care about whether men shall accept this theory or that theory, I have no anxiety or thought as to whether the feeling upon this question shall be a mighty feeling. I take it into my heart and into my life because, above all things else, I have been driven on my knees in spite of the most resolute and determined antagonisms bred of the head and bred of the blood not to accept; because it is to me the clear unmistakable truth of God; because it carries in it the vitals of Christianity, the hopes of the Church, the glory of God and of the ages. These are the reasons why I accepted the faith. I simply took their Scriptures, and went to the book and tested over and over again, for I was reluctant to yield a hair's breadth to any such view as a theory.

Two principles, therefore, have obtained, and the one was this: Supreme loyalty to the Word, cost what it may. And the other conviction born of it was this—the self-sufficiency of the Scriptures to explain themselves. It seemed to me that the Word was the Word of God; that the command to me was to search the Scriptures; that they were able by the help of the same spirit that wrote them to make me thoroughly furnished unto every good work, and I said, "Why shall I not expect, on a question that runs to the very heart of the Lord Jesus Christ, and grasps all the future of His Kingdoms—why shall I not ask Him sincerely, with humbleness of mind and willingness to accept and to use, that there may be shed in upon my mind the light of the truth as God knows it, as God desires it to be seen and to be wrought out in the hearts of His people, and in the development of His Church? Those have been my principles, and along the lines of inquiry suggested by those principles the truth has come, so far as I know it.

A paper was then read by DR. JAMES H. BROOKES, pastor of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, on

THE COMING OF THE LORD IN ITS RELATION TO CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

Christ's Second Coming a Prominent Doctrine in both Old and New Testaments—Passages connecting this with all Doctrines—A Golden Cord —I. It is an Illustration of Unity—II. It indicates the Divine Honor and Sovereignty.

AFTER replying to some strictures of Dr. David

Brown in his well-known book against Pre-Millennialsim, he said: In the Old Testament certainly more than one hundred verses announce the second coming of Christ, to every verse that proclaims His first coming; and while the second is often mentioned without any allusion to the first, the first is never revealed without ample reference to the second, as if the Holy Ghost wished to hasten over the humiliation and sufferings of the former, and rejoiced to dwell upon the glory and grandeur of the later.

It is impossible within a brief hour even to notice the important connections in which the second advent of our Lord is presented in the Old Testament, and only a glance can be given at its relation to the general teachings of the New Testament. But only a glance is needed to convince the attentive reader that no other truth whatever is so largely and so variously used to strengthen the faith and quicken the interest of God's dear children in all that He has been pleased to make known to them of doctrine and of duty. It may almost be said to form the basis of every argument, to give direction to every appeal, to fill out every exhortation, to terminate every warning; so that it is to other truth as a foundation to the building, as a feather to the arrow, as ripened fruit to the bud and blossom, as eternity to time.

Are ministers reminded that they must present something more than professions and brilliant achievements to commend them to the Master's favor? "Many will say to Me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name? And in Thy name have we not cast out devils? and in Thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from Me, ye that work iniquity." (Matt. 7 : 22, 23.)

Are the disciples, when they resume their special mission to Israel, cheered amid the trials to which they shall be exposed? "When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of Man be come." (Matt. 10 : 23.)

Are His servants put on their guard against the pleasing delusion of expecting the triumph of His cause during the interval of His absence in the heavens? "The tares grow with the wheat until the harvest, at the end of the age; the birds of the air, which He Himself explains as meaning the wicked one, lodge in the branches of the great tree; a woman conceals that which is incipient putrefaction in three measures of meal, until the whole is leavened: and not until the coming of Christ will the wicked be severed from the just." (Matt. 13.)

Is the gain of the whole world worse than worthless if purchased at the price of losing the soul? "The Son of Man shall come in the glory of His father, with His angels, and then He shall reward every man according to his works." (Matt. 16 : 27.)

Are the Apostles told of the dignity that awaits them? "Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." (Matt. 19 : 28.)

Is the moral condition of the world at His coming described? "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." (Matt. 24 : 37–39.)

Is a warning uttered against the error, now so common in the Church, of saying, "My Lord delayeth His coming," with its consequent worldliness? "The Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites." (Matt. 24 : 50, 51.)

Is the spiritual state of the Church at the second advent portrayed? "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. . . . While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." (Matt. 25 : 1–13.)

Is an account to be rendered of all the talents received by the followers of Christ? "After a long time, the lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them." (Matt. 25 : 19.)

Is judgment in store for the nations, as the result of their conduct toward those designated as the brethren of Christ? "When the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory: and before Him shall be gathered all nations." (Matt. 25 : 31–36.)

Does Jesus, before the high-priest, and in the face of death, assert His claim as the Christ, the Son of God? "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of Power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." (Matt. 26 : 64.)

Does He warn men of the danger of being ashamed of Himself and of His words, including, of course, His words about His second advent? "Whosoever, therefore, shall be ashamed of Me, and of My words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed when He cometh in the glory of His Father with the holy angels." (Mark 8 : 38.)

Does He urge the necessity of unwearying watchfulness? "Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is. For the Son of Man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly, he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all—Watch." (Mark 13 : 33, 37.)

Does He teach the universal prevalence of worldliness at His appearing? "As it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed." (Luke 17 : 28, 30.)

Does He predict universal apostasy as the consequence of the failure of the Church to watch for Him, according to His repeated commands? 'When the Son of Man cometh shall He find [the] faith on the earth." (Luke 18 : 8.)

Does He charge us to be occupied with Himself, and for Himself, till He come? "A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come." (Luke 19 : 12–27.)

Does He distinctly inform us of the events that shall follow, when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled? "There shall be signs in the sun and in the moon and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after these things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they all see the Son of Man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." (Luke 21 : 25–28.)

Does he cheer the hearts of His disciples, saddened by the announcement of His departure? "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." (John 14 : 2, 3.)

Does He give an intimation, as a powerful stiumlus to what is called missionary effort, when the age of conflict and cross-bearing, so dark without the light of his manifested presence, shall close? "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come." (Matt. 24 : 14.)

Meanwhile, were the disciples to be animated in the midst of their toil by an assurance that would gladden their hearts and nerve their energies? "While they looked steadfastly toward heaven, as He went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." (Acts 1 : 10, 11.)

Did the whole college of apostles announce the divine purpose with respect to the times of the Gentiles, and the order of His procedure in the conversion of the world? "God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for His name. [This is all He intends to do in the present dispensation.] And to this agree the words of the prophets, as it is written. After this I will return [that is, after He has taken out of the Gentiles a people for His name], and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up. [So He takes Israel again into national and covenant relation to Himself after His personal return; and then the grand and ultimate purpose is stated :] That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things." (Acts 15 : 14–17.)

Do we desire to reach the climax and crown of Christian attainments in grace and in knowledge? It is declared by the Holy Ghost to be "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ." (1 Cor. 1 : 4–8.)

Are we forbidden to judge one another, and commanded to be indifferent to the decision of man's day? "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come." (1 Cor. 4 : 5.)

Is it the privilege of believers to come to the Lord's table, and are all believers there at least the witnesses, consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly, to the truth of His second coming? "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." (1 Cor. 11 : 26.)

Is the resurrection of the body a cardinal article of their belief? "Every man in his own order; Christ the fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at His coming." (1 Cor. 15 : 23.)

Is the dark cloud of sorrow hanging over the grave that hides our precious dead tinged with the golden light of hope? "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." (1 Thess. 4 : 14.)

Have we the assurance of being with them again in a bright and happy day? "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." (1 Thess. 14 : 16–18.)

Were recently converted heathen taught by the inspired apostle, during his brief visit among them, what to expect? "Of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober." (1 Thess. 5 : 1–6.)

Is practical and entire holiness to be sought with unceasing diligence? "The very God of peace sanctify you wholly ; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." (1 Thess. 5 : 23.)

Is the note of warning again sounded against the error of expecting the triumph of good till he comes? "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils ; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron. . . . If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ." (1 Tim. 4 : 1–6.)

Is steadfast obedience enforced by the most solemn considerations? "I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and before Jesus Christ, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession ; that they keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ." (1 Tim. 6 : 13, 14.)

Are the characteristic features of the last days as unlike the common anticipation of the progress of truth and righteousness, as darkness is unlike light? "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, . . . lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God ; having a form of godliness, but denying the power. But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and thereof being deceived." (2 Tim. 3 : 1–5.)

Is there something left to cheer the heart of the faithful witness for Christ, even when the people will no longer "endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables? I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith : henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day ; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." (2 Tim. 4 : 7, 8.)

Are ministers told what to preach? "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. . . . These things speak." (Tit. 2 : 11 15.)

Has it pleased the Comforter to console His people in the midst of reproaches and afflictions and despised companionships and the spoiling of their goods? "Yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." (Heb. 10 : 37.)

Do we desire the reward which our returning Lord will delight to bestow upon His faithful servants? "Behold, I come quickly ; and my reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be." (Rev. 22 : 12.)

Above all, do we desire Himself? "Surely I come quickly : Amen." And surely He expects to hear from every heart that is true to Him the eager response, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." (Rev. 22 : 20.) With these sweet words of promise falling from His lips, His voice is heard no more on earth, and the Sacred Scriptures are sealed as complete.

Very many similar texts might be quoted, but enough has been said to show that this great truth runs like through the entire New Testament from beginning to end, touching every doctrine, binding every duty, arousing, consoling, directing, guarding, inspiring the believer at every step of his pilgrimage. As a motive, an incentive, and an end, it has a prominence assigned to no other thought. Wherever we turn it arrests the eye ; whatever the subject of inquiry, it engages the attention by its commanding presence. In the fine language of the Rev. John Ker, it is "in the New Testament the great event that towers above every other. The heaven, that gives back Christ, gives back all we have loved and lost, solves all doubts and ends all sorrows. His coming looks in upon the whole life of His Church as a lofty mountain peak looks in upon every little valley and sequestered home around its base, and belongs to them all alike. Every generation lies under the shadow of it, for whatever is transcendently great is constantly near, and in moments of high conviction it absorbs petty interests and annihilates intervals. It may surely be for us to consider whether our removal of Christ's coming further from us in feeling does not arise from a less vivid impression of its reality and surpassing moment."

It is one purpose of this conference, with His blessing, to change these "moments of high conviction" into the life-time posture of the soul ; and, as far as He may be pleased, to own our testimony for the good of other Christians, in the words of Professor Hackett, to "bring both their conduct and their style of religious instruction into nearer correspondence with the lives and teaching of the primitive examples of our faith."

Again he says, referring to the return of Christ at the end of the age, "that event was always near to the feelings and consciousness of the first believers. It was the great consummation on which the strongest desires of their souls were fixed, to which their thoughts and hopes were habitually turned. They lived in expectation of it ; they labored to be prepared for it ; they were constantly, in the expressive language of Peter, "looking for and hastening unto it."

The apostles, the first Christians in general, comprehended the grandeur of that occasion ; it filled their circle of view, stood forth to their contemplations as the point of culminating interest in their own and the world's history, threw into comparative insignificance the present time, death, all intermediate events, and made them feel that the manifestation of Christ, with its consequences of indescribable moment to all true believers, was the grand object which they were to keep in view as the end of their toils, the commencement and perfection of their glorious immortality. In such a state of intimate sympathy with an event so habitually present to their thoughts, they derived, they must have derived, their chief incentives to action from the prospect of that future glory ; they hold it up to the people of God to encourage them in affliction, to awaken them to fidelity, zeal, and perseverance, and appeal to it to warn the wicked and impress upon them the necessity of preparation for the revelations of that day."

That it was indeed "always near to the feelings and consciousness of the first believers" is admitted by all Post-Millennial writers ; that the Lord Jesus and the Holy Ghost presented it as an object of hope to those who lived in the days of the Apostles, must be also apparent to the careful reader of the New Testament ; and this is the fact that sets forth in the clearest and strongest light the relations of Christ's coming to Christian doctrine.

It is a profound remark of Trench, speaking of the tarrying of the bridegroom, that "we may number this among the many hints which were given by our Lord, that it was possible the time of His return might be delayed beyond the expectation of His first disciples. It was a hint, and no more ; if more had been given, if the Lord had said plainly that He would not come for many centuries, then the first ages of the Church would have been placed in a disadvantageous position, being deprived of that powerful motive to holiness and diligence supplied to each generation of the faithful by the possibility of the Lord's return in their time.

"It is not that He desires each succeeding generation to believe that He will certainly return in their time, for He does not desire our faith and our practice to be founded on an error, as, in that case, the faith and practice of all generations except the last would be. But it is a necessary element of the doctrine concerning the second coming of Christ that it should be possible at any time that no generation should consider it impossible in theirs."

First, then, it illustrates and manifests with a distinctness to which the Post-Millennial theory can lay no claim. It is not our province to make this unity, but we are responsible to keep and to exhibit it amid the distractions and divisions of the world. But of what does the Church on earth consist? Not simply of the number in any one generation who have been linked by the Holy Ghost to the risen Christ, but of the entire number of believers between the ascension and return of our Lord ; "for as the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body ; so also is [He] Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free ; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit." (1 Cor. 12 : 12, 13.)

Christ is exalted to be "the Head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all" (Eph. 1 : 22, 23) ; and if His second coming is the hope of one member of that body, it is the hope of all the members. It did not please God to reveal the time of His coming, because He would set it as a beautiful bow in the dark cloud, overshadowing the entire interval of His Son's absence from the earth, that from one end to the other of the dispensation all faces might be turned up in faith and expectation. Hence our Saviour could bid His immediate followers watch for Him, and Paul could say, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together" with the risen dead, and all of the Apostles could represent the advent as nigh ; for its nearness to one believer is the measure of its nearness to the entire body, viewed in its unity. Moreover, the conviction of its nearness necessarily sinks out of sight the minor differences that separate Christians, and as Saul of Tarsus, dazzled by the brightness that flashed upon him on the road to Damascus, declares, "I could not see for the glory of that light," so we can not see the motes in the eyes of our brethren, while gazing upon the splendor of that approaching advent. The assembly now convened furnishes striking evidence of its power to bring believers together on a common ground, to be as a common testimony to the blessedness of a common hope.

Second—The Pre-Millennial coming of our Lord alone indicates the divine honor and sovereignty. Those who reject the doctrine constantly affirm that it disparages the Gospel by representing it as a failure, and the work of the Holy Spirit by intimating that it is inadequate to the conversion of the world. But a moment's reflection is sufficient to show that it exalts the Gospel by proving that it accomplishes all it was designed to effect, and the work of the Holy Spirit by demonstrating that He saves all He intended to save during the present dispensation. It has already been seen, as announced by the Apostles, that God's purpose is not to convert all the Gentiles before the return of Christ, but to take out of them a people for His name ; and if one verse of Scripture from the first of Genesis to the last of Revelation can be found to assert the conversion of the world previous to that return, pre-millennialists will agree to hold their peace forever after.

On the other hand, the post-millennial heresy disparages the Gospel and the work of the Spirit by forcing the conclusion that they are unable to reach the end they were ordained to attain. If it was God's purpose to bring in the millennium by agencies now employed, the most careless observer can see that it has been signally defeated for more than eighteen hundred years, and, judging the future by the past, the only way of judging a past from prophetic testimony.

There is little prospect of achieving greater success in the time to come.

Where are the churches planted by apostolic hands and watered with the blood of martyrs? They have long since perished. Where are the countries over which the disciples of Jesus, in the first and second centuries, swept as an army with banners? Under the black pall of spiritual death. Where is the city or town or village in the most highly favored position of Christendom, all of whose inhabitants even profess to believe in the Son of God? According to Professor Hitchcock's statistics in his Analysis of the Holy Bible, of the earth's population there are 195,000,000 Roman Catholics, 160,000,000 Mohammedans, 340,000,000 Buddhists, 460,000,000 pagans and other heathen religionists, and 97,139,000 Protestants in name. Of these last, so few comparatively, what a "little flock" follow the Good Shepherd; what an overwhelming majority remain utterly indifferent to His voice, or fiercely oppose His claims!

FINANCIAL TROUBLE IN SCOTLAND.

THE Glasgow Bank sufferers have already had nearly $1,250,000 raised for their relief. The Times says, "Numerous stories of terrible distress, many of them harrowing in their details, are current. The startling feature is not merely the extent of the diaster, but the fact that it will ruin hundreds of rich men who, in the case of a less tremendous failure, might have weathered the storm. Such men are peculiarly entitled to sympathy, and not less so are their wives and families."

A well-known Edinburgh solicitor, who is heavily involved in consequence of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, has absconded, and it is understood that a warrant has been issued for his apprehension for misapplying money which he was intrusted with by clients to invest. A Glasgow banker estimates the ultimate call on the solvent shareholders to be at least $25,000 per $500 share, if the debts are to be paid in full. The common belief in Glasgow is that, if they ever are, every single shareholder will be ruined.

Great consternation has been caused through the country by another bank suspension, that of the Caledonian Bank, which was announced on Thursday, December 5th. The Caledonian held four shares in the City of Glasgow Bank, and when this fact became known the public confidence in the former institution rapidly declined. Its shares fell in price from $50 to $7.50, at which sum they stood when the bank closed its doors. This bank was extensively trusted by the most aristocratic portion of Scottish society, and its failure will bring sorrow and distress into many an ancient castle and manse.

An unprecedented number of failures have taken place in Scotland, forty leading firms and upwards of a hundred smaller ones having collapsed, nearly all directly or indirectly owing to the failure of the bank. The total liabilities of these firms may be estimated at one hundred and twenty-five millions, while the depreciation in the stock of other banks arising from the bank failure is equal to a loss to the shareholders of other banks of upwards of twenty-five millions.

A melancholy case of suicide arising from depressed circumstances through the bank failure has taken place near Inverness. Mrs. Ross, widow of a draper in Dingwall, who had her whole dependence in the City of Glasgow Bank, in the form of a deposit receipt, has been found suspended from a tree in Lentran Wood, with her child, twenty months old, also strangled beside her. An analysis of the 1300 shareholders of the bank shows that about one fourth are ladies, 174 trustees and executors mostly representing ladies and children, 67 clergymen, and 61 members of various professions. Many ladies had already gone to situations, some as telegraph clerks, others as governesses.

THE SAVIOUR'S LAST WORDS.

S. S. Lesson for December 22d.—Luke 24:44-53.
Golden Text, Matthew 28:20.

OUR attention is again called, by the lesson, to the Sunday succeeding our Lord's death, the Sunday that witnessed His glorious resurrection. The two wayfarers to whom He had appeared on their way to Emmaus found, on reaching Jerusalem, the eleven disciples assembled, and with them a number of those who loved the Lord Jesus, and who, though they were not apostles, had been witnesses of that wondrous life and death. Scattered on that dreadful Thursday night when they all forsook Him and fled, they sought each other on the Sunday, for the thoughts that filled their hearts must have made any other society utterly uncongenial to them.

Gathered together thus, they received the startling intelligence of the women; then Peter had returned, declaring that he had seen the Lord; and now to them enter the travellers from Emmaus, with their wonderful account of the converse Jesus had held with them.

It is impossible to realize what their emotions must have been. Their trembling spirits, oppressed with their recent bereavement, would be slow to credit intelligence so extraordinary yet so welcome. The feeling we express in the words "too good to be true" must have been something like their feeling at that moment. We can understand how question would follow question from those who had not seen the Lord to those who had been thus privileged. And then, while they were yet speaking, Jesus Himself appears in their midst, with the blessing on His lips He, as the Prince of peace, had the power to bestow, "Peace be with you."

Where now are the joy and gladness we should expect them to manifest? Instead, they display terror and dismay, superstitious fears take possession of them, and they think that they behold a spirit. So incredulous were these men that even the evidence of their own senses fails to convince them that the prediction they had heard from the Lord's own lips had been fulfilled, and that He had burst the bonds of the grave. They had distrusted the testimony of Mary and the women; of Peter and the two who had talked with Him as they walked. Now Jesus Himself stands before them, and they are still in doubt. It seemed as if they foresaw the ages of doubt that were coming on the earth, and by their very incredulity were providing irrefutable evidence for this cardinal truth of the Christian belief, the truth of a risen, glorified Saviour.

With gentle kindness, with patient condescension, Jesus appeals to them, "Why are ye troubled? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself," quietly implying that there was no need for alarm where their Master was. And then, as if to add proof to proof, he calls for food and eats before them.

But Jesus has another object in appearing to them besides that of convincing them of the fact of His resurrection; He has to say to them His last words, words of reminder, of enlightenment, of instruction, and of encouragement. He sees the trials that are coming on them; His eagle gaze penetrates the thick veil of the future, and there revealed to Him are their cruel persecutions and the crown of martyrdom that awaited many of them; and He would not leave them comfortless.

These last words are the subject of our lesson; and when we consider the circumstances under which they were spoken, whose words they were, and to whom they were spoken, it is impossible to overestimate their importance. They were not the only words Jesus addressed to His little flock during the forty days that elapsed between His resurrection and ascension; we read in the other parts of the New Testament of six other appearances of Jesus during that period not recounted by Luke, and in the passage before us occurs a break, somewhere between the 44th and the 50th verses, of several days. Luke, according to the custom he adopted in other parts of his gospel, summarizes, as it were, the events of several occasions into one connected narrative; and thus it would appear from thi gospel that the day which had witnessed the resurrection of Jesus was also the day of His ascension, yet we know from the other accounts that for forty days Jesus went in and out among His followers, completing their preparation for the arduous mission before them.

The last words of Jesus comprise:

I. A legacy—"Peace be unto you." Could He have given a more precious gift? The human heart, unregenerate, aches for peace. It is the one cardinal want of our souls. A mind ill at ease with itself is in perpetual turmoil, it knows no rest, it is never satisfied. A succession of desires and wants rises before the vision, and each one when it is attained leaves the possessor as far from content as he was before. "There is no peace for the wicked." Had Jesus left His followers riches, they must have been conscious that the time was near at hand when they must depart and leave all behind. But He left them the one thing that above all others was essential to their happiness, "the peace of God which passeth all understanding." Peace on earth was the announcement that heralded His advent, and peace was the precious legacy He left behind Him as he ascended into Heaven.

II. Comfort—"Why are ye troubled?" He would not have His people bear a burden alone. He asks our confidence, and none have ever confided in Him without obtaining relief. Sometimes the trouble is removed, sometimes He helps the sinking soul to bear the heavy burden, but invariably, in one form or the other, relief always follows confidence in Him. Therefore let no one bear his burden alone. However small or trivial, it is not too small to carry to Him. See how patiently He listened to the questions of His disciples and of those who, like Nicodemus, came to Him on earth. With the same gentle patience He listens now, and is as ready to help the sufferer. Our heavy troubles we often carry to Him in prayer, while the little ones that wear and worry and irritate our spirits, chaining them down to earth when they should be on the higher ground of communion, we try to bear ourselves, and we suffer by our folly.

> "With boldness, therefore, at the throne
> Let us make all our sorrows known,
> And ask the aid of heavenly Power
> To help us in the evil hour."

III. Enlightenment—"Then opened He their understandings." He showed His people how all things were moving in God's own way. "All things must be fulfilled." There was no need for disappointment, or distress, or anxiety. All things were in God's hand and were moving in their preordained channel. They might apprehend danger, but when He opened their understandings as God opened the eyes of the prophet's servant (2 Kings 6:17) they saw their doubts and fears were groundless. They saw, too, that Jesus was the central figure of the Bible. Round Him clustered as round a focus the words of historians, poets, and prophets, for they had all written "things concerning Him." Even this last dark page of His history was the fulfilment of their predictions, and was part of the great plan. For "it behoved Christ to suffer, that repentance and remission of sins might be preached" to the sin-stained race of man.

IV. A promise—"Behold, I send the promise of my Father." They were to tarry for the fulfilment of this promise, but they had not long to wait. The day of Pentecost saw the descent of the Holy Ghost, and proved to the little flock that their Master had been received into the Heaven of heavens, where He remains unto the day of the restitution of all things; that "He had ascended to His Father and their Father, to His God and their God." Then they knew of a surety that He still lived and had found His place at the right hand of God, there to plead and mediate for evermore, until, in the fulness of the times, He shall return to take to Himself His great power and reign.

Then they returned to Jerusalem praising and blessing God, their sorrow turned into exceeding joy.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Condition of the Emperor of Russia is said to cause serious uneasiness. Though his bodily health is good, he dreads going outside his palace, lest the assassin's bullet should lay him low. This has long been one of his brooding fears, and during his visit to London he lived in constant dread of the Pole's revenge. It is not now the avenging Pole, but the Nihilist, who is his terror, and the recent attempts on the life of his uncle, the German Emperor, and on King Alfonso of Spain have brought on a renewal of this monomania. There is too much fear that his terror is well founded. Nihilism is spreading with incredible rapidity. It is becoming a religion, and the more severe the repression the more eager are new fanatics to court martyrdom. The Bismarckian stamping-out is having the same effect on German Socialism. If things remain as they are, Europe may expect some morning to hear of the eruption of a terrible volcano.

Russian Soldiers and the Bible.—Rev. J. A. Tonjoroff, who recently arrived safely at Constantinople, writes: "I have been for two weeks in the interior, and have seen fearful suffering and distress among the Christian populations and also among the Turks. The Bosnian Government here is helping the distribution of the Bible. Our booksellers are distributing the Word of God most freely. I preached my first sermon in Bulgaria last week to more than fifty joyful hearers. How the Russian soldiers look upon the Bible the following fact will show. The Protestants that escaped to Sistova for their lives from the Turks, and were saved with the Russians, wished to show their gratitude to their protectors, the Russian soldiers. One day they opened a little shop in the street, bought some tea and some New Testaments to distribute among the soldiers. They distributed some hundreds of them, and the soldiers were most delighted. After they were finished, some more soliders came and asked for this precious book. But when they were told that not one was left some of them burst in tears, saying, 'How shall we go back now to our friends in Russia without this precious token and recognition of our help to you?' The scene was very touching. I have seen our bookseller often surrounded with longing soldiers in the streets of Philippopolis. We had five at our meeting. We hear of much bloodshed in Macedonia, and some of our friends have escaped here for their lives."

The Grapes and the Church Choir.—The Rev. C. Marshall, rector of Harpurhey, England, writes: "The wise man said, 'Stolen waters are sweet.' Eve evidently thought that stolen fruit was sweet. Some of her children have thought the same. In a country church the other day (as the vicar's wife herself related to me) great preparations were made, after the manner of Jewish traditional worship, for a harvest festival to be held on Thursday and Sunday, October 10th and 13th. The church, being a country church, potatoes, carrots, turnips, cabbages, celery, apples, pears, wheat, etc., could be had in abundance for decorating the edifice. But the grapes were the difficulty. However, the vicar's wife went by train a journey of miles to beg the coveted grapes to give the grand fashionable finish to the festival show. They were obtained, and duly took their prominent position on the opening day, Thursday, October 10th. Of course the vicar's wife considered that she had an especial right in the grapes, and that after they had done their part to gratify the eye in church they were to gratify another of the five senses at the vicarage table. Alas for human calculations! The church had to be opened on Friday for the practice of the choir, and when the church was inspected on Saturday to ascertain that all was right for Sunday's harvest festival, the grapes were gone! From a consecrated church consecrated grapes abstracted by a consecrated choir. Perhaps they thought that they had as much right to the grapes as the priests of old to the shewbred in the temple."

Opium-selling Licensed in China.—A momentous announcement is made from Canton that the monopoly of preparing and selling opium in the province of Kwang Chowfu has been farmed to a contractor for three years, for $140,000 a year. The Hong Kong Daily Express comments as follows on this unprecedented measure: "This action of the Kwangtung authorities cannot be regarded as otherwise than a formal recognition of opium-smoking, and it is a significant fact of which the Anglo-Oriental Society for the suppression of the opium traffic and its friends will do well to take note. The Chinese Government have hitherto strenuously prohibited the use of opium in China, but as they have been unable to prevent its importation and use, they have come to look upon onium-smoking as a necessary evil, and no longer attempt to suppress the habit." It is certain that the present state of things would never have come about had not the Anglo-Indian Government cultivated the taste for opium in China by annually exporting seven million pounds sterling of it in value in order to gain a revenue from the pernicious drug. Tens of thousands of Chinese are killed by it every year.

Baptism of Two Jews.—On Sunday evening, November 3d, a large congregation gathered in the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park, London, to witness the baptism of two Jewish converts. Many Jews were present, having been invited by advertisement and placard to hear the Rev J. Wilkinson preach on the Messiahship of Jesus from Isaiah 9:6, 7. After the sermon, special prayer was offered for the two converts, and after they had very clearly answered some questions regarding their faith in Christ, Mr Wilkinson proceeded to baptize them, and several Christian friends gave them the right hand of fellowship. The congregation then sang "Ring the Bells of Heaven." The two converts, with nine other Christian Israelites and a few Christian friends, then took the "Supper of the Lord" in the house of the Rev. J. Wilkinson.

John Wesley and Beau Nash.—Once, when Wesley was preaching in the open air at Bath, in England, "the king of Bath," as he was called—Beau Nash—attempted to put down the great preacher. Nash's character was bad; it was that of an idle, heartless, licentious dangler on the skirts of high society. He appeared in the crowd, and authoritatively asked Wesley by what right he dared to stand there. The congregation was not wholly of the poor; there were a number of fashionable and noble persons present, and among them many with whom this attack had been prearranged, and who expected to see the discomfiture of the Methodist by the courtly and fashionable old dandy.

Wesley replied to the question simply and quietly that he stood there by the authority of Jesus Christ, conveyed to him "by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, when he laid hands on me and said, 'Take thou authority to preach the Gospel.'" Nash began to bustle and to be turbulent, and he exclaimed, "This is contrary to Act of Parliament; this is a conventicle!" "Sir," said Wesley, "the Act you refer to applies to seditious meetings. Here is no sedition, no shadow of sedition; the meeting is not, therefore, contrary to the Act." Nash stormed. "I say it is; besides, your preaching frightens people out of their wits."

"Sir," said Wesley, "give me leave to ask, did you ever hear me preach?"—"No."—"How, then, can you judge of what you have never heard?"—"Sir, by common report."—"Common report is not enough," said Wesley; "again, give me leave to ask is your name not Nash?"—"My name is Nash." And then the reader must imagine Wesley's thin, clear, piercing voice, cutting through the crowd: "Sir, I dare not judge of you by common report."

There does not seem much in it, but the effect was overwhelming. Nash tried to bully it out a little; but, to make his discomfiture complete, the people took up the case, and especially one old woman, whose daughter had come to grief through the fop, in her way so set forth his sins that the fopling was glad to retreat in dismay.

The Abolition of Itinerancy in the pastoral system is a question now agitating the Methodist Church, and is attracting very grave attention throughout the entire body. Methodist clergymen, at their weekly gatherings, freely discuss the merits and demerits of the system, and as a rule (in the well-settled districts) agree that the latter outweigh the former. Laymen, in their official as well as private capacity, are constant and importunate in expression of opinions against the continuance of the triennial pastorate.

When Methodism first entered the religious field in this country, the itinerancy was its great tower of strength; through it ministers could at once be sent to the most available as well as most needed points, and thus new fields were constantly entered upon and secured to the Church. But now times have changed; Methodism has spread all over the land, and is an assured fact; her policy is no longer aggressive, but defensive, hence the great-felt need of a settled pastorate of such duration as efficiency and acceptability shall determine.

The Methodist makes the statement that one thousand families have been found in Brooklyn nearly all of whom left the Methodist Church owing to the "changeableness and uncertainty of the pastorate." The partial if not entire demolition of the itinerancy seems to be one of those coming events that cast their shadows before.

Prayer Answered in a Lump.—The Rev. Dr. Kidd, of Aberdeen, had a hearer—a good and converted man as everybody but himself judged—though troubled with doubt as to his own salvation. The doctor said to him one day, "Well, Thomas, how long have you been praying?" "For forty years." "And what have you got?" "I canna say I ha'e gotten onything." "I wonder you are not tired, then, and don't give up that kind of hopeless work." "Nay, sir, we mauna dee that." Well, when Thomas lay dying—was very near his end—Dr. Kidd called, and asked, as he always did when he was going to pray, "What shall I pray for?" "Give thanks," said Thomas, "give thanks, for my forty years' prayer is answered in a lump."

A Little Bird's Sermon.—The Rev. Mr. Nosworthy, who died in 1677, had, from the persecuting spirit of his times, been imprisoned ir Winchester, where he met with much crue usage. After his release he was several time reduced to great straits. Once, when he an his family had breakfasted, and had nothing lef for another meal, his wife, lamenting her condition, exclaimed, "What shall I do with my poo children?" He persuaded her to walk abroa with him, and seeing a little bird chirping merrily, he said, "Take notice how that little bir sits and chirps, though we can not tell whethe it has been at breakfast; and if it has it know not whither to go for a dinner. Therefore b of good cheer, and do not mistrust the prov dence of God; for are we not better than man sparrows?" Before dinner they had plenty provisions brought them. Thus was the pron ise fulfilled, "They who trust in the Lord sha not want any good thing."

An Old General Officer, a veteran in the se vice both of his Queen and of the King of King when he was dying (early in 1878) seemed almo too languid and exhausted to reply to his son tender inquiry, "Is there any thing you wis dearest father?" save in the feebly-whispere words, "Only to die." But suddenly this o man, in the last moments of mortal weaknes sprang to his feet from his bed, and clasping h hands, whilst a transport of joy illumined his fac exclaimed, "I HAVE SEEN HIM!" and the ne moment went away with his Lord, to "look Hi in the face with joy—for ever." A glimpse "the King in His beauty and of the land that very far off" was vouchsafed to the aged gener even before his immortal spirit had quitted tabernacle of clay—reminding us of Stepher dying utterance, "Behold I see the heave opened and the Son of man standing at the rig hand of God."

DR. TAIT, The Archbishop of Canterbury.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

His Birth in 1811, and Early Life at Glasgow and Oxford—His Opposition to the Puseyite Movement—Becomes Head-Master of Rugby School in 1842—and Dean of Carlisle in 1849—and Bishop of London in 1856—His Charge to the Clergy—His Strong Advocacy of Open-air Preaching, and Visiting the Poor, and Mission Clergy, and Mission Services—Becomes Archbishop of Canterbury in 1868—Bereavements.

DR. ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL TAIT, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of all England, was born in the year 1811, in Edinburgh. His grandfather had been a Lord of Session, and his father both lawyer and country gentleman. He was educated at a famous school and a famous university in Scotland—the Edinburgh Academy and the University of Glasgow.

A number of young men annually proceed from the Scottish to the English universities. There is especially a close connection between Baliol College, Oxford, and Glasgow University. The Glasgow professors have in their gift ten wealthy exhibitions to Oxford the annual product of capitalized sums of money, and which constitute a prize, called an Exhibition, giving the winner an income and the means wherewith to pay his expenses at the university during his academial course. Each Exhibition is sufficient for a fair academical subsistence, and is tenable for an unusual number of years. These Exhibitions have been the means of recruiting Oxford with some of its best scholars, and of introducing into public life many able and some celebrated men.

The Glasgow career of Mr. Tait was of a very unusual kind, remarkable for its great industry, and the great success with which that industry was rewarded. His Oxford course was equally remarkable. He became scholar of Baliol, a first-class man, and in due course Fellow of Baliol, college tutor, and public examiner. He, also for some time, became a member of a third university—that of Bonn, on the Rhine. He has since protested against the notion that all German theology is necessarily tainted with rationalism. 'It is of much importance," he has written, "that English readers, if they do not know it already, should learn that Germany has to boast of writers in almost every department of theology who unite the deepest learning with a sound and earnest Christian faith."

Mr. Tait was one of the most prominent members of that famous institution, the Oxford Union Society, where, in common with many illustrious statesmen, he gained a clear, accurate, forcible debating style, which has never since deserted him on the platform and in Parliament. In due course he took holy orders, and the curacy of Baldon, near Oxford. On the death of Sir Daniel Sandford, the learned and most eloquent professor of Greek at Glasgow, Mr. Tait, who had been one of his favorite pupils, became a candidate for the chair. There was, however, a legal difficulty in a clergyman of the Church of England holding a professorship in a Scotch university; and in this way Glasgow lost and London obtained the services of Dr. Tait, who was to employ himself in a different and a higher way.

For some time in Dr. Tait's career his course as a scholar and his course as a working clergyman ran parallel, until, finally, the first was absorbed in the graver responsibilities and multiplied duties of the latter. His first public work was as tutor to his college, and it is well known how the Baliol tutors have placed their ancient and renowned college in the van of all the other colleges of Oxford. Seeking the general good of the university as well as that of his own college, and anxious that all the appliances of Oxford should be turn to the best account, in conjunction with the present Dean Stanley of Westminster he published a pamphlet on the "Revival of the Professorial System." When the famous "Tracts for the Times" threw all Oxford, and then the whole country, into commotion, and excited the deep-grounded apprehension that many were abandoning the good old paths, and retracing their steps towards the bondage of Rome, Mr. Tait came prominently into the conflict. He was one of the "four Oxford tutors" who drew the attention of the university to Tract No. 90, and procured the condemnation of its doctrines. The author of that tract was John Henry Newman, who, by his own perversion to Rome and the perversion of many, unhappily justified the apprehensions of those who firmly adhered to the integrity of the Reformed Church.

In the midsummer of 1842, Dr. Arnold, the head-master of Rugby School, suddenly died. It was necessary that a new head-master should be chosen by the time that the school should reassemble. This important appointment was obtained by Mr. Tait in the same way that Dr. Arnold had previously obtained it—simply by the excellence of his testimonials.

The great reputation to which Rugby had attained under Dr. Arnold was maintained and confirmed by his successor. He continued to be head-master until 1849—a period of seven years. In 1846 he published some theological writings, which have since been reprinted with additions, under the title of "Dangers and Safeguards." In 1850 he was one of the commissioners for inquiring into the state of the University of Oxford. The commission worked hard for two years, and very extensive legislation was founded on their reports.

In the year 1849 he suffered a severe illness, and resigned his appointment. In the same year he was appointed by Lord John Russell, who was then premier, to the deanery of Carlisle. The parting from Rugby took place with many manifestations of affection and honor. Dr. Tait took his leave of the school by publishing a volume of the sermons which he had preached in the chapel, entitled "Lessons for School Life." "The chief reason for my publishing the sermons is that I may leave some memorial of my teaching to those for whose training, during so long a time, I know that I must be called to account. Almost all I have to leave to them has been better said before, and will, I have every reason to hope, continue to be urged upon them, Sunday after Sunday, for many years to come; but still, perhaps, after our separation, the words of an absent friend may not be useless. . . . For all connected with the school I can scarcely have a better prayer than that they may be enabled to love Christ, and truth, and goodness with the simplicity of Dr. Arnold."

Dr. Tait has elsewhere said: "As it is sometimes imlplied that Dr. Arnold favored a view of the unimportance of correct belief, I think it right to record my conviction that, had that great man been now living, he would have been in many ways admirably suited to destroy this most mistaken system. . . . His whole soul would have revolted from a Christianity which was to furnish no positive Christian truth."

Whatever a deanery may be to some deans, it was certainly no sinecure to Dr. Archibald Tait. Dr. Close, the present Dean, has declared that he found it hard work to keep pace with all that his predecessor had been doing in the place. A dean's chief ostensible duty lies with the fabric of his cathedral. There was here much to be done. He did a great work of restoration for that venerable pile, which, although it will not bear a comparison with some other cathedrals, possesses many beauties of detail, especially in the choir. He was also active in labors for the spiritual good of the people of Carlisle.

In 1856 a bill was passed which enabled Dr. Blomfield, Bishop of London, and Dr. Maltby, Bishop of Durham, to retire upon pensions. Dean Tait of Carlisle was promoted to the See of London. This was the first time in the history of the diocese that a bishop, consecrated to the metropolitan See, was not previously a bishop.

The position of Bishop of London is considered so dignified and the duties involved so important, that it is customary to offer the appointment to a bishop of some other see, and the offer is always considered as a promotion. The annual income of the Bishop of London is $50,000—the largest stipend paid to any bishop on the English bench. These are two English archbishoprics, one of York with the same stipend of $50,000, and the other of Canterbury with $75,000. When either of these falls vacant the appointment is usually offered to the then Bishop of London.

The great employments which Dr. Tait had so successfully filled naturally prepared the way for this elevation, while grievous family calamities, in the loss of various children by malignant fever, had obtained for him the sympathies of the Queen and country, and made his appointment peculiarly acceptable.

In 1858 the bishop delivered his primary charge. It attracted very great attention at the time, and passed through various editions. It occupied five hours during the delivery, and the scene in the cathedral was a memorable one. The bishop earnestly argued against any exaggerations in ceremonials, and against the danger of not possessing large-hearted and comprehensive love. The rest of the charge was chiefly engaged with the practical work of the diocese. In the charge of 1861 he chiefly spoke of the difficulties of the time under three classes: (1) The difficulties connected with the unrestrained spirit of free inquiry; (2) The difficulties of the Church of England in connection with other religious bodies; (3) difficulties from the ever-growing population. He dwelt much on the importance of and the bishop has himself repeatedly preached in the open air. Thus we find him preaching to weavers at Bethnal Green, and to drivers of cabs and omnibuses at Islington. In his episcopate the two great London cathedrals were thrown open for evening services on Sunday. In the charge of 1862 the bishop spoke on a subject than which none can be more important—the duty of the rich in visiting the poor. In a crowded metropolis like our own, where the differences between the classes of the rich and the poor are drawn with such sharp antagonism, obedience to the Divine injunction to visit the poor blesses both the giver and the recipient of the kindness and goes far to ameliorate the evils of our complex civilization. But to show the spirit by which he is influenced, we select a passage from the primary charge, in which he dwells ver forcibly on the subject of home missions:

"I could not but remember how, when a curate in a small village in Oxfordshire, I had marvelled at the excitement raised in a quiet an dull place by the gathering of the Methodists o a fine summer's day on the common, under th shadow of the old trees; how the voice of the preacher, sounding through the stillness of listening crowd, and the burst of their hymn pealing far and wide through the village, ha seemed well suited to attract and rouse th hearts of many who never entered within th church to join in its measured devotion, and li ten to its calm teaching. . . . I knew th hearts had been yearning to have this truth pr claimed for many years; that it had been pr claimed; that the day when there was gre fear of the Church of England dying of her di nity was, thank God, past; and that in almo all our great towns the parochial clergy, wi the full concurrence of their bishops, had n for several years been trying on the summ evenings to add such missionary labors to th settled work. But it was obvious that, if t work was to be done thoroughly, we must ha new machinery, and men must be led to lo upon the work as one to which to direct th chief efforts. The ordinary parochial minis was already tasked up to his strength, and th must be missionary services to supplement efforts. Missionary clergy were wanted for overwhelming population of this diocese. in the distant valleys and hill-sides of other ceses, where rough men are drawn togethe hundreds, to have their dwelling-place at mouth of some mine, while it is being work —or, more fleeting still, an army of railwa rers passes along a line of railway in the course its formation, making their encampment now this parish, now in that,—and the parochial rgy in both cases will, to meet the wants of is sudden influx of sojourners, rejoice if they n be aided by men sent to do a missionary's rk in the temporary encampment ; so in our ndon parishes, in Whitechapel, in Spitalfields, Deptford,—indeed everywhere, there is simi- work to be done. Part of the population is ry fluctuating, and that which is stationary nnot wait till churches are built and parishes rmed. Let missionary efforts be directed to is work at once, and churches, and parishes, d all their due appliances for regular worship d instruction will follow in God's good time."

On the death of Bishop Blomfield, Dr. Tait me into possession of Fulham Palace, which d been settled on that prelate for his life. In 60, when confined to a sick room by illness, ought on by over-exertion, the bishop issued address to the laity, on the subject of provid- g additional church accommodation, especially r the poor. This led the way for the Bishop London's Fund. This was a noble scheme for oning for the neglect of ages by creating a re- gious organization fit to cope with the enor- ous wants of modern London. The plan was to ise a million of money in ten years. In the st year more than the first hundred thousand ounds was raised ; but unless incessant exer- ons are made, succeeding years will hardly ep pace with this.

"Every effort must be made," said the bishop one occasion to his clergy, "and nothing ore is wanting for the work than that they ould be earnest in prayer to God that He would ess it. Let every man resolve to give himself prayer, and in the spirit of prayer to devote mself to this great work ; and it is wonderful w much difference of opinion disappears when eir hearts were fixed upon the service of the ue God."

In 1868, on the death of Dr. Longley, Dr. ait was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. e frequently speaks in the House of Lords, but enerally only on ecclesiastical questions, and is admirable debating qualities always secure im an attentive audience. He is an effective reacher, earnest rather than eloquent, and eems to use or omit to use his manuscript at leasure. Some of his sermons, especially those reached at the special services, are exceedingly fective. As an administrator he has very much ork to do also, which he does effectively and ell, and he ably fills his responsible position s the highest ecclesiastical dignitary in the hurch of England. Dr. Tait married in 1843 daughter of Archdeacon Spooner, and a family f seven children have been the issue of the mar- age. Of these five daughters died within a few ays of each other, of scarlet-fever, while Dr. ait was at Rugby. In May last his beloved and ly son, who was rector of a large church in ondon, died ; and on Monday the 2d instant Dr. Tait was bereaved of his wife, whom he early loved. Though so successful in his min- stry and so honored in the church, few men have uffered domestic afflictions more severe.

A GOOD TEST.

THE question is often asked, what amusements may a Christian consistently indulge in? The following incident supplies an answer:

THE Rev. W. Romaine was one evening invited to a friend's house to tea. After the tea-things had been removed, the lady of the house asked him to play cards, to which he made no objection. When they were produced, however, and all present were ready to commence play, the venerable minister said, "Let us ask the blessing of God." "Ask the blessing of God!" said the lady in great surprise: "I never heard of such a thing before a game of cards." Mr. Romaine then inquired, "Ought we to engage in any thing on which we cannot ask His blessing?" This gentle reproof put an end to the card-playing.

HELP FOR THOSE OFF THE TRACK.

"An Exploration Sermon," by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday morning, December 15.

"When shall I awake? I will seek it yet again."—PROV. 23:35.

Those who having Gone Astray Desire to Return—I. The Obstacles in the Way—1st. The Force of Moral Gravitation—The Evil always Easier than the Good—Moral like Physical Gravitation may be Overcome—2d Obstacle: The Power of Evil Habits—The Votaries of Drink and Tobacco—A Futile Struggle for Emancipation—The Ship on Fire at Niagara—A Student's Death while Skating—3d Obstacle: Social Prejudices—The Returning Prodigal's Reception at Church—Pharisees in the Church—4th Obstacle: The Competition of the Sects—II. How to Surmount the Obstacles—1. Reliance on God—"Cut the Slices Thin"—Distinctions Sunk in the Hospital—2. Quitting Bad Associations—3. Seek Christian Advice—The Best News for Parents—A Country Picture.

I HAVE thought, in the midst of this series of sermons which I am preaching on the night side of city life, it would be well for me to address a sermon of help to the multitude of people who have got on the wrong track. In the nights of my exploration I found a great multitude of men who had gone astray, and nothing more impressed me than the fact of their great multitude.

With an insight into human nature such as no other man ever reached, Solomon, in my text, sketches the mental operations of one who, having stepped aside from the path of rectitude, desires to return. With a wish for something better, he says: "When shall I awake? When shall I come out of this horrid nightmare of iniquity?" But seized upon by uneradicated habit, and forced down-hill by his passions, he cries out: "I will seek it yet again. I will try it once more."

Our libraries are adorned with an elegant literature addressed to young men, pointing out to them all the dangers and perils of life—complete maps of the voyage, showing all the rocks, the quicksands, the shoals. But suppose a man has already made shipwrecks; suppose he is already off the track; suppose he has already gone astray how is he to get back? That is a field comparatively untouched. I propose to address myself this morning to such.

There are those in this audience who, with every passion of their agonized soul, are ready to hear such a discussion. They compare themselves with what they were ten years ago, and cry out from the bondage in which they are incarcerated. Now, if there be any in this house, come with an earnest purpose, yet feeling they are beyond the pale of Christian sympathy, and that the sermon can hardly be expected to address them, then, at this moment, I give them my right hand and call them brother. Look up. There is glorious and triumphant hope for you yet. I sound the trumpet of Gospel deliverance. The church is ready to spread a banquet at your return, and the hierarchs of heaven to fall into line of bannered procession at the news of your emancipation. So far as God may help me, I propose to show what are of your return, and then how you are to surmount those obstacles.

1. The first difficulty in the way of your return is the force of moral gravitation. Just as there is a natural law which brings down to the earth any thing you throw into the air, so there is a corresponding moral gravitation. In other words, it is easier to go down than it is to go up; it is easier to do wrong than it is to do right.

Call to mind the comrades of your boyhood days—some of them good, some of them bad. Which most affected you? Call to mind the anecdotes that you have heard in the last five or ten years—some of them pure, some of them impure. Which the more easily sticks to your memory? During the years of your life you have formed certain courses of conduct—some of them good, some of them bad. To which style of habit did you the more easily yield?

Ah! my friends, we have to take but a moment of self-inspection to find out that there is in all our souls a force of moral gravitation. But that gravitation may be resisted. Just as you may pick up from the earth something and hold it in your hand toward heaven, just so, by the power of God's grace, a soul fallen may be lifted toward peace, toward pardon, toward heaven. Force of moral gravitation in every one of us, but power in God's grace to overcome that force of moral gravitation.

2. The next thing in the way of your return is

THE POWER OF EVIL HABIT.

I know there are those who say it is very easy for them to give up evil habits. I do not believe them. Here is a man given to intoxication. He knows it is disgracing his family, destroying his property, ruining him body, mind, and soul. If that man, being an intelligent man and loving his family, could easily give up that habit, would he not do so? The fact that he does not give it up proves it is hard to give it up.

It is a very easy thing to sail down stream, the tide carrying you with great force; but suppose you turn the boat up stream, is it so easy then to row it? As long as we yield to the evil inclinations in our hearts, and our bad habits, we are sailing down stream; but the moment we try to turn, we put our boat in the rapids just above Niagara, and try to row up stream.

Take a man given to the habit of using tobacco, as most of you do! and let him resolve to stop, and he finds it very difficult. Seventeen years ago I quit that habit, and I would as soon dare to put my right hand in the fire as once to indulge in it. Why? Because it was such a terrific struggle to get over it. Now, let a man be advised by his physician to give up the use of tobacco. He goes around not knowing what to do with himself. He cannot add up a line of figures. He cannot sleep nights. It seems as if the world had turned upside down. He feels his business is going to ruin. Where he was kind and obliging, he is scalding and fretful. The composure that characterized him has given way to a fretful restlessness, and he has become a complete fidget. What power is it that has rolled a wave of woe over the earth, and shaken a portent in the heavens? He has tried to stop smoking!

After a while he says: "Well, I am going to do as I please. The doctor doesn't understand my case. I am going back to my old habit." And he returns. Everything assumes its usual composure. His business seems to brighten. The world becomes an attractive place to live in. His children, seeing the difference, hail the return of their father's genial disposition. What wave of color has dashed blue into the sky and greenness into mountain foliage, and the glow of sapphire into the sunset? What enchantment has lifted a world of beauty and joy on his soul? He has gone back to smoking.

Oh! the fact is, as we all know in our own experience, that habit is a taskmaster; as longs we obey it it does not chastise us; but let us resist, and we find we are to be lashed with scorpion whips, and bound with ship cable, and thrown into the track of bone-breaking Juggernauts.

During the war of 1812 there was a ship set on fire just above Niagara Falls, and then, cut loose from its moorings, it came on down through the night and tossed over the falls. It was said to have been a scene brilliant beyond all description. Well, there are thousands of men on fire of evil habit coming down through the rapids and through the awful night of temptation toward the eternal plunge. Oh! how hard it is to arrest them. God only can arrest them.

Suppose a man after five, or ten, or twenty years of evil-doing resolves to do right? Why, all the forces of darkness are allied against him. He cannot sleep nights. He gets down on his knees in the midnight and cries "God help me!" He bites his lip. He grinds his teeth. He clinches his fist in a determination to keep his purpose. He dare not look at the bottles in the window of a wine-store. It is one long, bitter, exhaustive hand-to-hand fight with in flamed.

tantalizing, and merciless habit. When he thinks he is entirely free, the old inclinations pounce upon him like a pack of hounds with their muzzles tearing away at the flanks of one poor reindeer.

In Paris there is a sculptured representation of Bacchus, the god of revelry. He is riding on a panther at full leap. Oh! how suggestive! Let every one who is speeding on bad ways understand he is not riding a docile and well-broken steed, but he is riding a monster wild and bloodthirsty, going at a death-leap. How many there are who resolve on a better life, and say, "When shall I awake?" but, seized on by their old habits, cry, "I will try it once more; I will seek it yet again!"

Years ago, there were some Princeton students who were skating, and the ice was very thin, and some one warned the company back from the air-hole, and finally warned them entirely to leave the place. But one young man with bravado, after all the rest had stopped, cried out, "One round more!" He swept around, and went down, and was brought out a corpse. My friends, there are thousands and tens of thousands of men losing their souls in that way. It is the one round more.

3. I have also to say that if a man wants to return from evil practices,

SOCIETY REPULSES HIM.

Desiring to reform, he says: "Now I will shake off my old associates, and I will find Christian companionship." And he appears at the church door some Sabbath-day, and the usher greets him with a look as much as to say, "Why, you here! You are the last man I ever expected to see at church! Come, take this seat right down by the door!" Instead of saying, "Good-morning; I am glad you are here. Come; I will give you a first-rate seat, right up by the pulpit."

Well, the prodigal, not yet discouraged, enters a prayer-meeting, and some Christian man, with more zeal than common-sense, says: "Glad to see you; the dying thief was saved, and I suppose there is mercy for you!" The young man, disgusted, chilled, throws himself back on his dignity, resolved he will never enter the house of God again.

Perhaps not quite fully discouraged about reformation, he sides up by some highly respectable man he used to know, going down the street, and immediately the respectable man has an errand down some other street!

Well, the prodigal, wishing to return, takes some member of a Christian association by the hand, or tries to. The Christian young man looks at him, looks at the faded apparel and the marks of dissipation, and instead of giving him a warm grip of the hand, offers him the tip end of the long fingers of the left hand, which is equal to striking a man in the face. Oh! how few Christian people understand how much force and gospel there is in a good, honest handshaking.

Sometimes, when you have felt the need of encouragement, and some Christian man has taken you heartily by the hand, have you not felt thrilling through every fibre of your body, mind, and soul an encouragement that was just what you needed? You do not know any thing at all about this unless you know when a man tries to return from evil courses of conduct he runs against repulsions innumerable.

We say of some man, he lives a block or two from the church, or half a mile from the church. There are people in Brooklyn and New York who live a thousand miles from church. Vast deserts of indifference between them and the house of God. The fact is, we must keep our respectability though thousands and tens of thousands perish. Christ sat with publicans and sinners. But if there came to the house of God a man with marks of dissipation upon him, people almost threw up their hands in horror, as much as to say, "Isn't it shocking?"

How these dainty, fastidious Christians in all our churches are going to get into heaven I don't know, unless they have an especial train of cars, cushioned and upholstered, each one a car to himself! They cannot go with the great herd of publicans and sinners. Oh! ye who curl your lip of scorn at the fallen, I tell you plainly if you had been surrounded by the same influences, instead of sitting to-day amid the cultured and the refined and the Christian, you would have been a crouching wretch in stable or ditch, covered with filth and abomination. It is not because you are naturally any better, but because the mercy of God has protected you. Who are you that you should be so hard on the fallen?

THE SECTS.

4. I think men also are often hindered from return by the fact that churches are too anxious about their membership, and too anxious about their denomination, and they rush out when they see a man about to give up his sin and return to God, and ask him how he is going to be baptized, whether by sprinkling or immersion, and what kind of church he is going to join. O my friends! it is a poor time to talk about Presbyterian catechisms, and Episcopal liturgies, and Methodist love-feasts, and baptistries to a man that is coming out of the darkness of sin into the glorious light of the Gospel.

Why, it reminds me of a man drowning in the sea, and a life-boat puts out for him, and the man in the boat says to the man out of the boat, "Now, if I get you ashore, are you going to live on my street?" First get him ashore, and then talk about the non-essentials of religion. Who cares what church he joins, if he only joins Christ and starts for heaven?

Oh! you ought to have, my brother, an illumined face and a hearty grip for every one that tries to turn from his evil way. Take hold the same book with him though his dissipations shake the book, remembering that he that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins.

Now, I have shown you these obstacles because I want you to understand I know all the difficulties in the way; but I am now to tell you how Hannibal may scale the Alps, and and how the paths of virtue forsaken may be regained. First of all, my brother, throw yourself on God. Go to Him frankly and earnestly, and tell Him these habits you have, and ask Him, if there is any help in all the resources of omnipotent love, to give it to you.

Do not go with a long rigmarole people call prayer, made up of "ohs" and "ahs," and "forever and forever, amens!" Go to God and cry for help! help! help! and if you cannot cry for help, just look and live.

I remember, in the late war, I was at Antietam, and I went into the hospitals after the battle, and I said to a man, "Where are you hurt?" He made no answer, but held up his arm, swollen and splintered. I saw where he was hurt. The simple fact is, when a man has a wounded soul, all he has to do is to hold it up before a sympathetic Lord and get it healed. It does not take any long prayer. Just hold up the wound.

Oh! it is no small thing when a man is nervous and weak and exhausted, coming from his evil ways, to feel that God puts two omnipotent arms around him, and says: "Young man, I will stand by you. The mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but I will never fail you." And then as the soul thinks the news is too good to be true, and cannot believe it, and looks up in God's face, God lifts His right hand and takes an oath, an affidavit, saying: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth." Blessed be God for such a Gospel as this.

"Cut the slices thin," said the wife to the husband, "or there will not be enough to go all around for the children; cut the slices thin." Blessed be God there is a full loaf for every one that wants it. Bread enough and to spare. No thin slices at the Lord's table.

I remember when the Master Street Hospital, in Philadelphia, was opened during the war, a telegram came, saying, "There will be three hundred wounded men to-night; be ready to take care of them;" and from my church there went in some twenty or thirty men and women to look after these poor wounded fellows.

As they came, some from one part of the land, some from another, no one asked whether this man was from Oregon, or from Massachusetts, or from Minnesota, or from New York. There was a wounded soldier, and the only question was how to take off the rags the most gently, and put on the bandage, and administer the cordial. And when a soul comes to God, He does not ask where you came from or what your ancestry was. Healing for all your wounds. Pardon for all your guilt. Comfort for all your troubles.

2. Then, also, I counsel you, if you want to ge back, to

QUIT ALL YOUR BAD ASSOCIATIONS.

One unholy intimacy will fill your soul wit moral distemper. In all the ages of the churc there has not been an instance where a ma kept one evil associate and was reformed Among the twelve hundred thousand of th race, not one instance.

Go home to-day, open your desk, take o letter-paper, stamp an envelope, and then writ a letter something like this:

> "My Old Companions: I start this day for heave Until I am persuaded you will join me in this, farewell."

Then sign your name, and send the letter wi the first post. Give up your bad companio or give up heaven. It is not ten bad compa ions that destroy a man, nor five bad compa ions, nor three bad companions, nor two b companions, but one. What chance is there f that young man I saw along the street, four five young men with him, halting in front of grogshop, urging him to go in, he resisting, v lently resisting, until after a while they forc him to go in? Conclusion of Dr. Brooke's Paper on "The Coming of the Lord in Relation to Christian Doctrine." III. Its Relation to the Removal of the Curse—IV. Its Purifying Influence—V. The Point at which Sanctification is Complete—VI. Relation of this Doctrine to that of the Inspiration of the Scriptures—VII. To the Doctrine of the Resurrection—An Incident in Ancient History—The Sea, the Sea!

Wars and rumors of wars, famines and pestilences, anxiety and unrest everywhere, scientific men burning incense to their own vanity, the masses upheaving with mad efforts to destroy the foundations of all government, appalling crimes and shocking villanies loading the columns of our daily journals, infidelity garrisoned within the Church, the world blaspheming in its rage and pain, the virgins asleep—such is the picture our Lord Himself drew of the course of the present age, "till He come." It is a picture true to the facts of human experience and observation, and it is submitted to the consideration of the candid inquirer, whether the hope of His coming to quiet this confusion and to quell this turbulence does not glorify Him more than the boast of a religious progress, which even ungodly men can see is a delusion and a snare, and a mirage of the desert.

Third—This leads us to glance at His coming in relation to

from the face and bosom of suffering creation. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned" (Rev. 5:12). To fallen Adam it was said, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee" (Gen. 3:17, 18). From that day to this the curse has smitten the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the king and the peasant, the philosopher and the savage alike, and diffused its virulent poison through the whole system of nature. The winds with their ominous moan, the lower animals that once crouched lovingly at man's feet, the dumb earth reluctantly yielding her riches to his toil, and the waves with their resistless might, seem to have conspired against the destroyer of their peace, as if they would hurry him into the grave. But the Word of God that liveth and abideth forever tells of a time, and that, too, while nations exist, when "there shall be no more curse" (Rev. 22:3); when "the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them" (Isaiah 11:6).

It is obvious that the spread of Christianity, however widely extended, personal devotedness to the Saviour, however fervent, the suppression of moral evils, however thorough, can never arrest disease and decay and death, nor extract malaria from the soil, nor cause the fir-tree to grow instead of the thorns, and the myrtle-tree in place of the brier. If, however, post-millennialists insist that the cow and the bear feeding together, the lion eating straw like an ox, the sucking child playing unharmed on the hole of the asp, the desert rejoicing and blossoming as the rose, and the thirsty land becoming springs of water, are to be understood spiritually, being nothing more than poetical metaphors to show the transforming power of the Gospel, they are forced to conclude that the curse will rush onward in its desolating career through the entire period of their anticipated millennium. Storms will continue to burst in unsparing fury upon earth and sea; creation will continue to groan in her travailing throes, plague and pestilence will continue their work of destruction; sickness and pain will continue to invade every household; death will continue to lay his ruffian grasp on every quivering form, hard labor, corroding care, bitter poverty, darkened homes, blighted hopes, will continue to harass and waste and kill, as the thousand years roll on, until a great cry would ascend to God to bring such a millennium to a speedy end.

> "The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks > That flesh is heir to,"

But He is better than men think, for "He shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you: whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." It is reserved for the second man in person, and on the very earth that held His cross, to remove the curse inflicted by the first man; and it is strange that one loyal to Him can wish it to be otherwise.

When the expectation of His personal coming dropped out of the faith and hope of the Church after three hundred years of blessed testimony and successful service, she did little through the dark ages to bear His name to the perishing millions; and this was dishonoring to Him as the Prophet and Priest of His people. But since the era of modern missions, she boasts that she can and will repair the ruins of the fall, and reign on the earth, while He has gone into a far country to receive for Himself a kingdom, and to return; and this is no less dishonoring to Him as the anointed king of the nations. Some at least, thank God, do not desire her coronation until His own royal hand shall seat her beside Him on the throne, for they are singing day by day, with full intelligence of its meaning,

> "Bring forth the royal diadem
> And crown HIM Lord of all!"

Fourth—His pre-millennial coming sustains a relation to the doctrine of purification equally direct and important. Owing to the prevalence of the unscriptural theory that by the combined efforts of civilization and religion the world grows better as it grows older, not only is the sovereignty of God in the bestowal of His grace banished from the emasculated theology of the day, but men are thrown upon their own resources for salvation. According to the preaching too frequently heard, even when there is no bold denial of the plain statements of Scripture concerning the future punishment of the wicked, conversion is represented as a long and laborious process, a result of culture under self-imposed restraints, or a conformity to ecclesiastical rules and regulations, with a vague and indefinite hope that all this may purchase a title to heaven.

According to the Gospel, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life" (John 3:36); "By Him all that believe are justified from all things" (Acts 13:39); "To him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness" Romans 4:5); and "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Romans 5:1). All is simple, clear, and pressing, as if there were urgent need of haste in delivering the message, and of haste no less urgent, on the part of those who listen, to receive it, and straightway to rejoice.

Those who spoke knew that Christ might come while they were speaking, and they would have those who heard to know it likewise, that they might lay hold of eternal life without a moment's delay. They must be like the dying thief, who had no time to make himself better, but was shut up to the necessity of believing the promise of Jesus; they must be like multitudes of Christians on a dying bed, of whom it is said they received dying grace, because at last they are forced to turn from trying to trusting, when it ought to have been living grace all along; they must be like those of whom the Master spoke in view of His coming, "He which shall be upon the house-top, and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back" (Luke 17:31). No one can really look for His advent as possible every day, as not improbable any day, without being cast upon His finished work alone for justification, and upon His faithful word alone for assurance.

Nor will it answer to substitute death for His personal coming, because death is not mentioned in Scripture as that which is set before the believers, and because it is notoriously the most powerless and the most fruitless argument that can be addressed to men. It is something far more impressive than a solitary death that demands immediate attention, and that sends out the stirring words, "Come; for all things are now ready" (Luke 14 : 17).

Fifth—His second coming has a bearing on the doctrine of sanctification as indicating

THE POINT AT WHICH SANCTIFICATION IS COMPLETED.

There is a sense in which believers are already sanctified, for we read, "To them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus" (1 Cor. 1 : 2). But using the term at present in its commonly accepted sense, as implying progressive holiness, or the increasing ascendency of the new man over the old man, of the spirit over the flesh, what thoughts cluster about it in the light of our Lord's second advent!

Post-millennialists invariably make it end at death, and thus turn our attention to that which is the curse, the consequence and the conquest of sin, to the clammy sweat, the glazing eye, the labored breathing, the coffin, the grave, the worm and corruption, as the goal to which the Holy Spirit's discipline and teachings conduct the believer. It is needless to say that no such view is presented in Scripture. There a far higher and nobler object is set before us: "To the end He may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints" (1 Thess. 3 : 13); "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess. 5 : 23).

This, and not death, is the appropriate and glorious termination of our growth in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and that coming accounts for the twofold form in which sanctification and other doctrines of God's Word are revealed. We are sanctified now through the cleansing blood, should He come to-day; should He be pleased to tarry yet a little longer, and will have larger and still larger experiences of His sustaining and sanctifying grace amid trials and conflicts here below.

Sixth—The relation of the Second Coming to the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures must not be entirely overlooked, even in so imperfect an outline of the connections in which the great truth stands in the New Testament. Those who witness for this truth have fought the battle with its enemies on the ground of ecclesiastical history, and on the ground of biblical exegesis, and have triumphantly carried both points, that the early disciples looked for the advent of Christ, and that this advent was nothing but His literal and personal return to the earth. Forced to abandon their former position, Post-Millennial ministers and writers are now taking a new stand, far more dangerous to the souls of men, and far more dishonoring to the Lord. They are boldly asserting that holy men of old, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, were mistaken when they taught the people to look for His coming.

How could they be mistaken in that which was not a subject of revelation? They were not taught that He would, or would not, come at any fixed time, but they were taught to look for [illegible] and, should they die before His advent, to [illegible] their believing expectation of it as the most precious legacy they [illegible] that so His coming might be the one radiant star of hope in the firmament of revealed truth for the entire [illegible].

But if it "would introduce a dangerous license in interpretation, and one which might be employed to subvert the principal doctrines of the Christian system," to refer the numerous statements of Scripture on this subject to anything else than the second advent of the Lord, it is a much more dangerous license to say that the Apostles were mistaken in their teachings.

If they were mistaken on this point, they may have been mistaken on other points, and infidelity is the logical and inevitable result of affirming either one or the other. It is becoming quite the fashion to treat lightly and irreverently the authority of the Bible, whenever it runs counter to some popular theory, or scientific assertion, or humanitarian scheme; and to one who knows that the very words of Scripture were given by the Holy Ghost the tendency of the pulpit in this direction is exceedingly alarming.

Seventh—The relation of our Lord's second coming to

is too well known to require extended remark, even if time permitted. The two are intimately and indissolubly associated in the Scriptures, though the fatal habit of spiritualizing away the one has, to a fearful extent, led to the denial of the literality of the other. Nor is this result surprising, painful as it is to see the abandonment of a doctrine so prominent in the Word of God, and so peculiar to Christian faith.

If the frequent allusions to the advent of Christ, running all through the New Testament, can be perverted to mean a thousand different things, it is not strange that those who are perplexed by scientific argument against the reality of the resurrection would seek to explain it as referring only to some spiritual change at death. But one is as literal as the other, and both stand or fall together: "Christ the first-fruits; afterward, they that are Christ's, at His coming" (1 Cor. 15 : 23).

Hence, too, there is nothing, and in the very nature of the scheme of redemption there can be nothing, between believers and that promised advent, with its attendant resurrection of the righteous dead. The first step is to be in Christ, of whom it is said, "Ye are complete in Him" (Col. 2 : 10); the next step is to be with Christ in the glory. The first step is to receive Christ by faith, the next step is to wait for Christ from heaven. There is no need of delay either to secure additional title to the incomplete inheritance or to acquire fitness for its possession, since the cry that shook earth and hell was heard ascending from the dying Saviour, "It is finished" (John 19 : 30).

It was to be expected, therefore, that even the first pagan converts having turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, would be taught "to wait for his Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead, even Jesus which delivered us from the wrath to come" (1 Thess. 1 : 10). There was nothing else, there could have been nothing else, set before them as the hope of the Gospel; for if the grave intervened, it was only in the touching words of the inscription on Dean Alford's tomb—"The inn of a traveller on his way to the New Jerusalem."

Should the objection be raised that they waited in vain, and that their hope met with a cruel disappointment, the reply is, their bodies are waiting still in the assurance of a glorious resurrection at His coming. They laid their dead to rest, comforted with the thought that before they left the place of burial the Lord Himself might descend from heaven with a kingly and conquering shout to His own sleeping and living saints to awaken the former and to change the latter; for had He not in the last chapter of the Bible three times repeated the promise, "I come quickly"? There is no revolution of the earth upon its axis in that bright world of which it is said, "there shall be no night there" (Rev. 21 : 25), and ages fly swiftly where all is glory and gladness. When the voice sounds from the celestial city, "Surely I come quickly," it is counting time as it is reckoned by Him with whom a thousand years are as one day (2 Pet. 3 : 8).

Brethren in the Lord, we are not prophets, we are only humble students of the prophetic Word; and while it is not for us "to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts 1 : 7), it certainly becomes us, after the lapse of more than 1800 years, to shout with increased earnestness and urgency to the midnight cry, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

THE SEA—THE SEA!

Xenophon relates that the Greeks, after the death of Cyrus, were exposed to innumerable hardships in their retreat through hostile countries. They were forced to face the bitter blasts of winter, and marched through snows, and were scorched by the burning sun, and crossed pestilential marshes, and scaled steep mountains, and stormed forts and citadels, and were harassed at every step by their wary and relentless foes. At last the vanguard ascended a mountain and gave a great shout, "which when Xenophon and those in the rear heard, they concluded that some other enemies attacked them in front. . . . The noise still increasing as they came nearer, and the men, as fast as they came up, running to those who still continued shouting, their cries swelled with their numbers so that Xenophon, thinking that somethin more than ordinary had happened, mounted o horseback, and, taking with him Lycius and hi horse, rode up to their assistance, and pres ently they heard all the soldiers calling ou 'Sea, sea!' and cheering one another. At th time they all set a running, the rear-guard a well as the rest, and the beasts of burden an horses were driven forward. When they we all come up to the top of the mountain th embraced one another, and also their genera and captains, with tears in their eyes."

Courage, fellow-soldiers, for we shall soon b hold the sea, with its placid bosom kept in m lennial repose by the commanding "Peace, still" of Jesus; and upon its "shining shor we shall ever be with the Lord.

"Brother! up to the breach,
For Christ's coming and truth;
Let us act as we teach,
With the wisdom of age, and the vigor of youth
Heed not their cannon-balls;
Ask not who stands or falls·
Grasp the sword
Of the Lord,
And—forward!"

THE COMING OF THE LORD IN ITS R- LATIONS TO CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

I have heard that it has been said that e- Millenarians constitute the infant class in e- ology. Most willingly, gladly, do I take e place thus assigned me, for I have not now to learn that the Master often hides the g at things of His Kingdom from the wise and u- dent and reveals them unto babes. I can n- ceive of no higher honor, no greater blessedness, on earth or in heaven, than to sit as a chil at the feet of Jesus and drink in the words o n- struction as they fall from His lips. God g nt that with the simplicity of a child I may l rn the truth from Him to-day, and that with ke simplicity I may recite it.

I have been requested not to read a forma pa per, but to deliver an address on the Relatio of the Coming of Christ to Christian Doctrine It cannot, of course, be expected or desired t t I should retraverse the subject so fully and bly presented by Dr. Brookes. I shall, there re, your understanding to contrive, to invent, to fashion the ideal of something that should be inimitable—ay (to utter a paradox) if you could labor to conceive something which should be inconceivably lovely, yet still you would not reach to the perfection of Christ Jesus. He is above, not only all we think, but all we dream of. Do you all believe this? Dear hearers, do you think of Jesus in this fashion? We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen. But no man among you will receive our witness until he can say, "I also have seen Him, and having seen Him, I set to my seal that He is altogther lovely."

II. And now, secondly, as this is rare praise, so likewise

IT IS PERPETUAL PRAISE.

You may say of Christ whenever you look at Him, "Yea, He is altogether lovely." He always was so. As God over all, He is blessed for ever, Amen. When in addition to His Godhead, He assumed our mortal clay, was He not inimitably lovely then? The babe in Bethlehem was the most beautiful sight that ever the world beheld. No fairer flower ever bloomed in the garden of creation than the mind of that youth of Nazareth gradually unfolding, as He "grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon Him." All the while He lived on earth, what moral perfections, what noble qualities, what spiritual charms were about His sacred person! His life among men is a succession of charming pictures.

And He was lovely in his bitter passion, when as the thick darkness overshadowed His soul He prayed, in an agony of desire, "Not My will, but Thine, be done." The bloody sweat did not disfigure, but adorn Him. And oh, was He not lovely when He died? Without resentment, He interceded for His murderers. His patience, His self-possession, His piety, as "the faithful martyr," have fixed as the meridian of time the hour when He said, "It is finished," and bowed His head, and "cried with a loud voice, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." He is lovely in His resurrection from the dead; beyond description lovely. Not a word of accusation did He utter against His cruel persecutors, though He had risen clothed with all power in heaven and in earth. With such tender sympathy did He make Himself known to His sorrowing disciples, that despite the waywardness of their unbelief their hearts' instinct told them it was "the same Jesus." He is altogether lovely.

He will be lovely when He comes with solemn pomp, and sound of trumpet, and escort of mighty angels, and brings all His saints who have departed with Him, and calls up those that are alive and remain on the earth till His advent, to meet Him in the air. Oh, how lovely He will appear to the two throngs who will presently join in one company! How admirable will His appearance be! How eyes, ears, hearts, and voices will greet Him! With what unanimity the host redeemed by blood will account their highest acclamations as a trivial tribute to His honor and glory! "He is altogether lovely." Yea, and He shall be lovely forever and ever when your eyes and mine shall eternally find their heaven in beholding Him. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever," is always worthy of this word of praise—"altogether lovely."

Let us retrace our steps for a minute. The more we study the four gospels, the more charmed we are with the gospel; for as a modern author has well said, "The gospels, like the gospel, are most divine because they are most human." As followers of Jesus, rank yourselves with those men who companied with Him all the time that He went in and out among them; and you shall find Him lovely in all conditions. Lovely when He talks to a leper, and touches and heals him; lovely by the bedside when He takes the fever-stricken patient by the hand and heals her; lovely by the wayside, when He greets the blind beggar, puts His finger on his eyes and bids him see; lovely when He stands on the sinking vessel and rebukes the waves; lovely when He meets the bier and rekindles the life that had expired; lovely when He visits the mourners, goes with the sisters of Bethany to the new-made grave, and weeps, and groans, and—majestically lovely—bids the dead come forth.

Lovely is He when He rides through the streets of Jerusalem upon a colt, the foal of an ass. Oh, had we been there, we would have plucked the palm branches, and we would have taken off our garments to strew the way. Hosannah, lovely Prince of Peace! But He was just as lovely when He came from the garden with His face all besmeared with bloody sweat; just as lovely when they said, "Crucify Him, crucify Him;" ay, and loveliest, to my eyes loveliest of all, when mangled, wounded, fainting, bruised, dying, He said, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" uttering a plaintive cry of utmost grief from the felon's gibbet whereon he died.

He is lovely in all His offices. What an entrancing sight to see the king in His beauty, with His diadem upon His head, as He now sits in yonder world of brightness! How charming to view Him as a priest, with the Urim and Thummim, wearing the names of his people bejewelled on His breastplate! And what a vision of simple beauty, to see Him as a prophet teaching his people in touching parables of homely interest, of whom they said, "Never man spake like this man"! The very tones of His voice, and the glance of his eyes, made His eloquence so supreme that it enthralled men's hearts. Yes, He is lovely, altogether lovely in any and every character. We know not which best beseems him, the highest or the lowliest positions. Let Him be what He may—Lamb or Shepherd, Brother or King, Saviour or Master, Foot-washer or Lord—in every relation He is altogether lovely.

Get a view of Him, my brethren, from any point, and see whether he is not lovely. Do you recollect the first sight you ever had of Him? It was on a day when your eyes were red with weeping over sin, and you expected to see the Lord dressed in anger coming forth to destroy you. Oh, it was the happiest sight I ever saw when I beheld my sins rolling into His sepulchre, and when looking up I beheld Him my Substitute bleeding on the tree. Altogether lovely was he that day. Since then Providence has given us a varied experience, and taken us to different points of view that we might look at Christ, and see Him under many aspects.

We look at statues from several standpoints if we would criticise them. A great many in London are hideous from all points of view—others are very well if you look at them this way, but if you go over yonder and look from another point the artist appears to have utterly failed. Now, beloved, look at Jesus from any point you like, and He is at his best from each and every corner. You have been in prosperity: God multiplied your children and blessed your basket and your store—was Jesus lovely then? Assuredly He was the light of your delights. Nothing he had given you vied with Himself. He rose in your hearts superior to His own best gifts. But you tell me that you have been very sick, and you have lost one after another of your dear ones; your means have been reduced; you have come down in the world: say, then, is Jesus lovely now? I know that you will reply "Yes, more than ever is Christ delightful in mine eyes." Well, you have had very happy times, and you have been on the mount of hallowed friendship.

The other Sunday morning many of us were up there, and thought like Peter that we should like to stay there forever; and is not Jesus lovely when He is transfigured and we are with Him? Yes, but at another time you are down in the depths with Jonah, at the bottom of the sea. Is not Christ lovely then? Yes, even there He hears our prayer out of His holy temple, and brings us again from the deep abyss. We shall soon lie dying. Oh, my brethren, what brave talk God's people have often given us about their Lord when they have been on the edge of the grave! That seems to be a time when the Well-beloved takes the veil off His face altogether and sits by the bedside, and lets His children look into His face, and see him as He is. I warrant you the saints forget the ghastliness of death when their hearts are ravished with the loveliness of Christ.

Christ is altogether lovely in this respect—that, when men reproach Him and rail at Him, he is often all the lovelier in His people's eyes. I warrant you Christ has been better known by the burn-side in Scotland by His covenanting people than ever He has been seen under the fretted roof of cathedral architecture. Away there in lonely glens, amid the mosses and the hills, where Covenanters met for fear of Claverhouse and his dragoons, the Lord Jesus has shone forth like the sun in his strength. We have nowadays to be satisfied with His moonlight face, but in persecuting days His children have seen His sun face, and oh! how glad they have been. Hear how the saints sing in prison! Listen to their charming notes, even on the rack, when the glory of His presence fills their souls with heaven on earth, and makes them defy the torments of the flesh.

The Lord Jesus is more lovely to the soul that can bear reproach for Him than He is to any other. Put the cross on His back if you will, but we love Him all the better for that. Nail up His hands, but we love Him all the better for that. Now fasten His feet; ay, but our soul melteth with love to Him, and she feels new reasons for loving Him when she beholds the nails. Now stand ye around the cross, ye worldlings, and mock Him if ye will. Taunt and jest, and jeer and jibe—these do but make us love the better the great and glorious One, who "made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and being found in fashion as a man, humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross."

Beloved, you shall keep on looking at Christ from all these points of view till you get to heaven, and each time you shall be more enamoured of Him. When you reach the celestial city and see Him face to face, then shall you say, "The half has not been told us," but even here below Christ is altogether lovely to His people.

III. I leave that head just to notice, in the third place, that though this praise is rare praise and perpetual praise, yet also IT IS TOTALLY INSUFFICIENT PRAISE.

Say ye that He is altogether lovely? It is not enough. It is not a thousandth part enough. No tongue of man, no tongue of angel, can ever set forth His unutterable beauties. "Oh," say you, "but it is a great word, though short; very full of meaning though soon spoken—altogether lovely." I tell you it is a poor word. It is a word of despair. It is a word which the spouse uttered, because she had been trying to describe her Lord and she could not do it, and so she put this down in very desperation: as much as to say, "There, the task is too great for me. I will end it. This is all I can say. 'Yea, He is altogether lovely.'" I am sure John Berridge was right when he said—

> "Living tongues are dumb at best,
> We must die to speak of Christ."

Brethren, the praise of the text is insufficient praise, I know, because it is praise given by one who had never seen Him in His glory. It is Old Testament praise this, that He is altogether lovely: praise uttered upon report rather than upon actual view of Him. Truly I know not how to bring better, but I shall know one day. Till then I will speak His praise as best I can, though it fall far short of His infinite excellence. Our text is cloth of gold, but it is not fit for our Beloved to put the sole of His foot upon.

He deserves better than this, for this is only the praise of a church that had not seen Him die, and had not seen Him rise, and had not seen Him in the splendor at the divine right hand. "Well," say you, "try if you can do better." No, I will not, because I if did praise Him better, the style would not last long, for He is coming quickly, and the best thing the best speaker could ever say of Him will be put out of date by the majesty of His appearing. His chariot is waiting at His door now, and He may soon come forth from His secret chambers and be among us, and oh! the glory—oh! the glory! Paul, you know, stole a glance through the lattices one day when he was caught up into the third heaven.

Somebody said to me, "I wonder Paul did not tell us what he saw." Ay, but what he saw he might not tell, and the words he heard were words which it were not lawful for a man to utter, and yet to live among this evil generation. We shall hear those words ourselves soon, and see those sights not many days hence, so let it stand as it does, "He is altogether lovely." But when you have thus summed up all that our poor tongues can express, you must not say, "Now we have described Him." Oh no, sirs, ye have but held a candle to this glorious sun, for He is such an one as thoughts cannot compass, much less language describe.

I leave this point with the reflection that God intends to describe Him and set Him forth one day. He is waiting patiently, for long-suffering is part of Christ's character; and God is setting forth the long-suffering of Christ in the patient waiting of these eighteen hundred years. But the day shall presently dawn and usher in the everlasting age when Christ shall be better seen, for every eye shall see Him, and every tongue confess that He is Lord. The whole earth will one day be sweet with the praise of Jesus. Earth, did I say? This alabaster box of Christ's sweetness has too much fragrance in it for the world to keep it all to itself; the sweetness of our Lord's person will rise above the stars, and perfume worlds unknown.

It will fill heaven itself. Eternity shall be occupied with declaring the praises of Jesus. Seraphs shall sing of it; angels shall harp it; the redeemed shall declare it. He is altogether lovely. The cycles of eternity as they revolve shall only confirm the statement of the blood-redeemed that He is altogether lovely. O that the day were come when we shall bow with them and sing with them! Wait a little while and be not weary, and you shall be at home, and then you shall know that I spoke the truth when I said that this was insufficient praise. Earth is too narrow to contain Him, heaven is too little to hold Him, eternity itself too short for the utterance of all His praises.

IV. So I close with this last thought, which may God bless for practical uses. This praise is VERY SUGGESTIVE.

Do you not love Christ? Then let me ask you why you do not? There was never a man yet that knew Christ that could give a reason for not loving Him, neither is there such a reason to be discovered. He is altogether lovely. In nothing is He unlovable. Oh I wish that the good Spirit of God would whisper in your heart, and incline you to say, "I will see about this Christ. I will read of Him. I will look at the four portraits of Him painted by the evangelists and if He be indeed thus lovely, no doubt He will win my heart, as He appears to have won the hearts of others." I pray He may. But do not, I pray you, continue to deny Christ your love. It is all you can give Him. It is a poor thing, but He values it. He would sooner have your heart than all the gold in Europe.

Now, the praise is suggestive still further. "Is Christ altogether lovely? Then do I love Him? As a child of God, do I love Him, as much as I ought? I do love Him. Yes, blessed be His name, I do love Him. But what a poor, cold, chill love it is. How few are the sacrifices I make for Him. How few are the offerings that I present to Him. How little is the fellowship that I maintain with Him." Brother, is there a rival in your heart? Do you allow any one to come in between you and the "altogether lovely." If so, chase out the intruder. Christ must have all your heart, and let me tell you the more we love Him the more bliss we shall have. A soul that is altogether given up to the love of Christ lives above care and sorrow.

It has care and sorrow, but the love of Christ kills all the bitterness by its inexpressible sweetness. I cannot tell you how near a man may live to heaven, but I am persuaded that a very large proportion of the bliss of heaven may be enjoyed before we come there. There is one conduit pipe through which heavenly joy will flow, and if you draw from it you may have as much as you will. "Abide in Me," says Christ; and if you do abide in His love you shall have His joy fulfilled in yourselves, that your joy may be full. You will have more capacious vessels in heaven, but even now the little vessel that you have can be filled up to the brim by knowing the inexpressible loveliness of Jesus and surrendering your hearts to it.

Oh that I could rise to something better than myself. I often feel like a chick in the egg; I am picking my way out, and I cannot get clear of my prison. Fain would I chip the shell, come forth to freedom, develop wings, and soar heavenward, singing on the road. Would God that were our portion. If any thing can help us to get out of the shell, and to begin to rise and sing, it must be a full and clear perception that Jesus is altogether lovely. Come, let us be married to him afresh to-night.

Come, believing hearts, yield again to His charms; again surrender yourselves to the supremacy of His affection. Let us have the love of our espousals renewed. As you come to his table bethink you of the lips of Christ, of which the spouse had been speaking before she uttered my text—"His mouth is most sweet." There are three things about Christ's mouth that are very sweet. The first is His word, you have heard that. The second is His breath. Come, Holy Spirit, make Thy people feel that. And the third is His kiss. May every believing soul have that sweet token of His eternal love.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ARE REVISED BY HIM.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

CAPTAIN THORPE replied curtly to his queer questioner, for when he asked what could be Christian's reason for sailing in the Eglantine he implied that there must be some very pressing reason for his doing so or he would not venture. The captain did not wish to give any wider publicity to the floating rumors concerning the Eglantine. The man turned and walked away.

Meanwhile Christian made his way to the docks, and on reaching the Eglantine found the men, as Thorpe had said, on the lookout for him. Many of them thought he would not go; and one, a man named Lucas, had openly said he was sure Christian would find some excuse for staying behind. Taking no notice, he chatted with them till Captain Thorpe came, and then went to make his arrangements in the cabin.

"There, you see!" said Lucas, as he disappeared, "he ain't coming; he never said a word about it."

The men looked at Cairns, expecting him to answer; but he either did not hear, or, hearing, did not heed, and continued leaning idly over the side.

"Do you think he's coming, Cairns?" asked a boy about fourteen, the youngest of the crew.

"If you wait you'll see," was the only answer he got. They had not to wait long. Calling Cairns, the captain ordered him and another man to accompany Mr. Hilliard and bring down some of his things to the vessel. For the life of him Cairns could not resist the opportunity for a cut at Lucas.

"Come with us, mate," he said in an undertone, for Christian was close at hand, "The young master will likely give us the slip round some corner, and it's as well you kept your eye on him. I shouldn't wonder but there's a balloon waiting for him outside the harbor."

Lucas muttered something under his breath, and turned sullenly away.

Nearly all day Christian was busily engaged superintending the arrangement of his various belongings. He took Maud down to show her his new quarters, and was much amused at the critical remarks freely made in rough sailor terms upon her beauty. It was not often they saw any thing so fair as "Mr. Christian's sweetheart." He had taken her home, and returned for the last time to the docks, when he overtook his father slowly making his way toward the Eglantine. In answer to his son's pleasant greeting he merely nodded, keeping on his way in silence. Christian walked by his side, wondering what on earth brought him there. Surely he was not going to order Captain Thorpe not to sail with him on board! he was capable of even that in his present state of mind.

Close to the Eglantine they were forced to stop while the way was cleared. A truck had broken down, depositing its load of coal on the road, and men were rapidly shovelling it away. To go round it was out of the question, the mud being so thick. Close by stood Cairns, with a little girl in his arms—a delicate, fragile-looking child, with a sweet, patient little face.

"That's father's ship, Nannie," he was saying, pointing to the Eglantine. "Her with the red flag."

The child looked at it earnestly.

"It isn't very pretty, father," she said, hesitatingly, and Christian could not help smiling at the word.

Pretty, indeed! it was one of the ugliest craft in the docks.

"Pretty is as pretty does: if she takes father out to Quebec, and brings him safe home again, you won't mind her being a bit black and ugly, will you, Nannie?"

"Will you come home soon, father?"

"That depends on a many things, dear; I'll come back to my little maid as soon as the winds and waves will let me."

"Which way are you going, father?"

"Right out yonder, where the sun is setting."

"It's so bright I can scarcely look at it," said the child, raising herself in her father's arms, and shading her eyes with her hand. "Are you going right out into the light? Will you go far enough to see the gate?"

"What gate, Nannie?"

"It's out there, isn't it? The Gate of Glory, you know, father."

"Where did you hear talk of such a gate, Nannie?" said Cairns, with a somewhat puzzled look on his face.

"Why, it is in my hymn, father—'When sun sets in the West.' I should like to go with you into all that gold! isn't it lovely!"

"Shall I cut a piece out as I go through, and bring it home for you?" asked Cairns, jokingly.

"You can't," said the child regretfully. "Besides, it would spoil the look."

Christian stepped forward.

"Is this your little girl, Cairns?"

"Yes, sir; she's the only one at home now. I've brought her to see father's ship."

"Take her on board and show her every thing there is to be seen. You would like to know in what sort of a vessel father's going, wouldn't you?" said Christian, with a pleasant smile, which always won a child's heart.

"She's a little bit of a coward about the sea," said Cairns; "every time I go away she has a bit of a cry, because she thinks the big waves'll swallow me up. Never you fear, Nannie; father 'll come back safe to his little maid, please God."

With a sudden movement Mr. Hilliard stepped over the coal and walked on, out of hearing. He could not bear to hear another word. He began to see now that his ships were freighted with something more than cargo; and he was realizing in his own person what that something was. Would he have sent the Eglantine to sea at all, he asked himself, had he known his own son's life would have been risked in her? Circumstances seemed to have worked in spite of him to concentrate his hopes on that craft, which he well knew was not fit for the voyage. Now his avarice, his reckless struggle for wealth in which he had sacrificed the lives of brave men, stood revealed to him in glaring colors. His son, on whom his hopes were centred, was to sail in that wretched hull to save his father's honor. Going in reliance on his father's word, which was a conscious lie.

Here, now, in Cairns he saw his own position, only in this case the relations were reversed—the child remained and the father ventured his life. Knowing what he knew, Mr. Hilliard groaned in spirit as he heard the childish prattle and thought of the sorrow in the man's home that would follow a wreck. Of course these things had happened before, and had happened, too, by his own actions; but until now he had never realized what fearful issues were staked on his ventures and how sad the results had only too often been. Now when his boy, the pride and joy of his life, might be sacrificed, he saw it all and he suffered. So to every sinner a time comes, when the sins he committed carelessly and thoughtlessly enough stand out before him, traced in characters of fire, and they appall him. Sin is always hideous, but sometimes it is so disguised by money or pleasure that its ugliness is unrecognized until some sudden turn of life's kaleidoscope, or the influence of the Holy Spirit of God, strips off the mask and reveals the curse.

With a few words to Cairns, and a bright, new half-crown to the child, Christian followed his father and met Captain Thorpe, who was just coming off the vessel, but turned and went back with his employer.

"I have come to have a look round before you sail," said Mr. Hilliard, in a strangely quiet tone. "I suppose you are all ready to start."

"Yes," replied the skipper; "we shall weigh anchor to-morrow morning, all being well, sir."

With a cold, impenetrable face, Mr. Hiiliard went over the vessel. Every thing was in order, and he had occasion for not one suggestion. Why he had come he scarcely knew; he had felt impelled by some resistless force, to see, it might be for the last time, the ill-fated Eglantine, and now he had regretted yielding to it.

The sun had sunk deep into the west, leaving the ship cold, and dark, and lifeless, as he left the docks. Turning, he saw it lying in the shadow, and with a shudder looked away.

Was it his son's coffin lying there?

Christian had soon hurried away, for that being his last night in England he must spend it with Maud. It was a bright, clear, moonlight night, and they walked to the garden gate for the last good-by. Leaning on Christian's arm, Maud looked up with eyes not entirely undimmed with tears.

"Do you believe in presentiments, Christian?" she asked, with a slight quiver in her voice.

"Presentiments!" he echoed. "Not I. What have you got in that dear funny little head now?"

"Don't laugh at me," she entreated; "I cannot help it, Christian. I have had such a strange feeling on me all day."

"About this voyage of mine? Do you think any thing is going to happen to me? Cheer up, my darling; I have been pretty nearly all over the world, and have come to no harm yet."

"Christian, why wouldn't your father show you that letter?" she cried, passionately. "Why did he forbid your going? I know something is going to happen—I can feel it."

"My dear, what is likely to happen? It is the best season of the year for such a voyage, and Thorpe anticipates a capital sail. You get your crochet and tatting, or whatever it is that comes under the head of trousseau, and the time will pass away quickly enough. I shall expect you to be quite ready for me by the time I come back. Mind, Maud, I shall not wait any longer then. Come, dry up those tears, dear one, and give me a good-by that I shall remember and think about every daytill I see you again."

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 29th. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR lessons for the past quarter contain many of the precious teachings of our blessed Lord by parable and precept. We began with the improvement of privileges in Luke 13, and most solemn is our blessed Master's summing up of His teaching on this subject (verse 34). Our next lessons (are taken from what seems to have been a continuous discourse of our Lord's, begun in the Pharisee's house, and only ending with the ninth verse of the seventeenth chapter.

The Lord was ever full of matter. With a mind and heart free from all selfish occupation, and anointed with the Holy Ghost, there was room for the interests of a world; and wherever He went, light, power, love, and healing followed in His steps. In answer to a religious remark made by one who sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, who seemed to be little aware of the eternal realities of which he was speaking, the Lord Jesus preached the free full offer of salvation in the parable of the Gospel feast. It would seem that, on leaving the Pharisee's house, great multitudes followed Him, and now He shows that, though sinners are invited to receive salvation without money and without price—yet in order to discipleship there is a price to pay.

We receive Christ's offered pardon freely, for "Jesus paid it all, all to Him I owe;" but to be a follower, a representative of Jesus (and we are saved that we may be disciples), a man must hate father, mother, etc., must bear his cross and come after Christ, and must forsake all that he hath, as Jesus forsook all that He had (chap. 14: 26, 27, 33). We can have no part in saving ourselves, but He allows us the blessed part of following Him at a cost, that there may be a real outlet to our love.

He adds: Salt is good: but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be seasoned? It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men cast it out;" for they who are converted, and do not go on to discipleship, must fall back. Every backslider is as savorless salt, "men cast it out." Men have a contempt for one who has known the good part and turned like "the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire" (2 Pet. 2: 22). This practical teaching did not frighten sinners away from Jesus, for "then drew near unto Him all the publicans and sinners for to hear Him. And the Pharisees and scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." And the blessed Lord went on to show them that what man casts out, God does not cast out, but He makes a way of return for the lost sheep, the lost silver, and the prodigal son. "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely: for Mine anger is turned away from him" (Hos. 14: 4). "Return unto Me; for I have redeemed thee" (Isa. 44: 22).

But although our beloved Lord stretches out His arms as widely and as freely to the backslider as to the sinner, he too must be taught his responsibility. The elder son could not understand the father's joy in his prodigal son's return. And perhaps the disciples could not understand how Jesus could place discipleship at so high a level, and yet represent God as receiving back instantaneously and freely one who had failed in the spirit of discipleship. The father said to the elder brother, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." This He could not say to the prodigal; and the unjust steward teaches a lesson of prudence. "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much," etc. "If ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" All we have on earth is another man's, it is God's, and not ours; we are stewards, and our work is to do all in time with a view to eternity, since we have in charge a life as eternal as God's own, and in view of our co-existence with God our beloved Lord warns us we cannot do what most men are trying to do—We "cannot serve God and mammon." The covetous Pharisees "heard all these things: and they derided Him;" and then, for the first and only time, Jesus lifted the veil which hides lost spirits from us, and He showeth us in torment no murderer, thief, adulterer, or drunkard, but a man whose like may be found by thousands in every land, in every city, in every watering-place. It is the strange exception to be unlike him. He lived for time when God had created him for eternity, and for this sin against his own soul is he in the torments of hell, and if God's Word means any thing it is forever that he is there.

Next we have the incident of the ten lepers all cleansed, but only one of whom returned to give God the glory. Nine submitted to the outward consecration of the blood and the oil by the high-priest, but only with the one was this a reality. The most solemn ordinance can only be real so far as it is made so by the apprehension of our faith and the renunciation of our will to God. And our next lesson is on acceptable prayer, and we have learnt by the parables of the unjust judge and the Pharisee and publican to be real in our approaches to God.

After this we have been led to reflect on our Lord's return, and the judgments which must precede and accompany it. "Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober" (1 Thess. 5: 6). Yea, for our Lord has said, "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." It is of the utmost importance that we should understand the times in which we live. The children of Israel gave no heed to the warnings of God by His prophets about the Babylonish captivity, nor yet later about the destruction of Jerusalem. Shall we resemble them? The Apostle Peter says (2 Pet. 3: 11), "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting the coming [see margin] of the day of God?"

Next we have thought of the Lord's Supper, the breaking of bread in remembrance of Him who is our Passover. We must not forget that it was immediately afterwards that He gave the always deepening teaching to His disciples which is contained in John 14: 31—16, when also He prayed His sacerdotal prayer (John 17), and gave to His disciples in all ages to see what is His heart in intercession.

Then we have been led to the Cross, and oh! it were well for us to find out our place is beneath it. There were many classes represented on Calvary. Just immediately around Him were His mother and His mother's sister Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene, beside whom was one other who was not ashamed to be found amongst the women, or by the side of his crucified Lord—it was the disciple whom Jesus loved. These had no eyes for any other than Him, no thoughts, no words for others. Are we to be found amongst them? Farther away a group of disciples and of women may be seen, but standing "afar off." Alas! with them the world was not crucified, nor they unto the world, by the cross of Jesus (Gal. 6: 14). And they are representatives of too large a number of His followers. Such as have been saved by Him, taught by Him, healed by Him, loved by Him, but who have not learned to "suffer with Him."

There were around the cross those who mocked at Him; there were the soldiers. Both classes were against Jesus, even as now there are those who do evil with the fullest intention of doing it, while others allow themselves to be led into it for earthly gain, ignoring their own responsibility.

Finally, we have the glimpses of our Lord's resurrection life on earth in the walk to Emmaus, and in the last words of our blessed Lord in Luke 24. And how large a proportion of these last words is taken up with His instruction in the Scriptures! In order to be witnesses for Him throughout the world, His disciples needed then, and we need now, an understanding heart to understand all that is written of Him.

MAN AND HIS MASTERS.

An Oration by J. B. Gough.

Man Created a Noble Being—His Sublime Capacities—Slaves Sold for Alabama—The Blessing of Freedom and of a Sound Intellect—The Tyrant Master, Strong Drink—What the Drunkard Barters Away—The Livery of the Drunkard—He Incurs Physical Suffering—A Lunatic's Experience—Horrors of Delirium Tremens—Sad Cases of Mania for Drink—He incurs the Scorn of his Fellows and Self-Contempt—His Memory a Source of Misery.

THE subject of "Man and his Masters" is one that seems to open before us a mine of thought, and I hardly know where to begin or what to say. I have not come before you to give you a literary entertainment or an intellectual feast. I have come before you to say something, if I may be able, God helping me, to inspire the young men present with some higher idea of the dignity of their manhood than they had when they came into the house.

"Man and his Masters!" What is man as God has made him—the Triune God—giving him a body fearfully and wonderfully made, and which He alone can purify, till it shall be the fit temple for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit; a mind capable of appreciating the greatness of the infinite God in the atoms through the microscope, and in the rolling worlds through the telescope; and a soul capable of loving Him, "and with the strong wings of faith and love building its nest under the very eaves of heaven!"

Man, standing up in the godlike attitude of a man, lifting his forehead to the stars—to whom power and dominion have been given—who has been crowned nature's king; man, with the faculty of looking right up into the heavens; man, with a destiny set before him vast as eternity and large as infinity; man, glorious in the image of God, what is he, fallen and debased as he is by sin?

As he stands upright, in the freedom and the dignity of his manhood, he is a glorious being, but "little lower than the angels;" but, in the weakness of his humanity, he is exposed to influences which may debase him below the level of the brute creation. The very gifts and endowments which dignify his nature may be the sources of his degradation. Man, glorious man, may live only as a minister of evil. Man, born for immortality, may find his end in "the blackness of darkness forever."

Then we contemplate, if you please, man and his masters. And in the whole history of the world, how have we seen man, glorious man, debasing himself to servitude! What servitude! We pity the abject beings who are reduced to slavery by the power of a master: oh! how we pity them! How the flood of our sympathy seems to pour forth in behalf of the down-trodden and oppressed!

I remember how my heart ached, in going down the James River, and seeing a company of men—yes, men, but made chattels by man's agency—as they clustered together on the forward deck of the canal-boat. They were singing in a low tone, and I came up near them. It was one of the negro refrains. One of them said, "Whar we going? Whar we going?" The other said, "Ah! we're sold, we're sold, and we're going away to Alabama;" and my eyes filled with tears as I looked upon them, debased and degraded by slavery, ay, the slavery of a master.

And when you hear of the wild free spirit of such an one that will not be tamed,—when you hear of the man bursting his shackles, and through trial and misfortune, and pain, and anguish, hunted, bayed at, persecuted, peeled, standing up again free from the fetters which have galled him, when he once reaches a free shore—how your heart exults with gladness, and how you are ready to clap your hands with the true and rare enjoyment you feel in seeing a man lifting himself up from the degradation of the foot that has pressed him in the earth, and standing up as God made him, a free man!

Ah! yes, physical slavery is something to be dreaded. The children of Israel in the land of Egypt were slaves; in Babylon they were slaves; but there was a vast difference,—in Egypt they were sold, in Babylon they had sold themselves, and there is a vast difference in the two. The man may be bought and sold in the market by his brother man, and reduced to abject bondage, even having no will of his own; but he who is bound by the cords of his sins, he who has sold himself for naught, is in a more pitiable condition far; and it is this slavery that I would speak upon to-night.

And how many, many masters has man made for himself! and to how many masters has he subjected himself, bowing down before them and worshipping them! Oh! the slavery of the man who has lifted up his hands that the wreath might be entwined round his wrists, and the band of flowers round his brow, and who has, by and by, found these flowers twined round rusty iron bands, that have eaten into the marrow and burnt out his brain, till his wreath of honor has become a band of everlasting infamy, and he lifts up his galled, shackled hands to heaven, and cries, "Who shall deliver me from this horrible slavery?"

Oh! the slavery of evil passion. What is it? Go, if you please, into a lunatic asylum and see one man picking an imaginary thing from the sleeve of his coat, hour after hour; another gazing listlessly upon nothing, another, with lack-lustre eye and retreating brow, telling the story of complete idiocy. If you have witnessed such a sight as that, you will feel, if you are in the habit of thanking God for His mercies night and morning, the first thought that rises in your heart and finds utterance upon your tongue to be, "I thank Thee, O my Father, that Thou hast made me a man with reasoning powers, that Thou hast given me an intellect, that Thou hast given me reason, that Thou hast given me light, that Thou hast made me what I am."

You walk over God's beautiful earth, and feel it is a magnificent thing to "look through nature up to nature's God;" and you look at the idiot, you look at the insane, and feel it is terrible that the light of reason should be extinguished, and that a crushing power should rest upon the intellect—paralyzing it. What is it the mother speaks of when she speaks of her boy? Does she speak of his bright eyes, and rosy cheeks, and pearly teeth, and ruby lips, and rounded limb? No. If she is an intelligent mother she will tell you what the boy knows, how he imitates, how he understands.

It is the budding of the mind that she loves to discover in the child, scintillations which tell that intellect is being developed. What if she were to dream her child in his cradle were to be an idiot, would it be any compensation, think you, to know that he would grow up in all the wondrous beauty of an Antinous, or the glorious proportions of an Apollo? What is it that makes the man? The mind! And when the man brings that mind down into abject slavery and bondage to an evil passion, how much more pitiable is he than he upon whose head God has laid His hand, and in His providence deprived of the wonderful power of unimpaired reason that you possess?

OH! it is pitiful, it is pitiful, the appetite for intoxicating liquor, when it becomes a master-passion; one of the most fearful that man was ever subject to. It is so among the high as well as the low, as we call them, and the illiterate—those whose first words they heard were words of blasphemy, whose first words they uttered were words of cursing; it holds the man a slave who stands in front of the counter, and pleads for drink.

"Give me drink! I will give you my hard earnings for it. Give me drink! I will pay for it. I will give you more than that. I married a wife; I took her from her girlhood's home, and promised to love her, and cherish her, and protect her—ah! ah! and I have driven her out to work for me, and I have stolen her wages, and I have brought them to you—give me drink, and I will give you them. More yet: I have snatched the bit of bread from the white lips of my famished child—I will give you that if you will give me drink. More yet: I will give you my health. More yet: I will give you my manliness. More yet: I will give you my hopes of heaven—body and soul; I will barter jewels worth all the kingdoms of the earth—for 'what will a man give in exchange for his soul?'—for a dram. Give it me!"

THE LIVERY OF DRUNKENNESS.

As one man said to me, not a week ago: "I felt under the power of the appetite, as the rich man in hell must have felt when he longed for the drop of water; I longed for the stimulating influences upon my system, until I shrieked in my agony." Not only among these, but among others. Oh! what a pitiful sight it is to see men who have fallen from positions of respectability into this fearful debasing habit! Have you ever seen them? I have—clinging, as with a death-grip, to the last remnants of their respectability.

You see them, perhaps, going through your streets in the faded black coat, well inked at the seams, buttoned up close in the neck, to hide the paucity of the nether-garment—with perhaps an old rusty pair of gloves, and a couple of inches of wrist between the tops of the glove and the cuffs of the once fashionable coat—the trousers positively shining with old age—the last penny that can be spared from the drink expended in blacking for the miserable boots—the hat so dilapidated, broken, and greasy, that they go into mock-mourning and hide it with crape, and walk through the streets miserable slaves to a habit which has stripped them of every thing worth having under heaven.

The livery of their master has become to them like a garment of burning poison, eating up all that is bright, and green, and beautiful about them. And when we consider what slaves to this appetite have been called upon, and are called upon, continually to endure, we shall have some idea of the mighty power of its influence. The intemperate man, it seems to me, is above all others a suffering man: cramps and pains rack his bones; his physical suffering can scarcely be comprehended—it cannot be described; and yet, with his eyes wide open—knowing the cause that produces the effect—he will clutch his bloated fingers round the cup, and raise it to his blistered lips, and drink it, though he knows that every drop of it is like another nail driven and clinched in his coffin.

HIS PHYSICAL SUFFERING.

The physical suffering of the intemperate man—you must excuse me, young men, if I speak of it. Many years of my life have been spent in visiting homes of wretchedness, and talking with victims of vice. I have held the swollen, hot smooth hand of the intemperate man in mine; I have looked him in his face; I have pleaded with him to give up the drink. I have stood by the bedside of one who, having wrecked all the hope of his friends, was dying in agony, and who knew, every step of his way down to his death that he was taking rapid strides to a fearfu eternity. It is pitiful when [illegible]e look upon such an one; and you must excuse me, then, I say, i I speak of such sufferings, to show you the terrible power of the master-passion, when it reduces the man to abject slavery.

Did you ever see any man in that most fearfu of all diseases, delirium tremens? Did you eve see him beat his clinched fists, and bite his lips Did you ever see him with his eyes as if the would start from the socket; with the beade drops standing out upon his brow; rolling, ar shrieking, and cursing in his agony? What that? Is it caused by physical pain? Is caused by the cramps that rack the bones? N it is caused by the terrific disease that only intemperance will produce upon a man—delirium tremens, trembling madness, mania a potu; and, G pity them, there are men dying from the age twenty up to fifty to-day, raving mad under influence.

And when I look upon it in the light of a ther world, and when I look upon it in my reospective view of the past, I feel as if I could rostrate myself before God, and pray that He ould give me a voice like thunder, that I might ng in the ears of the young men of this city and verywhere, "Look not upon the wine when it red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when moveth itself aright," for "at the last it teth like a serpent, and stingeth like an ader." And yet, to show the power of this pas-on, what does all this suffering avail? You see man enduring all this agony; and that I may, possible, give you some idea of it, I would say, at while it is a species of insanity, there are peculiarities about it.

A LUNATIC'S EXPERIENCE.

I conversed with an individual who had been onfined in a lunatic asylum for two years. I sked him what he remembered. "Nothing ut an indistinct recollection of something, I ardly know what." And when he was released e was astonished to find he had been there two ears. Now, let a man endure this disease, and t is burnt into his brain, stamped upon his nemory—he will never forget it—never, long as e may live. And there is another peculiarity. You see that man startled at visions that seem o rise up before him. There is the terrible gony! He pleads with you: "Wipe out that ace; drive out that horrible thing that sits grinning in mockery at my agony!" There is nothng there: you know it, and (horrible thought!) e knows it too. If it was a palpable object beore him he could battle it.

If in your room at night, with heavy foot-fall, ome fearful thing should come into that apartment, you see it, you feel its hot breath, you know there is a living thing there—something you can fight; you arm yourself, and into the struggle you walk, and every blow you strike it does you good; you feel as if you had something to strike, something to battle with. But suppose again that fearful thing comes into your apartment, with maliciously gleaming eyes fixed upon you; you look upon it, and the terrible conviction fills your whole frame with horror—there s nothing there!

You go to it to wipe it away; your hand goes through it, and it is there again, gibing, mowing, gibbering. Then it assumes the appearance of a man's face, with such a diabolical expression that you never dreamed you could have looked upon it and lived. There it is before you; you cannot fight that, you cannot struggle with that; it is a phantom of your imagination there, as if in palpable reality.

I knew a man who was startled with a face peering out at him from the wall; he went to it and wiped it out, and stood back again, and still it was there; he went up to it again and wiped it out, and stood back—it was there yet. His very hair seemed to stand with horror as he went up to it, and with a terrible blow of his fist struck the wall and left it marked with blood. He stood back again—it was there; he went and beat, and beat, and beat, till he had broken the bones of his hand with beating out that which was palpable to him; and yet he was conscious, and the consciousness thrilled through his frame with horror, that it was but a phantom of his imagination.

Let a man suffer that six days and six nights, let the physician sit by his side, and tell him, "Now, sir, if you drink again you will suffer it again." "But, doctor, I will never drink again; doctor, the thought is too horrible; I shall never suffer it, for I will never take drink again." And once more healthy blood courses in that man's veins, and in the emphatic language of Scripture he "seeks it yet again;" and again he is brought down, again he endures it all, again the physician sits by his side. "You remember that which I told you." "Yes." "If you drink again you will have it again, and do not send for me, for you will die; your constitution will never endure another such struggle; you will die." "Doctor, I will never drink it again."

And yet he rises from his couch of agony, "seeks it yet again," and again he is brought down; and his poor shrieking spirit flies in disgust into eternity from the loathsome carcass that he has made of the glorious body "so fearfully and wonderfully made" by his God. He knew all the way along it must be so. Such is the terrible slavery of intemperance.

SAD CASES OF THE POWER OF THE DRINK.

With drink, on some temperaments, one glass will mount to the brain instantly, weakening the power of will, affecting the self-control, and the man is not the same. The appetite being then roused, takes hold of him and drags him down in its fearful embrace. The only safety for such a man is total abstinence; and to a man who has been a victim, bound by the cords of this fierce desire, it will be a life-struggle, when at times the old appetite comes over him like a wave. Let him do any thing but drink, let him even run,—it is not cowardly to run.

I knew a man who was strongly tempted, and escaped. He was a printer, and working near a window opposite which was the "Shades," he saw persons coming out wiping their lips, having taken their "eleven o'clock." He began to want it, and grew nervous; the desire increased; every fibre of his system seemed to cry out for it, when he dropped his form of type; and, in his vexation at the accident, took off his apron, put on his coat, with the intention of getting a drink; when, as he said, he thought of wife and children, of former ruin and disgrace, and present prosperity and reputation, and rushed out, and ran hatless through the streets till he reached home.

"Wife, shut me up! for mercy's sake, shut me up, and don't let me out. Ask no questions, but shut me up!"

She was a wise wife, and locked him in a room, and there he remained for thirty hours before he dare venture out to his work again.

A lawyer who had been intemperate told me, "I have been obliged to forego all light literature. I can hardly read a newspaper." "Why?" I replied.

"I have not tasted drink for two years, but if I only read of drinking I want it. I have paced my office with hands clinched, and the sweat standing in beads on my forehead, as I battled the horrible desire to get drink when I have read of a man drinking a glass of wine."

Another gentleman told me that he had not drank for twenty-eight years; but, said he, "I have some fifty men working for me, and when I take the breath of a man who has been drinking I want it—yes, sometimes want it so that I have ridden ten miles on horseback to rid myself of the desire that seemed to cry through my whole system, Give! give! when I have taken the breath of a man who has been drinking."

HE INCURS THE SCORN OF HIS FELLOWS AND SELF-CONTEMPT.

The intemperate man endures more than physical suffering—he has to endure the scorn and contempt of his fellow-men. Ah! the slow-moving finger of scorn stings the heart sometimes like a burning brand pressed into the quivering flesh; the scorn and contempt of your fellows is hard to bear. You find it so. It is very pleasant to be respected; it is very pleasant, for a young man especially, to walk through the streets and meet those who recognize him as an acquaintance.

One of you young gentlemen meets a lady in the street; she receives your salutation with a very polite bow. Why, some of you walk about two inches taller than you did before. There is something pleasant in being respected. Now, the very loss of that respect is a bitter thing; and the result of it upon a man that is unrenewed and unsanctified by the grace of God is to induce him to lift up his hand against others, because he believes that the hand of others is lifted against him.

But the slave to intemperance has more yet to endure. The scorn and contempt of your fellows is easy to bear compared with the load of scorn and contempt you seem to be burdened with for yourself. When a man disgusts himself, when a man loathes himself, when a man feels a creeping of abhorrence for himself, when it seems as if he had bound a livid corpse to his breathing body, face to face, foot to foot, hand to hand, heart to heart, one beating with life and the other rotting with putrefaction, but face to face with him always—it is a horrible thing: and there is not an intemperate man in the land except when soul and senses are steeped in the drink, but whose better nature revolts at the fearful degradation he has brought upon himself.

HIS MEMORY BECOMES A SOURCE OF MISERY.

And then, again, the slave to intemperance seems as if he had thwarted all the designs of the Almighty. What is his memory? Memory to us is pleasant; the remembrance of the past is pleasant—ah! yes, though it may be a remembrance connected with sorrow, and suffering, and pain and anguish, though it may be the remembrance of a fearful contest; yet the remembrance of that conflict and its after triumph is pleasant. As the shipwrecked mariner, seated by his own hearth, recounts his toils and trials, tells of the wreck at sea, tells of his clinging to the spar, tells of the gnawing of hunger and the fearful fever of thirst, he tells it all with satisfaction; for it is a trial passed away; it is the recounting of a conflict that is ended.

Memory, unconnected with sin, is like the painter's studio—the light shining into it from above—full of pleasant pictures. But the memory of the slave to intemperance, what is it? what is it? He is like an instrument all out of tune; every string when touched jars through every nerve in his system—and with a love for purest harmony he would fain stand so alone that not the very winds of the morning should touch those chords, lest they should vibrate with horrible discord. And by his side stands a performer. She is a weird sister; her name is Memory; and she strikes every chord with her fingers, and she knows how to strike, jarring through him with terrible discord, and making him mad; and he hates to remember, because the past has been pleasant, while the present is a fearful settling down under a storm of curse that his own evil passions have brewed for him.

A THEATRICAL TEA-MEETING IN LONDON.

It was a happy inspiration which first moved Mr. W. Forbes to invite to a friendly tea a number of the young people engaged at the London theatres as dancers, choristers, dressers, etc. We used to think that everybody connected with a theatre was almost beyond the pale of Christian effort; and, as a matter of fact, scarcely any one seemed to care for their souls. All that, however, has gone by, and the reproach of neglect cannot now be sustained. This movement, inaugurated some months ago by Mr. Forbes, is, of course, still on a small scale, when we think of the immense number of young women employed at theatres throughout London. But there were some 130 who responded to the invitation issued for Thursday evening last, and there is every sign that the numbers will increase rather than diminish.

On these occasions tea is laid in the Lower Room of Exeter Hall by half-past four. On Thursday evening the cheering cup, with its substantial accompaniments, was evidently appreciated and enjoyed. No wonder, when many of these young people had just come from a five-hours' rehearsal at the Alhambra Theatre and Covent Garden. After the tea there was some singing, and it was really a treat to hear such a hymn as "The Sweet By-and-by" heartily sung by these fresh, and in many cases trained. young voices. We were gratified to notice that no one attempted to leave at the close of the repast, but all instinctively took their places on the rearranged seats, as if they anticipated with interest the more serious part of the evening's work. The tea, of course, is only a means to an end; the great object of the gatherings is to set before the guests that Bread which is the Life of the World, that Water of which if any one drink he will never thirst.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Princess Alice of England, the second daughter of Queen Victoria, died of diphtheria on Saturday December, 14th. She was a general favorite in London society, and her death will be widely and sincerely mourned. She was born in 1843, and as a child was remarkable for her beauty and the amiability of her disposition. When her father, Prince Albert, was attacked by the illness which proved fatal to him, she nursed him with a tenderness and devotion rarely equalled, and to the last, remained in constant attendance at his bedside. It is a remarkable coincidence that her own death should have occurred on the same day of the month and week as that of her lamented father seventeen years ago. In 1862 she was married to Prince Louis of Hesse-Darmstadt, and the union is said to have been a very happy one. She was the mother of seven children, one of whom was accidentally killed by a fall from a window in 1873, and another died last month from the disease which has now proved fatal to herself. The position of Prince Louis was not such as to necessitate his residence in Germany, and accordingly much of the Princess's married life has been spent in England. The young couple had a villa residence in the Isle of Wight, and there, in the near neighborhood of Osborne, the Queen's favorite residence, she was able to be a companion to her royal mother and do much to alleviate the despondency and gloom which since the death of Prince Albert has encompassed her.

It seems extraordinary that the death of the Princess Alice and her daughter, the death of Prince Albert, and the illness that so nearly proved fatal to the Prince of Wales, should have arisen from causes which are ranked amongst the preventible ills that afflict the human race. Both diphtheria and typhoid fever are considered to be the result of living in places where the drainage is imperfect or neglected altogether. It would seem that if the laws of health could be observed perfectly in any station it would be among those so highly placed as the royal family of England; yet here we find them suffering from maladies which infest the filthiest and most crowded dens of city life. The cause is said to be, that the palaces inhabited by these royal personages are ancient edifices, erected at a time when sanitary laws were ignored by architests and builders.

Death levels all ranks alike, and strikes with indifference the highest and the lowest in the strata of society. We can only pray that the potentates of the earth may learn that, and the parallel lesson, that one divine Saviour has died for all men, and the entrance to eternal life is the same, with the same conditions, for the prince as the pauper.

The English campaign of Afghanistan is still attended with success, and a rumor is circulated, but at present needing confirmation, that the Ameer is suing for peace. The inhabitants and notables of Jelalabad, an important city on the line of the British advance, have sought to propitiate the invaders by tendering their submission and services. The British general is busy making roads and fortifying weak points in his rear, and reports that he receives the assistance of the natives, who are generally friendly to him.

It seems probable under these circumstances the [illegible] will be reached without much difficulty, and the whole of Afghanistan reduced to submission. The questions which will then come up for decision will be of a delicate character, involving British relations with a more formidable antagonist in the person of the Emperor of Russia. The quarrel arose from jealousy of Russia, and the complaint against the Ameer was, that he received a Russian embassy and declined one from England. If the Ameer is overcome, will Britain annex his territory, or leave him a nominal sovereignty under British tutelage? Neither position is one acceptable to Russia. Anyhow the quarrel can scarcely be concluded without hurting Russian susceptibilities, if not provoking a Russian war. The observations of Sir Stafford Northcote tend to excite apprehension on this point, for he said "England could not acquiesce in Russian interference in Afghanistan in any form"—a mode of expression having a strong taint of arrogant bluster, not likely to be palatable to so powerful a state as Russia.

The debate in the English Parliament on the Afghan policy of the government has ended, as was anticipated, in a vote of confidence in Lord Beaconsfield and his colleagues. The majority was much greater than was expected; it amounted to 101 votes, while the Liberal organs had predicted that it would not exceed 70. This result has demonstrated the emptiness of Lord Lawrence's demand for the summoning of Parliament, and has shown how solid are the Conservative ranks and how disorganized is the whole Liberal party. The position of Liberals in England is a very strange one. In the last Parliament they had a large majority, and the name of Gladstone was a tower of strength in the country. At the next general election this state of parties was decisively reversed, and Lord Beaconsfield was carried into power by a large and compact majority. Since then, amid great turmoil and anxiety on questions of foreign policy, he has maintained if he has not consolidated his position, and the Liberal party has become more and more disorganized. They have a nominal leader who does not lead, and an ex-leader whose actions serve only to divide the ranks he was wont to lead.

A general election must, according to the constitution, soon take place, and it will then be seen whether "the great lubber"—as Lord Beaconsfield in his young days irreverently nicknamed the British Public—will indorse the decision of the last election, or will place the reins of power in the hands of the Liberals. At present there are no indications sufficiently decided to show which will be the issue.

The German Anti-Socialist Law is being put in force with extreme severity. Since its promulgation, 102 societies, 28 newspapers, and 88 books and pamphlets have been prohibited. In Northern Germany there is but one journal of Socialist proclivities left, in Central and Southern Germany there still remain eleven. All these have changed their names since the new law, and try to conceal their bias as much as possible.

The German Government have also issued an order that persons from whom danger to public safety is apprehended may be refused the right to reside in the city of Berlin and other German towns. The carrying of all kinds of arms, as well as the possession of them, and the sale of explosive projectiles, is also prohibited. A volcanic explosion of revolutionism cannot, however, be long averted.

A Fatal Collision on the Mersey, near Liverpool, took place on the morning of Tuesday, November 26th,—a dense fog prevailing at the time,—between a Seacombe ferryboat, the Gem, proceeding to Liverpool, and a ship named the Bowfell, at anchor in the river. A scene of indescribable confusion and panic ensued amongst the passengers, which was intensified by an idea that the steamer was sinking under them. Those who were in the cabin rushed on to the deck; many made a rush up the bows of the Bowfell, frantically clutching at every rope and spar that they could lay hold of in the attempt to save their lives; whilst one or two gentlemen, losing all self-control, actually leapt into the river and were almost immediately lost to sight. In the crush to the side of the Gem some persons were pushed over into the water. The steamer was as quickly as possible brought to a standstill, and efforts were made to rescue the drowning by life-buoys, etc., but owing to the fog it was difficult to render any assistance or to effect a rescue. The ladies were more composed than the gentlemen, and were uninjured. Six corpses have been found, but fourteen persons are still missing and it is feared, are not alive.

Mrs. M. Baxter writes from Stuttgart, she is preaching in German: "W blessed experience the last week of those words, 'To the poor the preached.' It has been our endea those who are ashamed from want to go into any church or other meet who from long habit do not atten worship, and God has been plea rc bless our efforts. Many who wer o. streets, the houses of the poc in markets, have come and continue. ry ev ing. One poor woman said to me, ce has forgiven me all my sins, I am always in peace, although my bed and bed-clothing, my dress and all I possess, are in the pawnshop on account of my husband's illness and my own. It is now that I see how great a sinner I am.' Another, who was not poor, but utterly ungodly, told me that, previously, she used to spend her evenings in the theatre when she could leave her shop, and she had no idea that the Word of God was so precious; now she is longing for the souls of her husband and children. This is a ver blessed case; her whole face is changed in it expression, and she is never absent from th meetings. Many of the women are most anxiou about their husbands' souls since they themselves have found peace with God, and some o our friends who help in the meetings are visitin them in their houses. I know that many o our readers bear us up in prayer. Pray als for the godly pastors of this city, whos churches are crowded, and for the converte men who do much good among the sick, an also for the deaconesses, whose unremittin attentions to the bodily necessities of the sic are most praiseworthy."

The Opium Traffic.—Dr. Legge, the missionary to China, said at the recent Missions Confe ence at Mildmay Park, London, England: " called on the Chinese Ambassador soon after h arrival in England. His Excellency said, 'Yc know China and England: which do you thir is the best?' I said, 'England.' 'Well,' said, 'England is the cleaner; you have fi streets, and better engineering, but look at the from the moral standpoint, and then say which I said still, 'England.' I never saw a man loc more surprised; at last he said, 'If England the better, why do you force on us opium? take this opportunity of expressing my de sorrow that the character of England should so compromised in China by this opium traff When I read of recent atrocities, I felt that Er land had no right to cast a stone at Turkey long as this traffic continued. I have no p posal to make as to how the revenue deriv from opium is to be gained otherwise. I content to address to the British Governm the message of Isaiah to the men of Judah a Jerusalem: 'Cease to do evil; learn to well.'"

Burial of George Cruikshank in St. Paul's thedral.—On Friday afternoon, November the remains of this distinguished artist were moved from Kensal Green Cemetery to Paul's Cathedral in London. In complia with a generally-expressed public wish, the D of St. Paul's gave his consent to the buria the Cathedral immediately after the death of George Cruikshank, but owing to repairs wh were in progress in the crypt the reception of remains was deferred until Friday last. ceremony of removal was of the simplest k (under the direction of Mr. Garstin). The cc containing the remains was brought in a hea and on reaching the well-known residence in Hampstead Road, at four o'clock, after stayi short time the widow, Mrs. George Cruiksh entered a mourning coach and followed. sergeants of the volunteer corps of which deceased artist was formerly lieutenant-colc who had followed his funeral to the Kensal G Cemetery, joined the procession, which rea the Cathedral at half-past five o'clock, and coffin was lowered into the place assigned immediately after the afternoon service.

BAYARD TAYLOR, Journalist, Traveller, Ambassador.

MR. BAYARD TAYLOR.

Journalist—Traveller—Ambassador.

IN the death of Mr. Bayard Taylor, every citizen of the Republic seems to have sustained a personal loss. It is not that a brave and true man has dropped out of the ranks of the army of progress, though our bereavement includes that, too; but we feel that we have lost a personal friend. Mr. Taylor had become, through his works, one of our chosen companions, and one of the chattiest and most genial of companions. We could take down from the shelf one of his volumes, and—presto! the room vanishes, and we are thousands of miles away, tramping along by his side through strange lands, out of ordinary guide-book routes, and meeting something novel and instructive every minute. He has gone; and though we may roam along the old highways over again, we are sadly conscious, as we read, that the termination is fixed and the last journey has been taken. He has gone to that bourne whence no traveller returns. The hand that has led us in imagination through scenes of historical, and hallowed interest lies cold in death; and the voice that was wont in cheerful, modest accents, to describe his strange and romantic adventures is silent in the grave. No wonder that a genuine feeling of personal bereavement has been spread over the nation by the sad intelligence.

The following details of Mr. Taylor's eventful life, collected from information furnished by friends, from his works, and from the obituary notices in the New York Tribune and Herald, will be of interest to our readers:

James Bayard Taylor (he relinquished his first name after he became a regular newspaper writer) was born upon a country farm at Kennett Square, Chester County, Pa., January 11th, 1825. His parents, who are both living, and recently celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of their marriage, are descended from the earliest settlers of Pennsylvania, and are persons of note in the quiet township where they have always lived.

The future traveller received the usual advantages of a common-school education, and, like so many other men of eminence, obtained his first impulse to a literary career through his connection with the press. At the age of seventeen years he was regularly apprenticed in a newspaper printing-office in West Chester, and employed his leisure in the study of Latin and French. His first published compositions were verses which he wrote for the columns of the newspaper in question, and were probably "set up" by his own hand.

The approval of his friends soon induced him to send specimens of his poetic skill to the two recognized autocrats of American criticism, Nathaniel P. Willis and Rufus Wilmot Griswold, then respectively conducting the New York Mirror and Graham's Magazine. They were well received, both by those gentlemen and by the reading public in the columns of those periodicals, and others of his compositions were accepted by more than one of the metropolitan newspapers. In 1844 he collected his scattered verses into a small volume entitled "Ximena; or, The Battle of the Sierra Morena, and Other Poems," which is now one of the scarcest of modern American books.

One of his objects in this early appearance as an author was to gain a sufficient status in literature to procure him an engagement as correspondent for some prominent journal during a tour in Europe which he was eagerly planning, although the expenses had yet to be provided. This was a bold project for a youth of nineteen, but it succeeded in every respect. His local fame in Chester County easily reached the city of Philadelphia, where his book had been printed, and he obtained from Mr. Joseph R. Chandler of the United States Gazette, and Mr. Patterson of the Saturday Evening Post, an advance of $100 for letters to be written from Europe. This sum, with the addition of $40 received from Graham's Magazine for some accepted poems, was enough to pay his passage and his expenses for a few weeks abroad, and he was encouraged by Horace Greeley, who promised to pay for such letters as should prove readable.

With this $140 he set out on

HIS FIRST JOURNEY

July 1st, 1844, and did not return for two years.

During that period he regularly corresponded with his friends in New York, and contributed, as he had undertaken to do with the Tribune and other publications. His letters were, as he tells us, written during his wanderings,—"partly by the wayside when resting at mid-day, and partly on the rough tables of peasant inns, in the stillness of deserted ruins, or amid the sublime solitude of the mountain-top." Such letters from such a pen were, it is needless to say, eagerly read.

His object in setting out he thus states: "It was not simply the desire for a roving life which impelled me; it was the wish to become acquainted with other languages and other races; to behold the wonders of classic and mediæval art; to look upon renowned landscapes and feel the magic of grand historical associations; in short, to educate myself more completely and variously than my situation and circumstances enabled me to do at home."

He was accompanied by his cousin, Dr. Frank Taylor, and Mr. Barclay Pennock, author of "Religion of the Northmen;" and the plan of the trio of friends was to spend a year or a year and a half in wandering over Europe, and especially exploring Germany—a land whose language and literature even at that age had a great charm for him, which lasted and increased through the remainder of his life.

A steerage passage across the Atlantic in a sailing vessel was in those days a dreary experience; but his high spirits and exultant pleasure in the near realization of his boyhood's dreams made light of privations, and gave a rose-colored tint even to the steerage.

At last, the voyage over, he landed at Liverpool, and having some time to spare, went to Londonderry to have "just a sight" of Irish soil. From there he went to Scotland, where he was enchanted with the scenery of the lakes. Thence by steamer to London, where he spent a week exploring the historic scenes of England's metropolis. Here, with the true literary instinct, he was not attracted by the theatres, or the royal palaces, or general show sights of the city, but made haste to that mausoleum of the great, the wise, and the good of past centuries of English life,

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Here his enthusiasm was kindled afresh. He wrote:

"We approached by the general entrance, Poet's Corner. I hardly stopped to look at the elaborate exterior of Henry VII.'s Chapel, but passed on to the door. On entering, the first thing that met my eyes were the words, 'O RARE BEN JONSON,' under his bust. Near by stood the monuments of Spenser and Gay, and a few paces further looked down the sublime countenance of Milton. Never was a spot so full of intense interest. The light was just dim enough to give it a solemn, religious air, making the marble forms of poets and philosophers so shadowy and impressive that I felt as if standing in their living presence. Every step called up some mind linked with the associations of my childhood. There was the gentle feminine countenance of Thomson, and the majestic head of Dryden; Addison with his classic features, and Gray, full of the fire of lofty thought. In another chamber I paused long before the tablet to Shakspeare; and while looking at the monument of Garrick, started to find that I stood upon his grave. What a glorious galaxy of genius is here collected—what a constellation of stars whose light is immortal! The mind is fettered by their spirit, every thing is forgotten but the mighty dead, who still 'rule us from their urns.'

"How can I convey an idea of the scene! Notwithstanding all the descriptions I have read, I was totally unprepared for the reality, nor could I have anticipated the hushed and breathless interest with which I paced the dim aisles, gazing, at every step, on the last resting-place of some great and familiar name. A place so sacred to all who inherit the English tongue is worthy of a special pilgrimage across the deep. So far does any description fall short of the scene itself, that if I thought it would induce a few of our wealthy idlers, or even those who, like myself, must travel with toil and privation, to come hither, I would write till the pen dropped from my hand."

The party lodged during their stay in London at a cheap lodging-house at the east end, and conducted all their explorations with the strictest regard to economy. That they must have done so is clear from the fact that up to the time of leaving London from the day of departure from New York their expenses amounted t only $25 each.

From London the party proceeded to Belgium, and then on to the country on which Mr Taylor had centred his expectations.

GERMANY.

Here a halt was proclaimed, and at Heidelberg a stay of one month was made for study o the language and literature. Mr. Taylor labore here with great assiduity, and made rapid prog ress, keeping up at the same time a regular co respondence with the journals at home. H descriptions of student life are full of interes and he appears to have entered with genuin abandon into its labors and pleasures.

From Germany Mr. Taylor proceeded to e plore Switzerland and the Tyrol. He climbed th Alps, and his emotions at the sight of that glo ous range may be imagined. His description very graphic, but want of space precludes its i sertion here.

Florence, with its matchless art galleries, fill him with delight, and he would gladly have e tended his stay there had it been possible.

A monetary difficulty occurred here mo amusing to read of than to experience. Th members of the party had gone to Leghorn get a draft cashed by a banker there, and M Taylor waited behind at Florence; during th absence he made the acquaintance of

THE WOLF—HUNGER.

"They were to be absent three or four da s, and had left me money enough to live upo n the meantime, but the next morning our bill or washing came in, and consumed nearly the wh le of it. I had about four crazie (three cent s a day left for my meals, and by spending on of these for bread, and the remainder for ripe f of which one crazie will purchase fifteen or twenty, and roasted chestnuts, I manage to make a diminutive breakfast and dinner, ut was careful not to take much exercise, on c count of the increase of hunger. As it p pened, my friends remained two days lo ger than I had expected, and the last two craz had were expended for one day's provision I then decided to try the next day without ny thing, and actually felt a curiosity to know hat one's sensations would be, on experiencing wo or three days of starvation. I knew that i he feeling should become insupportable, I c ld easily walk out to the mountain of Fie le, where a fine fig orchard shades the old Ro an amphitheatre. But the experiment was br ken off in its commencement, by the arrival o the absent ones, in the middle of the following r ht. Such is the weaknes of human nature, th on finding I should not want for breakfast, I ose from bed, and ate the two or three remainin figs which, by a strong exertion, I had saved fro the scanty allowance of the day. I began to e eri ence a powerful feeling of weakness and va ity and my breakfast the next day—the most de cious meal I ever ate—cost me at least ten c ts

Leaving Florence he passed on to Ro e city he had long eagerly desired to visit r its historical associations. He wrote:

"One day's walk through Rome—ho hall I describe it? The Capitol, the Foru St eter's, the Coliseum—what few hours' ramble ver took in places so hallowed by poetry, history, and art? It was a golden leaf in my calendar of life."

After a stay all too short in the city of the Seven Hills, he embarked for Marseilles, and so n to Paris.

In Paris, Mr. Taylor, still bent on making the most of his pecuniary resources, managed to ve on twenty cents a day and gave a cheerful count of the result. A walk through Normandy brought him to the coast, whence he embarked for London.

In London he endeavored to procure work as compositor, but though he had strong letters recommendation to leading firms there who ere willing to employ him, he was unable to nter their offices owing to the operation of the ules of the Trades-Unions. He wrote: "I was bliged to walk the raw, misty thoroughfares for hree hours before I could find the master-printers n their offices. I called on the third and last rinter addressed by Mr. Willis, who gave me the ame answer, but referred me to another estabshment, where he thought I might be accepted. went thither, and after some conversation with he foreman, was told I might go to work. I ook off my coat, rolled up my sleeves, and was etting a case in order, when I noticed that the orkmen, of whom there were a number, were ooking at me and whispering among themselves. resently the foreman came up to me and said: I am very sorry but you can't work here. The men won't allow it, because you cannot show that you have served the usual term of apprenceship.' I thereupon put on my coat and went nto the street again, and that was all the typesetting I ever did in Europe."

Mr. Taylor remained some short time in Lonon and made many hearty and sincere friends n that city. But he had been away from home wo years and was now anxious to return. He ailed in the Victoria, April 27th, 1846, and after hirty-seven days tossing on the Atlantic landed afely on these shores.

On his return to America he had little trouble n arranging his materials into a volume, which was published in December, 1846, at New York, nder the title "Views a-Foot; or, Europe Seen with Knapsack and Staff." The volume had an mmediate success, receiving the heartiest praise ot only from R. W. Griswold, but from that terner censor, the London Athenæum. It passed hrough a dozen editions.

For a year after his return Mr. Taylor edited nd published a country paper at Phœnixville, Pa., with an unsatisfactory pecuniary result. In 847 he came to New York to seek his fortune y literature, and a number of his sketches and oems were accepted by the Literary World, which, under the management of the late Evert A. Duyckinck, was then the leading critical journal of the metropolis. His ambition was still chiefly directed to poetic fame, and at the Christmas season of 1847 he issued (with the date of 848) a new volume of "Rhymes of Travel, Ballads and other Poems," which did not meet the ommendation of the Literary World, but was warmly praised by Edgar Allan Poe. In February, 848, Mr. Taylor secured employment upon the New York Tribune, with which paper he has ver since been connected in some capacity. ust at that time, however, the Eastern States were agog with the California excitement, and hither young Taylor proceeded by way of Panma, returning a few months later through Mexco. His letters to the Tribune, collected under he title "El Dorado; or, Adventures in the Path of Empire," had within a few weeks a circuation of 10,000 copies, and of the English reprint 30,000 were sold. More than twenty ediions have since been issued of this, the most profitable of all Mr. Taylor's works.

The chief incentive to his longest series of journeys—those begun in 1851—was the death, rom consumption, of a beautiful and amiable young lady to whom he was long engaged, and who had inspired many pathetic lyrics in his earlier verse. The marriage ceremony was performed almost on her deathbed, and after her burial he felt the need of protracted change of scene.

In the summer of 1851 Mr. Taylor set out for a long tour in Eastern lands, leaving in the hands of his publisher a third volume of poems, "A Book of Romances, Lyrics and Songs" (Boston, 1851), which included "The American Legend," a poem delivered the previous year before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University, and separately printed. Mr. Taylor's journey conducted him by way of England, the Rhine, Vienna, Trieste, and Smyrna to Egypt, reaching Cairo early in November. He spent the whole winter in a voyage up the Nile, penetrating through Nubia and the Soudan to the Kingdom of the Shillook negroes, on the White Nile, and when he reached Cairo in April, 1852, he had travelled 4000 miles in Central Africa.

He then made the Oriental tour of Palestine and Syria, visited Antioch and Aleppo and crossed Asia Minor diagonally from Tarsus, through the passes of the Taurus range, the forests of ancient Phrygia and the Bithynian Olympus to Constantinople, visiting also the Troad. He then spent several months in Southern Europe, especially Malta and Sicily, where he witnessed the eruption of Etna, and returned to England by way of the Tyrol and Germany.

After a brief sojourn in England he took a new departure for the extreme East in October, 1852; tarried a month in Southern Spain, proceeded to Bombay by the "Overland" route, and made a journey of 2200 miles, chiefly on horseback, in Central India, reaching Calcutta February 22d, 1853. He soon proceeded to Hong Kong, by way of Penang and Singapore; resided some time at Shanghai as an attaché of the American Legation, then in charge of Colonel Marshall, and on May 17th embarked for Japan, on board the squadron of Commodore Perry.

He was thus a witness of one of the most memorable events of modern times—the opening of Japan to intercourse with civilized countries—but his diary was not allowed to be separately published, it being used in preparing the official narrative of the expedition. Returning to Canton in August, Mr. Taylor sailed in September for New York and reached this port December 20th, 1853, after an absence of two years and four months, during which he had travelled about fifty thousand miles. "A Journey to Central Africa; or, Life and Landscape from Egypt to the Negro Kingdoms of the White Nile" (New York, 1854); "The Lands of the Saracen; or, Pictures of Palestine, Asia Minor, Sicily, and Spain" (1854), and "A Visit to India, China, and Japan in the Year 1853" (1855)—all of which were widely popular both in America and England, and ran through numerous editions.

Mr. Taylor settled down to quiet journalistic work for a few years, but the passion for novelty was still strong within him, and in 1862 he accepted the post of Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg, where he resided nearly two years, acting for a short time in 1863 as Chargé d'Affaires ad interim. At this time he pursued with earnestness his studies of German literature, comenced many years before, and married Miss Marie Hansen, a German lady of distinguished family, who is herself a linguist and author of rare talents. During the winter of 1869–70 he delivered a course of lectures on "German Literature" at Cornell University. He was well beloved by all the students at Ithaca. His chief occupation for several years consisted in lecturing and his recreation in translating Goethe's "Faust," two volumes (1870–71). He traversed in 1871 the entire route of the Northern Pacific Railway, making a by visit to the British province of Manitoba, and in 1874 revisited Egypt and Iceland, publishing his letters thereupon in a single volume.

A complete account of his literary activity would comprise scores of uncollected contributions to miscellaneous publications, many unpublished lectures, and a vast number of literary reviews and general articles which were published in the columns of the New York Tribune. One of his most marvellous feats of literary labor was in preparing for the Tribune, a few years ago, within forty-eight hours a complete account of two new volumes of poems by Victor Hugo. This was done from advance-sheets by working day and night, and the account, which filled several columns, was largely composed of metrical translations from Hugo.

Mr. Taylor was not an ardent politician, but he sympathized heartily with the Union cause during the civil war, and was always identified with the fortunes of the Republican party. When it fell to the lot of President Hayes early in the present year to fill the post of Minister to the German Empire, it was generally felt that it would be not merely a welcome tribute to literature and to journalistic success, but a fitting satisfaction of the joint interests of two great States, could the position be tendered to Mr. Taylor.

The appointment was made and was more satisfactory to the public than government appointments usually are. When the news of his death was telegraphed to Washington it elicited the following

TRIBUTE FROM THE PRESIDENT:

"His appointment as Minister to Germany was one of the few appointments I have made where no especial pressure was exerted by any one in the appointee's behalf. His fitness for the position because of his standing as a journalist, his familiarity with German literature, and his ability as an educated and talented gentleman, were well known to me, and as soon as I mentioned his name to Secretary Evarts his appointment was virtually decided upon. Mr. Taylor was a native of Pennsylvania. Mr. Welsh, our Minister to Great Britain, is also a Pennsylvanian, and the fact that two gentlemen from one State had been selected to fill important missions in Europe was suggested to me when the appointment of Mr. Taylor was made. But I felt that in some respects Mr. Taylor was more a representative of the United States at large than of one locality in particular. He was better known perhaps in New York than in Pennsylvania, and his fame as a literary man was almost world-wide."

Mr. Taylor had suffered latterly from dropsy, and had been for some time under medical treatment. The last news of his condition had been more reassuring, and his friends hoped he would yet be spared for many years, but on Thursday, December 19th, at four o'clock, he calmly passed away.

The following beautiful prayer, which we extract from Mr. Taylor's volume of poems on the Orient, must close our notice of this truly representative man:

God, who kindlest aspiration,
  Kindlest hope the heart within;
God, who promisest Thy mercy,
  Wiping out the debt of sin,—

God, protect me, in the darkness,
  When the awful thunders roll:
Evil walks the world unsleeping,
  Evil sleeps within my soul.

Keep my mind from every impulse
  Which from Thee may turn aside;
Keep my heart from every passion
  By Thy breath unsanctified.

God, preserve me from a spirit
  Which Thy knowledge cannot claim;
From a knee that bendeth never
  In the worship of Thy name;

From a heart whose every feeling
  Is not wholly vowed to Thee;
From an eye that, through its weeping,
  Thy compassion cannot see;

From a prayer that goes not upward,
  In the darkness and the fear,
From the soul's impassioned centre,
  Seeking access at Thy ear!

When the might of Evil threatens,
  Throw Thy shelter over me:
Let my spirit feel Thy presence,
  And my days be full of Thee!

KEEPING BAD COMPANY.

A "Midnight Exploration" Sermon, by Dr. Talmage, preached December 22d.

"A companion of fools shall be destroyed."—PROVERBS 13 : 20.

No Man Goes to Ruin Unaccompanied—Sin is Infectious—The Innocent Young Man in a Great City—Who Looks after Him—Who Pays Expenses—I. Avoid the Sceptic—He has "got over it"—II. Avoid the Idler—Where Idlers Resort—How They do Harm—Ashbel Green's Reply—III. Avoid the Pleasure-Seeker—Nature is Beautiful, yet it is Constantly in Work—The Career of Brummell—How a Quaker made His Money—The Feast of God.

IN all the nights of city exploration I discovered that hardly any man goes into a place of dissipation or sin alone. He almost always goes accompanied. Indeed, I will put the case stronger, and say, no one ever goes to ruin alone. He always takes some one with him. So that when I estimate the calamity of one man's destruction, I not only take into account the loss of his body, mind, and soul, and the ruin of his household, but perhaps the ruin of ten, or twenty, or thirty souls, ten, or twenty, or thirty households.

"May it please the Court," said a convicted criminal, when asked by the judge what he had to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, "May it please the Court, bad company has been my destruction; I received the blessing of good parents, and in return therefor promised to avoid all evil associates; had I kept my promise I should have avoided this shame, and the burden of guilt which like a vulture threatens to drag me to justice for my many crimes. Although I once moved in high circles and was entertained by distinguished men, I am lost; bad company did the work for me." Only one out of a thousand illustrations was that of the fact that "a companion of fools shall be destroyed." It is an invariable rule.

Here is a hospital with a hundred men down with the ship-fever. Here is a healthy man who goes into it. He does not so certainly catch the disease as a good man will catch moral distemper if he consents to be shut up with the vicious and the abandoned. In the prisons of the olden time it was the custom to put the prisoners in a cell together, and I sorry to say it is the custom still in some of our prisons; so that when the day of liberation comes, the men, instead of being reformed, are turned out brutes, not men, each one having learned the vice of all the rest.

We may, my friends, in our worldly occupation be obliged to talk to and commingle with bad people; but he who voluntarily chooses that kind of associations is carrying on a courtship with a Delilah which will shear the locks of his strength, and he will be tripped into perdition.

Look over all the millions of the race, and you cannot show me a single instance where a man voluntarily associated with the bad for one year and maintained his integrity. Sin is catching; it is infectious; it is epidemic.

A young man wakes up in one of our great cities, knowing only the gentlemen of the firm into whose service he has entered. In the morning he enters the store, and all the clerks mark him, measure him, discuss him. The bad clerks of that establishment, the good clerks of that establishment, stand in some relation to him. The good clerks will wish him well, but they will wait for a formal introduction; and even after they have had the introduction they are very cautious as to whether they shall call him into their association before they know him very well.

But the bad young men in that establishment all gather around him, they patronize him, they offer to show him every thing that there is in the city, on one condition—that he will pay the expenses; for it always happens so when a good young man and a bad young man go together to a place of evil entertainment the good young man always has to pay the charges. Just at the time the ticket is to be paid for, or the champagne bill is to be settled, the bad young man will affect embarrassment and feel around in his pockets, and say, "Well, well, really I have forgotten my pocket-book."

In forty-eight hours after this young man has entered the store—this innocent young man—the bad young men will gather around him, slap him on the shoulder with familiarity, and at his stupidity in not being able to take certain allusions, will say: "Ah! my young friend, you will have to be broken in." And forthwith they go to work to "break him in."

O young man! let no fallen young man slap you on the shoulder familiarly. Turn around and give a withering glance that will make the wretch cower in your presence. There is no monstrosity of wickedness that can stand before the glance of purity and honor. God keeps the lightnings of heaven in His own scabbard, and no human arm may reach them; but God gives to every young man a lightning which he may use, and that is the lightning of an honest eye. Anybody that understands the temptations of our great cities knows the use of a sermon like this, in which I try to enforce by thought that "a companion of fools shall be destroyed."

And first, I charge you,

AVOID THE SCEPTIC.

That is, the young man who puts his thumb in his vest, and swaggers about, scoffing at your old-fashioned religion; then taking out the Bible and turning over to some mysterious passage, and saying, "Explain that, my friend—explain that. I used to think just as you do; my father and mother used to think just as you do; but you can't scare me about the future; I used to believe in those things, but I've got over it." Yes; he has got over it, and you will get over it if you stay in his companionship much longer; for while he may not bring one argument against our holy Christianity, he will by scoffs and jeers and caricatures destroy your faith in that religion which was the comfort of your father in his declining years, and the pillow on which your old mother lay a-dying.

That brilliant young sceptic will after a while have to die, and his diamond will flash no splendor into the eye of Death. His hair will lie uncombed on the pillow. Death will come up, and he will say—this sceptic will say, "I cannot die, I cannot die." Death will say, "You must die; you have but ten seconds more to live. Your soul—give it to me right away. Your soul!" "Oh no!" says the sceptic, "don't breathe that cold air into my face; you crowd me too hard; it is getting dark in the room; here—take my rings, and take all the pictures in the room, but let me off." "No," says Death; "your soul! your soul!" Then the dying sceptic begins to say, "O God!" Death says, "You declared there was no God." Then the dying sceptic says, "Pray for me;" and Death says, "It is too late to pray; you have only three seconds more to live, and I will count them off—one, two, three. Gone!" Where? Where? Carry him out and lay him down beside his old father and mother, who died under the delusions of the Christian religion, singing the songs of victory. He died saying: "Don't breathe that cold air in my face; you crowd me too hard; it is getting dark in the room."

Again,

AVOID THE IDLER.

That is, those people who gather around the store, or the shop, or the factory, and try to induce you away from your worldly calling, and in your business house try to induce you away. There is nothing that would please them so well as to have you give up your employment and consort with them.

These idlers you will find standing around the engine-houses, or standing at noonday, or about noon, on the steps of some hotel or fashionable restaurant, giving the idea they have dined there. They have not dined there. They never dined there. They never will dine there. Before you invite a young man into your association ask him plainly: "What do you do for a living? If he says "Nothing; I am a gentleman," look out for him." I care not how soft his hand, or how elegant his apparel, or how high-sounding his family name, his touch is death.

These people who have nothing to do will come around you in your busy hours, and they will ask you to ride with them to Coney Island or to Central Park, and they will tell you of some excursion that you must make, of some wine that you must drink, of some beautiful dancer that you must see. They will try to take you away from your regular work. Associate with these men, and first of all you will become ashamed of your apparel; then you will lose your place, then you will lose your respectability, then you will lose your soul.

Idleness is the next door to villany. When the police go to find criminals, where do they go to find them? They find them among the idle—those who have nothing to do, or, having something to do, refuse to engage in their daily work. Some one came to good old Ashbel Green and asked him why he worked at eighty years of age when it was time for him to rest. "Oh," he replied, "I work to keep out of mischief." And no man can afford to be idle I care not how strong his moral character, h cannot afford to be idle.

But you say, "A great many people ar suffering from enforced idleness. During th hard times there are a great many people out o employment." I know it; but the times o dulness in business are the times when me ought to be thoroughly engaged in improvin their minds and enlarging their hearts. Th fortunes to be made twenty years from now wi be made by the young men who are now i these days of dulness in business culturing the intellect and improving their nature. They wi get the fortunes after a while, while those me who hang around their stores, never engaging i any useful occupation, will be as poor then a they are now. It is absurd for a Christian ma to say he has nothing to do.

I went into a store in New York where the were five Christian men, and they said they ha nothing to do. The whole world lying in si Poverty to be comforted, sickness to be allev ated, a Bible in the back office, every opportuni of mental culture, spiritual culture, every i ducement to work, yet a Chrstian man, swo before High heaven to consecrate his whole l to usefulness, has nothing to do! If you ha not any business for this world, my Christi friend, then you ought to be doing business eternity.

People go to Florence and to Venice and Rome to see one of the works of the great m ters. I thing I can show you the picture one of the great masters: "I went by the fi of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the m void of understanding; and, lo, it was all gro over with thorns. and nettles had covered face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was br en down. Then I saw. and considered it well. looked upon it. and received instruction. Ye little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding the hands to sleep: so shall thy poverty come one that travelleth; and thy want as an arm man." There is no more explosive passage all the Bible than that. It first begins to like the fuse of a cannon, and then bursts lik fifty-four-pounder. The old proverb was t "The devil tempts most men, but idlers tempt the devil!" Therefore seek something to If no worldly business offers, then, in the nam of the Lord Jesus Christ, go out on Christian and the Lord will bless you and the Lord will help you.

Again, I counsel you,

AVOID THE PLEASURE-SEEKER,

—the man whose entire business it is to seek for recreation and amusement. I believe in the amusements of the world so far as they are innocent. I could not live without them. Any man of sanguine temperament must have recreation or die. And yet the amusements and recreations of life must administer to vork ; they are only preparative for the occuation to which God has called us.

God would not have given us the capacity to augh if He did not sometimes intend us to inlulge it. God hath hung in sky and set in wave nd printed on grass many a roundelay. But all he music and the brightness of the natural world vas merely intended to fit us for the earnest vork of life. The thundercloud has edges exuisitely purpled, but it jars the mountain as it ays, "I come down to water the fields." The lowers standing under the fence look gay and eautiful, but they say : "We stand here to reresh the husbandmen at the nooning." The rook frolics and sparkles and foams, but it ays, "I go to baptize the moss ; I go to slake he thirst of the bird ; I turn the wheel of the nill ; in my crystal cradle I rock muckshaw and vater-lily ; I play, but I work."

Look out for the man who plays and never vorks. Look out for that man whose entire usiness it is to play ball or sail a yacht, or enage in any kind of merriment. These things re all beautiful and grand in their places, but vhen they became the chief work of life they beome a man's destruction.

George Brummell was admired of all England. Ie danced with peeresses and went a round of nirth and folly, until after a while, exhausted of urse, ruined of reputation, blasted of soul, he egged a crust from a grocer, declaring as his eliberate opinion that he thought that a dog's ife was better than a man's.

These mere pleasurists will come around you vhile you are engaged in your work and they will ry to take you away. They want you to lose our place. They have lost their place ; why not ou lose your place ? Then you will be one with hem. O my friends ! before you go with these leasure-seekers, these men whose entire life it s to fun and amusement and recreation, remember while after a man has lived a life of integrity nd Christian consecration, kind to the poor nd elevating to the world's condition, when he omes to die he has a glorious reminiscence lying n his death pillow, the mere pleasurist has othing by way of review but a torn play-bill, a icket for the race, an empty tankard, or the castout rhymes of a carousal ; and as in delirium of his awful death he clutches the goblet and resses it to his lips, the dregs falling on his ongue will begin to uncoil and hiss with the aders of an eternal poison.

Oh ! turn your back upon these men, shake off he sceptic. Shake off the idler. Shake off the leasurist. You may do this work of ejection in oliteness, but you may do it firmly. You are ot, under any circumstances, to lose all the renembrance of the fact that you are a gentleman nd must always act the gentleman.

A young man said to a Christian Quaker : 'Old chap, how did you get your money ?" Well," said the Quaker, "I got it by dealing n an article in which thou mayst deal if thou vilt—civility."

Be courteous, be polite, but be firm. Say no s if you meant it. Do not say "No." If you ay "No," they will keep on with their imploraion and their temptation, and after a while you vill stand in silence, and then you will say, after hey have gone on a little longer, "Yes." And hen they will go on with their temptation until ou will say "Yes," and then you are lost.

Oh ! turn your back upon the banquet of sin. I all you to a better feast to-day. The promises f God are the fruits. The harps of heaven are he music. The clusters of Eshcol are pressed nto the tankards. The sons and daughters of he Lord Almighty are the guests. While standng at the banquet to pour the wine, and divide he clusters, and command the music, and welome the guests, is a daughter of God, on her row the blossoms of Paradise, and in her cheek he flush of celestial summer. And her name is Religion. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, nd all her paths are peace."

So far I have come in this series of sermons, nd two weeks from to-day I shall turn a chapter, and I will go on to speak of what is being done in the other cities of this land. I have recived from every city in this country, and from almost every city in Great Britain and Ireland, assurances that God has blessed this series of sermons to the salvation of many people ; and now from this time I shall look off upon the other cities of the land, not forgetting, however, at the same time, our own cluster of cities, and I shall try to show the people what are the evils to be cured and what are the signs of encouragement. O my friends ! let us toil on. Do not let us live lives of selfishness ; there is so much sin and suffering all around about. May God help us in our work !

You have a work to do which I cannot accomplish. I have a work that you cannot do. The great harvest day comes when we must give an account for our faithfulness, or our unfaithfulness. Oh that it might be in the last day that Christ would say to us : "I was hungry and ye fed me ; I was naked and ye clothed me ; I was sick and in prison and ye visited me ; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it to me." Time goes rapidly by, and soon the books will be opened, and you and I must answer not only for our own treatment of the Gospel of Christ, but for the manner in which we have brought that Gospel to others. "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him." Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting, and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen and amen !

The above is a verbatim and unabridged report of Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning sermon.

"THE JUDGMENT, OR JUDGMENTS."

A Paper read by the Rev. Dr. J. T. Cooper, of the Presbyterian Seminary, Allegheny, Penn.

I. The Import of the Word Judgment—1. Rule or Government—2. Final Determination—II. Who will be the Judge ?—III. The Duration of the Judgment—IV. The Persons Judged—1. True Believers—2. Both Houses of Israel—3. The Gentile Nations—V. The Order of the Judgments —1. The Nations—2. Exaltation of the Pious Dead—3. The Formation of the Millennial Kingdom—4. The Apostacy—5. The Judgment of the Apostacy—6. Judgment of the Dead.

In my inquiries on this subject I have sought to be guided by the Word of God, and by that alone. Experience and observation show that there is no accurate proportion at present maintained between conduct and condition—that the wicked often triumph in their iniquity, while virtue is despised ; her humble votaries borne down by the gloom of adversity, or reared in the midst of sorrows and tears. These facts, taken in connection with the suggestions of reason, seem to justify the conclusion that a crisis is before our world, in which there will be a glorious vindication of the justice of the moral Governor of the Universe, or, in other words, a last judgment. But, while it becomes us thus far to listen to the voice of reason, she has nothing to say as to the mode of God's procedure in this judgment, the time of its occurrence, and the circumstances or events connected with it. For information on these topics, as well as for a confirmation of the fact itself, we must look to the Word of God, and to that word alone. Let us, then, with reverence, open this word and hear what it has to say on this all-important theme.

I. What do the Scriptures teach us in relation to or judgments, viewed as an act or series of acts performed by the God of Heaven ? It is a matter of importance that we have Scriptural ideas on this subject. In answer to the question just propounded, the following facts are clearly indicated :

1. The word is sometimes used where the prominent idea is that of rule or government. Thus we speak of the "Judges of Israel" as Gideon, Samson, Jephthah, Samuel, etc. Of each of these persons it is said "he judged Israel." Here the idea of rule or government must be regarded as prominent, with, perhaps, a special reference to the condition of those judged as exposed to enemies. When Israel wanted a king they said : "We will have a king over us, that we also may be like all the nations ; and that our king may judge us and fight our battles."

These passages, and they are only specimens of what might be adduced, clearly show that the word judgment is employed in the Scriptures not simply to denote a single act in which a sentence is passed upon a culprit, either in the way of acquittal or condemnation, but a series of acts in which are involved the exercise of lordship in the way of ruling, governing, saving, vindicating, protecting, and taking vengeance.

2. In harmony with the foregoing, the term judgment is sometimes employed to express those dealings of God with the children of men in which there will be a revelation of their fixed character and a determination of their everlasting destiny. In the language of the author of Christian Dogmatics, we may say : "That the history of the world is a continued judgment of the world, is acknowledged by all who attentively and believingly observe it. But it is equally manifest that it can by no means yet be termed a final judgment, although it is unceasingly preparing the way for this last. This awfully momentous fact has been made the subject of repeated prophetic announcements, and is no doubt to be identified with that which, in almost all the prophetic writings, is spoken of as "the day of the Lord." Not, indeed, that judgment is the only scene which that day is to disclose ; but it will doubtless constitute one of its characteristic features. The impression must be made upon the mind of every reader of the Bible that this "day of judgment" is to be final to the party or parties judged.

THE JUDGE.

II. To whom does the work of judgment belong ? I answer, it is to none other than the Lord Jesus Christ, the God-man Redeemer. This matter is indisputably settled by the Spirit of God, in the fifth chapter of the Gospel according to John. Two actions in that chapter are ascribed to our Lord. One of these, namely, that of raising the dead, He is said to perform in conjunction with the Father. Thus it is said in verse twenty-first : "As the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom He will." The other action, ascribed to Him in the next verse, is that of judging ; but this is declared to be His work to the evclusion of the Father. See how explicit is the statement there: "For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son."

III. How long shall the work of judgment last ? "There seems much rationality in the interpretation given by Mede, that the time of judgment is a thousand human years, than in that of those who, without a shred of Scriptural authority, restrict it to a human day, or some such little span of secular time. 'One day,' says Peter, 'is with the Lord as a thousand years.' The very minimum of meaning that can be taken from this is, that a day in God's reckoning of His own works is as a thousand years of human reckoning." It seems to me that it is in perfect accord with the Scriptures to represent the whole of the millennial dispensation as "the last day," "the day of the Lord," and "the day of judgment," just as the present dispensation is called "the day of salvation" (1 Cor. 6 : 6). One of the distinguishing features of "that day" is judgment. It opens with judgment, it has judgment running through it, and it closes with the judgment of the great white throne. The parousia or coming of the Lord introduces that day, but there is no authority for confounding it with it, and it should by no means be done.

WHO ARE THE PERSONS JUDGED?

IV. Who, according to the Scriptures, are the persons or parties judged? These I shall proceed to specify.

We have the judgment of Christians or true believers. To this the apostle refers in 2 Cor. 5 : 10 : " For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." This passage has been regarded by both pre-millenarians and post-millenarians as indicating simply a general judgment without reference to any particular class of persons. My opinion is that the apostle here has an exclusive reference to believers.

2. There is a crisis or hour of judgment awaiting both the houses of Israel in the latter days. The ten tribes are at present hidden from view, but under the judicial wrath of God. The awful extent of this wrath, as it has rested and still continues to rest upon the house of Judah, has been the theme of historians without number.

To what extent they shall share in the judgments of which we have been speaking I am not prepared to say. It is clear, however, that a day of fearful reckoning is before them also, though the scene of this judgment will most probably not be their own land. In proof of this read Ezek. 20 : 32-38. Here, after assuring them that He would rule over them " with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out," Jehovah solemnly declares to them " and I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God."

3. The Scriptures speak of a judgment of the Nations. A description of that judgment we have in Matt. 25 : 31-46. It is there said: " When the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory : and before Him shall be gathered all Nations, and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. And He shall set the sheep on His right hand, but the goats on the left." Our Lord has been giving a series of parables—that of the fig-tree, the ten virgins, and the talents. Some have, therefore, thought that this might with propriety be called the parable of the sheep and the goats. However that may be, it would be certainly improper to subject the imagery here employed to a rigidly literal exegesis. The whole scene is doubtless designed to set before us the solemn fact that there is a day of reckoning before the nations of the earth, and that that day is the time of our Lord's glorious advent.

The separation which is here represented as being made by the King, the words addressed by Him to the two parties before Him, and the replies which they respectively make, are each designed to set before us the characteristics and the issues of that judgment scene which is here so impressively described. How sublime, how majestic the scene! The popular and prevalent idea attached to this scene is that it is descriptive of a grand assize in which not only those who shall be alive at the time, but all who have died and who will yet die, shall be judged, they, of course, having been raised to life. It is, therefore, in their belief a judgment of the quick and the dead. This view cannot be maintained.

The following considerations are sufficient to show that the judgment scene does not embrace any of the resurrection, but only

at that epoch :

(1) The passage contains no reference whatever to a resurrection. The presumption is that an event so important and calculated to add so much interest to the scene would have been mentioned had our Lord intended to include the dead as well as the living. We have here, then, a mere assumption, and that, too, against a strong presumption.

(2) The fact that these here judged are called " nations," is conclusive against the admission of any others but the living. There is no instance in all the Scriptures in which the word ethnos, nation, is employed with any reference, direct or indirect, to those who have died. There are upward of 150 texts in which this word occurs in the New Testament, and among all these there is not one instance of its denoting any who were not or are not to be the inhabitants of the earth at the time to which the passage refers.

(3) There are other places in the Scriptures in which similar expressions are employed in connection with the infliction of terrible judgments, and which probably point to the same events, which are universally admitted to have no reference to a judgment of any but those who are alive.

(4) Another consideration which shows that the persons here judged are not all the dead, as well as those who may be alive at that time, is the reasons given by the Judge for His decision in relation to the two respective classes into which He has arranged them, namely, the sheep and the goats. These reasons were the kindness shown by the one class and the kindness not shown by the other class to His brethren, even the least of them. It requires no words to show that, not to mention infants, there are millions upon millions who have died, to whom these reasons would have been wholly inapplicable. What multitudes, in the ages of the past, have passed away who never heard of the name of Jesus or His brethren!

(5) The form in which this judgment is presented seems to be altogether distinct from the one contained in Rev. 20 : 11-15. Here there is no mention, as in that case, of a formal trial—no opening of books and judging out of those things that were written in the books, according to their works. We have here a " King" sitting upon " the throne of His glory," and calling up rebellious or obedient subjects, upon whom a sentence of reward or punishment is passed. They are divided into classes in a wav which presupposes their previous guilt or innocence, and then the sentence is pronounced with a declaration of the ground on which it is based.

The foregoing considerations, it is thought, demonstrate that, whatever may or may not be the reference in the solemn scene brought before us, that reference cannot be to a universal judgment both of the living and the dead.

I now proceed to remark that there is a strong probability that Jesus by all the nations refers simply to all that is, to all those among the Gentiles who had shown kindness or had failed to show kindness to the brethren of Christ.

In favor of this view may be urged the fact that it brings this passage into striking harmony with numerous other prophecies. Some of these have already been quoted, and, therefore, need not be restated. In them we are assured that there would be a day, spoken of repeatedly as " that day," and as " the day of the Lord," in which He would " gather all nations and bring them down into the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and plead with them there for My people and for My heritage, Israel ;" and that he would there " sit and judge all the heathen round about." What have we here in Matthew, but another solemn warning from " the Shepherd and Judge of Israel " as to this " day of vengeance" that was before the nations.

If we read the 25th chapter of Jeremiah we shall find a description of desolating judgments under the figure of a " wine-cup," which the prophet is directed to present to the nations in succession. In the 25th verse it is said : " And all the Kings of the North, far and near, one with another, and all the Kingdoms of the world, which are upon the face of the earth," shall drink of this cup.

In connection with these passages let Daniel 2 : 31-45 be considered. Here we have the four successive Kingdoms of the earth represented as being broken in pieces and consumed by that Kingdom which the God of Heaven shall set up. So also in the 7th chapter the world-powers, including the kings of the earth and their adherents, are symbolized by four beasts. The last of these makes war with the saints and prevails against them " until the Ancient of Days came and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High," when it is said, verse 26, " the judgment shall sit and they shall take away his dominion to consume and destroy it unto the end."

In correspondence with these Old Testament prophecies we have in Rev. 19 : 1-21, a vivid representation of the same terrific scene of judgment upon the nations, where we are told that " The beast was taken, and with him the fals prophet, etc., and cast alive into a lake of fir burning with brimstone"—a punishment simila to that to which those who are on the left hand o the King are doomed. In connection with thes passages it would be well carefully to ponde 2 Thess. 1 : 7-9 ; Judges 14 : 15 ; 2 Thess. 2 : 8

In view, therefore, of the fact that the scen described in the 25th chapter of Matthew, if understood to be a prophecy of a judgment t which the Gentiles are to be subjected at th coming of the Lord, harmonizes with numerou other prophecies, both of the Old and the Ne Testament Scriptures, it is, with deference, su mitted that this is most probably the idea th is to be attached to it.

There appear to be three distinct classes r ferred to—the " sheep," the " goats," and, distinguished from both these, the " brethren of Christ. Some have thought that by H brethren, as distinguished from the others, are to understand His brethren according to t flesh—the Jews. And these passages seem afford sufficient ground for the application Christ to the covenant people of the endeari name of brethren.

This view we have no disposition to press, pecially when we recall the words of Jesu " My brethren are these who hear the word God and keep it."

But though this is a judgment of Gentiles, a is to take place here on earth, it does not foll that the punishment inflicted or the reward c ferred is merely of a temporal character. T issues of the judgment are final in the case both those on the right hand and the left ha of the judge. The last verse declares : " Th shall go away into everlasting punishment ; the righteous ino life eternal." The former made the heirs of a kingdom, while the lat are banished into everlasting fire prepared the devil and his angels.

Some have doubtless been led by a superfic view of the language employed by the king this sentence to identify this judgment with t of the great white throne which takes place ter the millennium, when the " dead, small a great," are said to appear before God. If, ho ever, we refer to Jude 7, we shall find that " S om and Gomorrah, and the cities about the are said to be " set forth for an example, suf ing the vengeance of eternal fire."

Notwithstanding the most fearful judgme shall thus be visited upon the nations of earth, the result, it would appear, is not a to destruction. On the contrary, we are told Isa. 66 : 18, 19, that " it shall come that I gather all nations and tongues ; and they s come and see my glory. And I will set a s among them, and I will send those that esc of them (mark the words) unto the nations Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow Tubal and Javan, to the isles afar off, that h not heard my fame, neither have seen my g among the Gentiles." Thus there is a remn both of Jews and Gentiles.

In the destruction of those nations that s then be found in rebellion against the Lord against His Christ are brought to a final summation the overthrow of every wicked ganization, whether of a religious or civil c acter. Then, too, will come to end all t Christless associations that have been beg and nurtured by the dark spirit of secrecy.

es ! they will vanish amid the blazing fires of hat "great and terrible day of the Lord." The ragon, the beast, and the false prophet, with he unclean spirits that went forth from their mouths, have met their final doom.

The Scriptures speak of a judgment of the dead. An account of this we have in Rev. 20 : 11, 15. This judgment takes place after the thousand ears are expired. The apostle tells us that he "saw the dead, small and great, stand before God ; and the books were opened ; and another book was opened, which is the book of life ; and he dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." Here you will notice that the dead are wice specifically mentioned. But that is not all. In the very next verse it is said : "And the ea gave up the dead which are in it ; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in hem ; and they were judged every man according to their works."

Those who introduce the dead among "all the nations," in Matt. 25, do not hesitate to introduce the living as among the number that are udged on this occasion. The one is as unauhorized as the other. This results from an identification of these two judgments. As before shown, however, they are clearly distinct as well as separated from each other by a thousand years. At all events, whether separated by such a period or not, they are not the same.

The very place of the judgment here is altogether different from that in the Gospel. There he judgment is on the earth ; for now according to the universal belief of Christians, "when he Son of Man shall come in His glory," it shall be from heaven to earth. Here, however, "the earth and the heaven" are said to have "fled away ; and there was no place found for them." The great White Throne, therefore, is not on the earth at all. As expressly predicted by the Apostle Peter, they have been "dissolved, and their elements have melted with fervent heat." We have here symbolically set before us an assize in which there is a strict judicial trial, in which there is a trial made and a sentence given according to the law and the evidence. The design of the whole scene is evidently to bring before us in an impressive manner the idea that the claims of justice will at last be vindicated.

The question here presents itself : Are there any believers among those who are judged on this occasion ? We do not wish to dogmatize on this point ; yet, to us, the presumption appears to be against the admission of this idea. This opinion is based on the following reasons : There is no reference to any as having been rewarded, while there is express mention of the dreadful doom that falls upon such as "were not found written in the Book of Life." How account for such a remarkable omission ? The analogy of faith, the union of believers with Christ, the fact that they are exhibited in this Apocalypse as "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," their acknowledged state of freedom from the law as a covenant of life, and above all the express declaration of Jesus himself in John 5 : 24, would seem to indicate that they would not appear in such a judgment as the one here described, that is, a judgment to eternal life or death.

The fact that the "Book of Life" is represented as being consulted, led me for some time to entertain the idea that believers are to be included among "the dead" who were judged. The following statement, however, has had the effect of lessening, if not entirely removing, the difficulty founded on the reference here to the boon of life : "We need scarcely say," observes the writer, "that previous to all investigation, God knows that the names of the wicked are not there, even as without any trial He knows the character of their works. But according to His gracious dealings with men, none are necessarily condemned for evil works, pardon being offered to the guilty. For this reason, there are two solemn stages in this judgment. First, a reference to the 'other books,' to show that the works of the wicked deserve death. Secondly, the opening of 'the Book of Life,' to show that by unbelief they have rejected life. And then, their names not being there, the execution of the sentence follows—which is 'the second death.'"

Prior to this we have an account of the casting of the devil, at the close of the thousand years, into the "lake of fire and brimstone." This appears to be that final judgment that is in reserve for "Diabolos," the leader of those "angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation," and who are said to be "reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." Into this "lake of fire, burning with brimstone," the beast and the false prophet are said, before the thousand years begin, to be both cast alive. This was consequent upon the descent of Him "who hath on His vesture and on His thigh the name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS," and who was followed by "the armies which were in heaven, clothed in fine linen, white and clean." That scene may, therefore, be identified with the judgment of the "nations" depicted in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew. It is worthy of notice that the everlasting fire into which those on the left hand of "the King" are sent is said to be "prepared for the devil and his angels." Here it is said "the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever." How striking the harmony here !

We have thus specified

SEVERAL DISTINCT JUDGMENTS.

These judgments, however, may all be regarded as one, the whole period being called the Day of Judgment. Those which we have been considering may be viewed as different acts or scenes in that one judgment.

V. What is the order of these judgments? Here, brethren, it becomes me to speak with the greatest deference and caution. A spirit of dogmatism is especially unbecoming here.

Impressed deeply with the difficulties attending the subject, and my own inability to solve them to the satisfaction of myself or others, I shall try to bring before you the order of these judgments and the relation they sustain to each other. 1. The judgment of the nations is expressly declared to be at the coming of the Son of Man. It is then "that He sits upon the throne of His glory and gathers all nations before Him." 2. Before proceeding to the work of judgment the Lord Jesus exalts to thrones and associates with Himself in the judgment those who had fallen asleep in Him and those who are alive and waiting for Him, but who are changed by the same power as that by which the dead are raised, 1 Thess. 4 : 17. Hence He is represented as "coming with them."

THE MILLENNIAL KINGDOM.

3. By means of those that pass through these great tribulations that will overtake both Jews and Gentiles the Lord Jesus Christ will form His Millennial Kingdom on the earth, over which Christ and His risen saints shall reign ; the kingdom will be on earth, but it does not follow that the seat of that kingdom will be there. Queen Victoria reigns over India and the Canadas, but she has never seen, and probably never will see, these countries. The discussion of this subject does not, however, fall within our range. What we affirm is that there are to be nations on the earth during the Millennial period. These terrific judgments of which we have been speaking have not resulted in a total destruction of its population. It is true that "the Lord will come with fire, and with His chariots, like a whirlwind, to render His anger with fury and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by His sword will the Lord plead with all flesh ; and the slain of the Lord shall be many." This is true ; but the same chapter that records this solemn truth assures that there are those who escape these judgments and who are to be employed as missionaries to those who had not heard His fame nor seen His glory, and who will assist in the restoration of the Israelites to their own land.

As for the Jews, though they shall be fearfully wasted and subjected to the most appalling sufferings, yet a "third part" even of those in the land shall escape, as we have seen, and will doubtless herald forth the glory of the Lord.

The question may be asked—after the saints are caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and judgment is given to them, are there any regenerate persons left on the earth ? Here is a question, brethren, which I cannot satisfactorily answer. It has been to me the most serious difficulty in the way of accepting the Pre-Millenarian system. It would greatly stumble me were there not on the other side difficulties incomparably more serious. I wait for light on this, as on many other subjects, if it please the Lord to give it.

How long the interval may be between the rapture of the saints and the judgment of the nations we are not informed. It will doubtless be long enough for many souls to be converted and called out into active testimony. The matter of this testimony will be of such a character and the work of the Spirit of God upon the heart so powerful, that it may not be long before the whole earth is vocal with the praises of Jehovah. Thus that bright and glorious state of things so often depicted in the Word of God will be maintained for one thousand years.

4. At the expiration of the thousand years, a sad apostacy takes place. If our first parents, though made in the image of God, fell by transgression, shall this last apostacy be thought incredible, especially when we take into consideration the fact that man, though greatly advanced in holiness, will still be but imperfectly sanctified. We have only to suppose that a new generation has come into existence ; that the Spirit of God has been withdrawn ; and that Satan, the deceiver, has been let loose, to find a solution of this awful fact which stands recorded in the page of prophecy.

5. This is followed by the infliction of an awful judgment upon the revolters and their leader. Fire descends from heaven upon them, while Satan is cast into the lake of fire, to be forever tormented.

6. Then we have the judgment of the dead, small and great, the nature, character, and issues of which we have already considered. Here the work of judgment ends, and with it must end the discussion of this solemn subject.

Dear brethren in the Lord, some of you have perhaps read that most interesting work entitled "John Knox and the Church of England, by Dr. Lorimer, Professor of Theology in the English Presbyterian Church." Among the many deeply interesting letters of this illustrious Scottish reformer which that work contains, there is one written by him in 1554, in one of the darkest hours of his wonderful career. It is addressed "to the faithful in London, New-Castle, and Berwick, and to all others within the realm of England that love the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Hear how this valiant soldier of Christ draws courage and comfort as he anticipates by faith the coming of the Lord as a judge to vindicate the cause of His oppressed people. He says, in those burning words which he knew so well how to use : "Has not the Lord Jesus, in despite of Satan's malice, carried up our flesh into heaven ? And shall He not return ? We know that He shall return, and that with expedition. Flee from idolatry and stand with Christ Jesus in this day of His battle, which shall be short and the victory everlasting, for the Lord Himself shall come in our defence with His mighty power. He shall give us the victory when the battle is maist strong ; and He shall turn our tears into everlasting joy. He shall consume our enemies with the breath of His mouth, and He shall let us see the destruction of them that are now maist proud, and that maist pretended to molest us. From God alone we abide redemption."

Surely a faith and hope that could thus inspire the heart of this brave old reformer in the day of battle may be of use to you and me. Let us hold fast to it.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ANNOUNCEMENT.

In commencing the publication of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times in America, it was impossible to form an accurate or even an approximate idea of the extent to which it would enjoy the favor of the Religious Public. The price was therefore fixed at four cents per single copy, that being the lowest sum deemed prudent under the circumstances.

Now, however, after the issue of only nine numbers, the journal has attained a circulation which, in connection with the numbers of commendatory letters daily received, justifies a

REDUCTION IN PRICE.

We have accordingly much pleasure in announcing that on and after January 2d, 1879, the price of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times will be for single copies. Annual subscription, $1.50.

Though but a few weeks have elapsed since the issue of the first number of the American edition of The Christian Herald, we feel constrained thus early to express our grateful thanks for the numerous friendly greetings and kind expressions of appreciation that have reached us from every quarter.

While thankful to all who have aided us, we have at this time especially to acknowledge the aid and sympathy of hundreds of ministers from all parts of the country, and of every denomination.

It has been the occasion of surprise that while we have received hundreds of letters commendatory of the appearance and character of the paper in detail, there has been not one objection, either to particular articles or to the general course of the paper.

We ask a continuance of the sympathy and co-operation of our brethren of every name. We greatly desire that The Christian Herald shall reach every family in the United States, and believe that the above reduction in price ought to effect that object.

From among the letters we receive we extract the following, as showing the evident appreciation The Christian Herald has met with throughout the country.

"I have cordially commended your paper to my people, and have spoken of the ability with which it is edited, etc."—T. De Witt Talmage, Brooklyn.

"I think it an interesting and beneficial paper; I cannot do without it. The sermons in each issue are worth the price of the paper."—Rev. L. F. Whitten, Madison, Ala.

"I am an enthusiastic admirer of your paper."—Rev. H. M. Burr, Plymouth, Ill.

"I will gladly do all I can to give it publicity and aid you in your undertaking."—Rev. E. F. Appling, Spring Hill, Ark.

"Among the latest, I think it will prove to be among the most, if not the most, valuable contributions to the religious press of our times."—Rev. H. S. Radfield, Westfield, N. Y.

"I think it one of the best papers I ever came across."—Chas. S. Albany, Philadelphia, Pa.

"I am pleased that the publication of so valuable a paper has been undertaken in this country. Allow me to bespeak for it and you abundant success and signal tokens of divine favor."—Rev. Wm. Aitchison, Jr., Farley, Iowa.

"I was struck with the fulness of valuable instruction and information. I will use every influence to circulate this valuable paper."—Rev. W. Mundhenke, Danville, Ky.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Blaine resolutions, as amended, were adopted by the Senate on Tuesday, December 17th, by fifty-three yeas to six nays. The debate was very tame. Blaine was left to himself by his Republican associates, and had to champion and defend, unaided, his propositions. The substance of the resolutions as passed are as follows:

That a committee, to consist of nine Senators, be appointed by the chair, to inquire and report to the Senate whether, at the recent election, the constitutional rights of citizens were violated in any of the States of the Union. Whether any citizen of any State has been dismissed or threatened with dismissal from employment, or deprivation of any right or privilege, by reason of his vote or intention to vote at the recent elections, or has been otherwise interfered with.

Whether in the year 1878 money was raised by assessment or otherwise upon Federal officeholders or employés for election purposes, and under what circumstances and by what means. And that the committee be instructed to inquire and report whether it is within the competency of Congress to provide by additional legislation for the more perfect security of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in all States of the Union.

In the Senate, on Wednesday the 18th inst., the House resolution appropriating $50,000 to pay the expenses of the Yellow Fever Commission was passed. The Pension Appropriation bill was passed, as also the bill amending the posse comitatus clause of the Army Appropriation bill, so that it shall not apply to any part of the army protecting life and property in the Indian country. The committee of investigation provided for by Senator Blaine's resolution, as at present constituted, will consist of the following Senators: Messrs. Teller, Hoar, McMillan, Kirkwood, and Cameron of Wisconsin, Republicans; and Messrs. Bayard, Bailey Wallace, and Garland, Democrats.

On Friday the 20th, after a listless, unproductive day, with scarcely a quorum present, bot houses adjourned to January 7th, 1879.

The Price of Gold was quoted at par o Tuesday, December 17th. That is to say, th greenback was worth exactly its nominal valu in gold. It is now seventeen years since th state of the money market existed last, and th quotation proves that the financial policy of th government is a wise and a sound policy.

Mr. Moody's Work at Baltimore continues be blessed in the conversion of souls. Next we he will speak at Dr. Leyburn's Associate R formed Church on Fayette Street. One eveni of each week Mr. Moody devotes to colored pe ple exclusively, and amongst this class he h done great good. All the churches of the ci are feeling the effect of his labors, and additio are daily being made to the churches as a resu The Young Men's Christian Association has b gun to realize his influence very perceptibly by livelier interest in their work, a quickened pu lic appreciation of its value, and constant crease in the membership.

A great deal of religious work is going on cially in business circles and in homes.

The movement started by Mr. Moody to ha the regular week of prayer followed up by a s son of religious activity all over the Unit States, is meeting with favor elsewhere. The following despatch was received by the Associated Press last night from Cleveland:

"The meeting of clergymen of the evangelical churches in this city to-day heartily and unanimously indorsed the proposal lately made by Mr. Moody and the clergy of Baltimore, that a united effort be made by all the churches in the United States, in the month of January following the week of prayer, toward a general revival throughout the land, and expresses a hope that the responses be general."

The Baltimore American says, "It is thought that this movement will be one of the most thorough and widespread of any of its kind that has taken place of late years in this country

American Missionaries, their trials and privations, are thus described by the special correspondent of the London Times, who was lately their guest at Cæsarea: "After seven more days of hard travelling, and seven days of hard fare and hard beds, I find myself, I scarcely know how or why, in a warm, clean, comfortable house, the residence of the Rev. D. Staver and his young wife, both of them lately arrived from America. It is not without pity, and I must add regret, that one hears this young couple say that they propose to spend their lives in this miserable country, subjected to endless annoyances, and unable—at least as far as the lady is concerned—to go outside their own doors without being insulted and stoned. This they readily and cheerfully undergo in order to carry the Gospel to the natives of these parts, to educate them and raise them, if possible, to higher and nobler thoughts and aspirations than they have yet dreamt of. It is a noble self-sacrifice, and I only wish I could feel a hope that it would be successful." We daresay Mr. Staver would simply remark—"Duties are ours, events are God's." What motive-power short of Christianity has ever prompted true missionary work?"

Dr. Talmage, in mentioning the cities in which he had made or intended making personal explorations, to discover matter for the series of sermons he commenced with the night side of New York, omitted to mention Baltimore. Some of the citizens of that place feel aggrieved at being thus "left out in the cold," and the editor of the local paper grimly assures him that their Causeway would "furnish some attractions to a connoisseur of such things." It is sadly true that few of our cities are without those so-called attractions; it is to be regretted that there are so few preachers with the wisdom to see and the courage to denounce the deadly allurements to sin thus lavishly furnished.

Mr. Moody's Work at Baltimore is having a visible influence on society. The Baltimore American says: "A good many who have never held religion as a subject of much consequence—matter-of-fact business men who felt that the faithful and honest performance of the avocations of their daily life, according to accepted principles of human morality, was of greater importance than any theoretical plan of reliance upon invisible spiritual aids, and who regarded preaching and churches as good for women and children alone—have gone to hear Mr. Moody, moved by varying motives, and cases are known where they have shown a complete change of mind on this question.

"If nothing more, they have acknowledged that, viewed from a practical standpoint, the conscientious practice of almost any form of Christian religion makes life sweeter and easier, and sorrow and death less dreadful to meet, or even to contemplate. The consequence has been, to use the words of a prominent furniture dealer on Charles Street, who expresses himself freely on this subject, that 'a great many men have got into the habit of going to church on Sundays who used to think it a bore, preferring to stay at home and smoke and read the papers.'

"The fact of their going to church is not of so much importance as the fact that their minds have been moved to religious inquiry, although there are very few who will deny that simply attending divine service is elevating, and a very good thing in itself. It must not be supposed, however, that Mr. Moody has failed utterly in reaching the class of persons called unregenerate, in contradistinction to professors of religion."

From a Ball to a Fast.—A contemporary, speaking of the recent perversions to Rome from a well-known ritualistic church in Brighton, accounts in part for the Romeward movement thus: "Often enough fashion and flirtation are elements in this parody on religion. Thus, for instance, we hear of the young lady who comes home from the ball in time for an early fasting communion. In this way the smooth swift current bears the unwary over the rapids of Ritualism into the Dead Sea of the Roman despotism."

The Conversion of a Prominent Politician is announced in connection with Mr. Moody's meetings at Baltimore. It is said that one who has been in politics nearly all his life has undergone a bonâ-fide conversion and change of heart through attending several of the Gospel meetings. As Mr. Moody expressed it in speaking of this particular case, "he was completely broken up," and in the opinion of his friends is "a changed man." Although Mr. Moody would not reveal the name of the penitent politician, or give any particulars about him, his identity was established in other quarters, and there is no mistake about his being greatly stirred up on the subject of salvation.

For the benefit of those who know nothing about this "stirring up" that Mr. Moody brings about in so many instances, it may be explained as something very different from the excitement attending most of the so-called revivals. The person affected shows a great anxiety to go to churches and to talk with ministers and with religious friends about spiritual affairs. They usually commence reading the Bible most assiduously. They proceed to break off drinking and swearing, and such habits, and show a disposition to curb their temper. They form good resolutions, and generally keep them. Young ladies generally give up balls and parties, and cut the acquaintance of the young men they know who are religious scoffers. These are but a few instances of changed conduct witnessed in numerous individuals since the Moody meetings began.

An Aching Soul.—Ralph Wells, in closing his address before the Missionary Society of Dr. Crosby's church, Fourth Avenue, New York, related the following touching incident: "Forty years ago, when I was a school-boy in Boston, close by our school was the Asylum for the Blind, of which Laura Bridgeman was an inmate. One day, when the noble preceptor was trying to teach her, little Laura spelled out on his fingers the question 'What is the soul?' He answered her in the same mute language on her fingers: 'The soul is that which thinks and feels and hopes.' And she spelled back, with a look of rare intelligence on her countenance 'And aches so!' Oh," said Mr. Wells, "I often think of her words—the soul is that which 'aches so;' and the thought of the soul's capacity for 'aching' often comes to me and urges me on to work with increased zeal to bring such the Gospel, the only means of cure possible for the millions of 'aching' souls."

Peter's Pence, and other offerings from France to the Pope are much diminishing, to the dismay of the authorities at the Vatican. On making up accounts it is found that during the month of August in the present year 500,000 lire were received, as against 5,000,000 in August last year.

A Minister's Escape.—Some years ago, a clergyman from New Haven was on a visit to Boston one winter. He was stopping at the Marlborough Hotel, and was sitting in his room writing a lecture that he was going to deliver. A very severe gale was blowing that day. He stopped in his writing, being at a loss for a word. He clasped his hands over his head, and tilted his chair back, while hesitating about the word he wished to make use of. Just while he was doing this the storm blew down a chimney, and a great mass of bricks and mortar came tearing through the roof and the ceiling, and crushed the table on which he had been writing. If he had not leaned back on his chair at that very moment he would have been killed instantly. The hole made in the roof was from ten to fourteen feet in width. What was it which led this minister to lean back at that very moment, and so to save his life? It was not an accident or chance that happened to him. In a world where God is always present everywhere there can be no such thing as accident or chance to the children of God. It was perhaps one of His ministering angels who led him to tip back his chair and thus to save his life.

THREE CROSSES.

A Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world,"—GALATIANS 6:14.

Paul's Jealousy for the Prominence of the Cross—Three Crucifixions—I. Christ Crucified—Paul Gloried in the Doctrine, not the Material—Reasons for Glorying in the Cross—1. It Exhibits the Attributes of God—2. It Manifests the Love of Jesus—3. It Makes an End of Sin—4. It is the Greatest Moral Power—II. The World Crucified—Paul Despised the World's Judgment and its Pleasures—The World's Treasures—III. The Christian Crucified—The Consequences of Becoming a Christian.

THE apostle warms with emotion at the thought of anybody presuming to set a carnal ordinance in front of the cross, by wishing to glory in circumcision or any other outward institution. The idea of a ceremony claiming to be made more of than faith in Jesus provoked him, till his heart presently grew hot with indignation, and he thundered forth the words, "God forbid!" He never used the sacred name with lightness; but when the fire was hot within him he called God to witness that he did not, and could not, glory in any thing but the cross. Indeed, there is to every true-hearted believer something shocking and revolting in the putting of any thing before Jesus Christ, be it what it may—whether it be an idol of superstition or a toy of scepticism, whether it be the fruit of tradition or the flower of philosophy.

Do you want new Scriptures to supplement the true sayings of God? Do you want a new Saviour who can surpass Him whom the Father hath sealed? Do you want a new sacrifice that can save you from sins which His atoning blood could not expiate? Do you want a modern song to supersede the new song of "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain"? "O foolish Galatians!" said Paul. O silly Protestants! I am inclined to say. We might go on in these times to speak warmly to many of the parties around us—the doting Ritualists, the puffed-up Rationalists, and the self-exalting school of modern thought. I marvel not to Paul's warmth. I only wish that some who think so little of doctrinal discrepancies, as they call them, could but sympathize a little with his holy indignation when he saw the first symptoms of departure from godly simplicity and sincerity. Do you not notice that a little dissembling of a dear brother made him withstand him to his face?

When a whole company turned the cold shoulder to the cross of Christ it made him burn with indignation. He could not brook it. The cross was the centre of his hopes; around it his affections twined; there he had found peace to his troubled conscience. God forbid that he should allow it to be trampled on. Besides, it was the theme of his ministry. "Christ crucified" had already proved the power of God to salvation to every soul who had believed the life-giving message as he proclaimed it in every city. Would any of you, he asks, cast a slur on the cross—you who have been converted—you before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified among you? How his eyes flash; how his lips quiver, how his heart grows hot within him; with what vehemence he protests: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." He spreads his eagle wing, and rises into eloquence at once, while still his keen eye looks fiercely upon every enemy of the cross whom he leaves far behind.

Oftentimes in his epistles you observe this. He burns, he glows, he mounts, he soars, he is carried clean away as soon as his thoughts are in fellowship with his Lord Jesus, that meek and patient sufferer, who offered Himself a sacrifice for our sins. When His tongue begins to speak of the glorious work which the Christ of God has done for the sons of men it finds a sudden liberty, and he becomes as "a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words." May we have something of that glow within our breasts to-night, and whenever we think of our Lord. God forbid that we should be cold-hearted when we come near to Jesus; God forbid that we should ever view with heartless eye and lethargic soul the sweet wonders of that cross on which our Saviour loved and died. Let us, then, in that spirit, approach our text; and we notice at once three crucifixions. These are the summary of the text. "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ;" that is, Christ crucified. "By whom," or, "by which" (read it whichever way you like), "the world is crucified unto me;" that is, a crucified world. "And I unto the world;" that is, Paul himself, or the believer, crucified with Christ. I see, again, Calvary before me with its three crosses—Christ in the centre, and on either side of Him a crucified person: one who dies to feel the second death, and another who dies to be with Him in Paradise. At these three crosses let us proceed to look.

I. First, then, the main part of our subject lies in in whom Paul glorified. I call your attention to the language; "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross." Some popular authors and public speakers, when they have to state a truth, count it necessary to clothe it in very delicate language. They, perhaps, do not quite intend to conceal its point and edge; but, at any rate, they do not want the projecting angles and bare surfaces of the truth to be too observable, and therefore they cast a cloak around it; they are careful to scabbard the sword of the Spirit.

The Apostle Paul might have done so here, if he had chosen, but he disdains the artifice. He presents the truth "in the worst possible form," as his opponents say—"in all its naked hideousness," as the Jew would have it; for he does not say, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the death of Christ;" but in the cross. You do not realize, I think—we cannot do so in these days—how the use of that word "cross" would grate on ears refined in Galatia and elsewhere. In those days it meant the felon's tree, the hangman's gibbet; and the apostle, therefore, does not hesitate to put it just so: "Save in that gibbet on which my Master died."

We have become so accustomed to associate the name of the "cross" with other sentiments that it does not convey to us that sense of disgrace which it would inflict upon those who heard Paul speak. A family sensitively shrinks if one of its members has been hanged; and much the same would be the natural feeling of one who was told that his leader was crucified. Paul puts it thus baldly, he lets it jar thus harshly, though it may prove to some a stumbling-block, and to others foolishness; but he will not cloak it, he glories in the cross!"

On the other hand, I earnestly entreat you to observe how he seems to contrast the glory of the person with the shame of the suffering; for it is not simply the death of Christ, nor of Jesus, nor of Jesus Christ, nor of the Lord Jesus Christ, but of "our Lord Jesus Christ." Every word tends to set forth the excellence of His person, the majesty of His character, and the interest which all the saints have in Him. It was a cross, but it was the cross of our Lord: let us worship Him! It was the cross of our Lord Jesus the Saviour: let us love Him! It was the cross of our Jesus Christ, the anointed Messiah: let us reverence Him! Let us sit at His feet and learn of Him!

What did He mean, however, by the cross? Of course He cared nothing for the particular piece of wood to which those blessed hands and feet were nailed, for that was mere materialism, and has perished out of mind. He means the glorious doctrine of substitution—free justification through the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ. This is what He means by the cross—the expiation for sin which our Lord Jesus Christ made by His death, and the gift of eternal life freely bestowed on all those who by grace are led to trust in Him. To Paul the cross means just what the brazen serpent meant to Moses. As the brazen serpent in the wilderness was the hope of the sin-bitten, and all that Moses had to do was to bid them look and live, so to-day the cross of Christ—the atonement of Jesus Christ—is the hope of mankind, and our mission is continually to cry, "Look and live! Look and live!"

It is this doctrine, this Gospel of Christ crucified, at which the present age, with all its vaunted culture and all its vain philosophies, sneers so broadly—it is this doctrine wherein we glory. We are not ashamed to put it very definitely: we glory in substitution, in the vicarious sacrifice of Jesus in our stead. He was "made sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." We believe in the imputation of sin to the innocent person of our covenant Head and Representative, in the bearing of the penalty by that substituted One, and the clearing by faith of those for whom He bore the punishment of sin.

Now we glory in this. We glory in it, not as men sometimes boast in a creed which they have received by tradition from their forefathers, for we have learned this truth, each one for himself by the inward teaching of the Holy Ghost, and therefore it is very dear to us. We glory in it with no empty boast, but to the inward satisfaction of our own hearts; we prove that satisfaction by the devout consecration of our lives to make it known. We have trusted our souls to its truth. If it be a fable our hopes are forever shipwrecked, our all is embarked in that venture.

We are quite prepared to run that risk, content to perish if this salvation should fail us. We live upon this faith. It is our meat and our drink. Take this away there is nothing left us in the Bible worth the having. It has become to us the head and front of our confidence, our hope, our rest, our joy. Instead of being ashamed to preach it, we wish that we could stand somewhere where all the inhabitants of the earth should hear us, and we would thunder it out day and night. So far from being ashamed of acknowledging it, we count it to be our highest honor and our greatest delight to tell it abroad, as we have opportunity, among the sons of men.

But why do we rejoice in it? Why do we glory in it? The answer is so large that I cannot do more than glance at its manifold claims on our gratitude. We glory in it for a thousand reasons. We fail to see any thing in the doctrine of atonement that we should not glory in. We have heard a great many dogs bark against it, but dogs will bay the moon in her brightness, and therefore we mind not their howlings. Their noise has sometimes disturbed, though never yet has it frightened us.

We have not yet heard a cavil against our Lord or an argument against His atoning blood which has affected our faith the turn of a hair. The Scriptures affirm it, the Holy Ghost bears witness to it, and its effect upon our inner life assures us of it. The analogy between Jewish fasts and festivals and our Christian faith indorses it; there is a chasm that no man yet has been able to bridge without it; it lightens our conscience, gladdens our hearts, inspires our devotion, and elevates our aspirations; we are wedded to it, and we do glory in it.

1. In the cross of Christ we glory, because we regard it as a matchless exhibition of the attributes of God. We see there the love of God desiring a way by which he might save mankind, aided by his wisdom, so that a plan is perfected by which the deed can be done without violation of truth and justice. In the cross we see a strange conjunction of what once appeared to be two opposite qualities—justice and mercy. We see how God is supremely just; as just as if He had no mercy, and yet infinitely merciful in the gift of His Son. Mercy and justice in fact become counsel upon the same side, and irresistibly plead for the acquittal of the believing sinner. We can never tell which of the attributes of God shines most glorious in the sacrifice of Christ; they each one find a glorious high throne in the person and work of the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.

2. We glory in it, next, as the manifestation of the love of Jesus. He was loving inasmuch as He came to earth at all; loving in feeding the hungry, in healing the sick, in raising the dead. He was loving in His whole life: He was embodied charity, the Prince of philanthropists, the King of kindly souls. But oh, His death!—His cruel and shameful death—bearing, as we believe He did, the wrath due to sin, subjecting Himself to the curse, though in Him was no sin—this shows the love of Christ at its highest altitude, and therefore do we glory in it, and will never be ashamed to do so.

We glory in the cross, moreover, because it is the putting away of sin. There was no other way of making an end of sin, and making reconciliation for iniquity. To forgive the transgressions without exacting the penalty would have been contrary to all the threatenings of God. It would not have appeased the claims of justice, nor satisfied the conscience of the sinner. No peace of mind can be enjoyed without pardon, and conscience declares that no pardon can be obtained without an atonement. We should have distracted ourselves with the fear that it was only a reprieve, and not a remission, even if the most comforting promises had been given unsealed with the atoning blood. The instincts of nature have convinced men of this truth, for all the world over religion has been associated with sacrifice.

Almost every kind of worship that has ever sprung up among the sons of man has had sacrifice for its most prominent feature; crime must be avenged, evil and sin cry from the ground, and a victim is sought to avert the vengeance. The heart craves for something that can calm the conscience: that craving is a relic of the ancient truth learned by man in primeval ages. Now, Christ did make His soul an offering for sin, when His own self He bear our sins in His own body on the tree. With His expiring breath He said, "It is finished!" O wondrous grace! Pardon is now freely published among the sons of men, pardon of which we see the justice and validity. As far as the east is from the west, so far hath God removed our transgressions from us by the death of Christ. This and this alone will put away sin, therefore in this cross of Christ we glory; yea, and in it alone will we glory evermore.

Yet we should not glory so much in the cross, were we not convinced that it is the greatest moral power in all the world. We glory in the cross because it gets at men's hearts when nothing else can reach them. The story of the dying Saviour's love has often impressed those whom all the moral lectures in the world could neve have moved. Judged and condemned by th unanswerable reasonings of their own consciences, they have not had control enough over thei passions to shake off the captivity in which the were held by the temptations that assailed the at every turn till they have drawn near to th cross of Jesus, and from pardon have gathere hope, and from hope have gained strength t master sin.

When they have seen their sin laid on Jesus they have loved Him, and hated the sin th made Him to suffer so grievously as their subst tute. Then the Holy Ghost has come upo them, and they have resolved, with divin strength, to drive out the sin for which the Sa iour died; they have begun a new life, ay, an they have continued in it, sustained by th same sacred power which first constrained the and now they look forward to be perfected by through the power of God. Where are the t umphs of infidelity in rescuing men from sin? Where are the trophies of philosophy in conquering human pride? Will you bring us harlots that have been made chaste; thieves that have been reclaimed; angry men, of bear-like temper, who have become harmless as lambs, through scientific lectures?

Let our amateur philanthropists, who suggest so much and do so little, produce some instances of the moral transformations that have been wrought by their sophistries. Nay; they curl their lips, and leave the lower orders to the City Missionary and the Bible Woman. It is the cross that humbles the haughty, lifts up the fallen, refines the polluted, and gives a fresh start to those who are forlorn and desperate. Nothing else can do it. The world sinks lower and lower into the bog of its own selfishness and sin. Only this wondrous lever of the atonement, symbolized by the cross of Christ, can lift our abject race to the place of virtue and honor which it ought to occupy.

II. The second cross exhibits

THE WORLD CRUCIFIED.

The apostle says that the world was crucified to him. What does he mean by this? He regarded the world as nailed up like a felon, and hanged upon a cross to die. Well, I suppose he means that its character was condemned. He looked out upon the world which thought so much of itself, and said, "I do not think much of thee, poor world! Thou art like a doomed malefactor." He knew that the world had crucified its Saviour—crucified its God. It had gone to such a length of sin that it had hounded perfect innocence through the streets. Infinite benevolence it had scoffed at and maligned. Eternal truth it had rejected, and preferred a lie; and the Son of God, who was love incarnate, it had put to the death of the cross.

"Now," says Paul, "I know thy character, O world! I know thee! and I hold thee in no more esteem than the wretch abhorred for his crimes, who is condemned to hang upon the gibbet and so end his detested life." This led Paul, since he condemned its character, utterly to despise its judgment. The world said, "This Paul is a fool. His Gospel is foolishness, and he himself is a mere babbler." "Yes," thought Paul, "a deal you know of it!" In this we unite with him. What is your judgment worth? You did not know the Son of God, poor blind world! We are sure that he was perfect, and yet you hunted him to death. Your judgment is a poor thing, O world! You are crucified to us. Now, there are a great many people who could hardly endure to live if they should happen to be misjudged by the world or what is called "society." Oh yes! we must be respectable. We must have every man's good word, or we are ready to faint.

Paul was of another mind. What cared he for aught the world might say? How could he wish to please a world so abominable that it had put his Lord to death. He would sooner have its bad opinion than its good. It were better to be frowned at than to be smiled upon by a world that crucified Christ. Certainly, its condemnation is more worth having than its approbation if it can put Christ to death: so Paul utterly despised its judgment, and it was crucified to him. Now, we are told to think a great deal about "public opinion," "popular belief," "the growing feeling of the age," "the sentiment of the period," and "the spirit of the age." I should like Paul to read some of our (so-called) religious newspapers; and yet I could not wish the good man so distasteful a task, for I dare say he would sooner pine in the Mamertine prison than do so; but, still, I should like to see how he would look after he had read some of those expressions about the necessity of keeping ourselves abreast with the sentiment of the period. "What," he would say, "the sentiment of the world! It is crucified to me! What can it matter what its opinion is? We are of God, little children, and the whole world lieth in the wicked one; would ye heed what the world, that is lying in the wicked one, thinks of you or of the truth of your Lord? Are you going to smooth your tongue, and soften your speech, to please the world that lieth in the wicked one!" Paul would be indignant with such a proposition. He said, "The world is crucified to me." Hence he looked upon all the world's pleasures as so much rottenness, a carcass nailed to a cross. Can you fancy Paul being taken to the Coliseum at Rome? I try to imagine him made to sit on one of those benches to watch a combat of gladiators. There is the emperor: there are all the great peers of Rome and the senators; and there are those cruel eyes all gazing down upon men who shed each others' blood.

Can you picture how Paul would have felt if he had been forced to occupy a seat at that spectacle? It would have been martyrdom to him. He would have closed his eyes and ears against the sight of what Rome thought to be the choicest pleasure of the day. They thronged the imperial city; they poured in mighty streams into the theatre each day to see poor beasts tortured, or men murdering one another: that was the world of Paul's day; and he rightly judged it to be a crucified felon. If he was compelled to see the popular pleasures of to-day, upon which I will say but little, would he not be wellnigh as sick of them as he would have been of the amusements of the amphitheatre at Rome?

To Paul, too, all the honors of the age must have been crucified in like manner. Suppose that Paul settled his mind to think of the wretches who were reigning as emperors in his day! I use the word advisedly, for I would not speak evil of dignities; but really I speak too well of them when I call them wretches. They seem to have been inhuman monsters—"tyrants whose capricious folly violated every law of nature and decency," to whom every kind of lust was a daily habit, and who even sought out new inventions of sensuality, calling them new pleasures. As Paul thought of the iniquities of Napoli, and all the great towns to which the Romans went in their holidays—Pompeii and the like—oh, how he loathed them!

And I doubt not that if the apostle were to come here now, if he knew how often rank and title are wont to sink all true dignity in shameful dissipation, and what flagrant profligacy is to be found in high quarters, he might as justly consider all the pomps and dignities and honors of the world that now is to be as little worth as a putrid carcass hanging on a tree and rotting in the sun. He says, "The world is crucified to me: it is hanging on the gallows to me, I think so little of its pleasures and of its pomps."

Alike contemptuously did Paul judge of all the treasures of the world. Paul never spent as much time as it would take to wink his eye in thinking of how much money he was worth. Having food and raiment he was therewith content. Sometimes he had scarcely that. He casually thanks the Philippians for ministering to his necessities, but he never sought to store any thing, nor did he live with even half a thought of aggrandizing himself with gold and silver. "No," he said, "this will all perish with the using," and so he treated the world as a thing crucified to him. Now, Christian man, can you say as much as this—that the world, in its mercantile aspect, as well as in its motley vices and its manifold frivolities, is a crucified thing to you?

Now, look what the world says. "Make money, young man, make money! Honestly if you can, but by all means make money. Look about you, for if you are not sharp you will not succeed. Keep your own counsel, and rather play the double than be the dupe. Your character will rise with the credit you get on 'Change." Now, suppose that you get the money, what is the result? The net result, as I often find it, is a paragraph in one of the newspapers to say that So-and-so Esquire's will was proved in the Probate Court under so many thousands. Then follows a grand squabble among all his relatives which shall eat him up. That is the consummation of a life of toil and care and scheming. He has lived for lucre, and he has to leave it behind. There is the end of that folly.

I have sometimes thought of the contrast between the poor man's funeral and the rich man's funeral. When the poor man dies there are his sons and daughters weeping with real distress, for the death of the father brings sadness and sympathy into that house. The poor man is to be buried, but it can only be managed by the united self-denials of all his sons and daughters. There is Mary out at service; she, perhaps, contributes more than the others towards the funeral, for she has no family of her own. The elder son and the younger brothers all pinch themselves to pay a little; and the tears that are shed that evening when they come home from the grave are very genuine: they do suffer, and they prove their sorrow by rivalling one another in the respect they pay to their parent.

Now you shall see the rich man die. Of course everybody laments the sad loss: it is the proper thing. Empty carriages swell the procession to the grave by way of empty compliment. The mourners return, and there is the reading of that blessed document, the will; when that is read the time for tears is over in almost every case. Few are pleased; the one whom fortune favors is the envy of all the rest. Sad thoughts and sullen looks float on the surface, not in respect to the man's departure, but concerning the means he has left and the mode in which he has disposed of them.

Oh! it is a poor thing to live for, the making of money and the hoarding of it. But still the genius of rightly getting money can be consecrated to the glory of God. You can use the wealth of this world in the service of the Master. To gain is not wrong. It is only wrong when grasping becomes the main object of life, and grudging grows into covetousness which is idolatry. To every Christian that and every other form of worldliness ought to be crucified, so that we can say, "For me to live is not myself, but it is Christ; I live that I may honor and glorify Him."

When the apostle said that the world was crucified to him, he meant just this: "I am not enslaved by any of its pursuits. I care nothing for its maxims. I am not governed by its spirit. I do not court its smiles. I do not fear its threatenings. It is not my master, nor am I its slave. The whole world cannot force Paul to lie, or to sin, but Paul will tell the world the truth, come what may." You recollect the words of

when the King of France said to him that if he did not change his religion, and cease to be a Huguenot, he was afraid that he should have to deliver him up to his enemies. "Sire," said the potter, "I am sorry to hear you say, 'I am afraid,' for all the men in the world could not make Palissy talk like that. I am afraid of nobody, and I must do nothing but what is right."

Oh, yes; the man that fears God and loves the cross has a moral backbone which enables him to stand, and he snaps his fingers at the world. "Dead felon!" says he, "dead felon! Crucifier of Christ! Cosmos thou callest thyself. By comely names thou wouldst fain be greeted. Paul is nothing in thine esteem; but Paul is a match for thee, for he thinks as much of thee as thou dost of him, and no more." Hear him as he cries, "The world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." To live to serve men is one thing, to live to bless them is another; and this we will do, God helping us, making sacrifices for their good. But to fear men, to ask their leave to think, to ask their instructions as to what we shall speak, and how we shall say it—that is a baseness we cannot brock. By the grace of God, we have not so degraded ourselves, and never shall. "The world is crucified to me," says the apostle, "by the cross of Christ."

III. Then he finishes up with the third crucifixion, which is,

I AM CRUCIFIED TO THE WORLD.

We shall soon see the evidence of this crucifixion if we notice how they poured contempt upon him. Once Saul was a great rabbi, a man profoundly versed in Hebrew lore, a Pharisee of the Pharisees, and much admired. He was also a classic scholar and a philosophic thinker, a man of great mental powers, and fit to take the lead in learned circles. But when Paul began to preach Christ crucified—"Bah," they said, "he is an utter fool! Heed him not!" Or else they said, "Down with him! He is an apostate!" They cursed him. His name brought wrath into the face of all Jews that mentioned it, and all intelligent Greeks likewise. "Paul? He is nobody!" He was everybody when he thought their way: he is nobody now that he thinks in God's way.

And then they put him to open shame by suspecting all his motives, and by misrepresenting all his actions. It did not matter what Paul did, they were quite certain that he was self-seeking; that he was endeavoring to make a fine thing of it for himself. When he acted so that they were forced to own that he was right, they put it in such a light that they made it out to be wrong. There were some who denied his apostleship, and said that he was never sent of God; and others questioned his ability to preach the Gospel. So they crucified poor Paul one way and another to the full.

They went further still. They despised, they shunned him. His old friends forsook him. Some got out of the way, others pointed at him the finger of scorn in the streets. His persecutors showed their rancor against him, now stoning him with lynch-law, and anon with a semblance of legality dragging him before the magistrates. Paul was crucified to them. As for his teaching, they decried him as a babbler—a setter-forth of strange gods. I dare say they often sneered at the cross of Christ which he preached as a nine days' wonder, an almost exploded doctrine, and said, "If you do but shut the mouths of such men as Paul, it will soon be forgotten." I have heard them say in modern times to lesser men, "Your old-fashioned Puritanism is nearly dead; ere-long it will be utterly extinct!" But we preach Christ crucified; the same old doctrine as the apostles preached, and for this by the contempt of the worldly wise we are crucified.

Now, dear Christian friends, if you keep to the cross of Christ you must expect to have this for your portion. The world will be crucified to you, and you will be crucified to the world. You will get the cold shoulder. Old friends will become open foes. They will begin to hate you more than they loved you before. At home your foes will be the men of your own household. You will hardly be able to do any thing right.

When you joined in their revels you were a fine fellow; when you could drink, and sing a lascivious song, you were a jolly good fellow; but now they rate you as a fool; they scout you as a hypocrite; and slanderously blacken your character. Let their dislike be a badge of your discipleship, and say, "Now also the world is crucified to me and I unto the world. Whatever the world says against me for Christ's sake is the maundering of a doomed malefactor, and what do I care for that? And, on the other hand, if I be rejected and despised, I am only taking what I always expected—my crucifixion—in my poor, humble way, after the manner of Christ himself, who was despised and rejected of men."

The moral and the lesson of it all is this: Whatever comes of it, still glory in Christ. Go in for this, dear friends, that whether ye be in honor or in dishonor, in good report or in evil report, whether God multiply your substance and make you rich, or diminish it and make you poor, you [illegible] still glory in the cross of Christ. If you have health, and strength and vigor to work for Him, or if you have to lie upon a bed of languishing and bear in patience all your heavenly Father's will, resolve that you will still glory in the cross. Let this be the point of your glorying throughout our lives. Go down the steeps of Jordan, and go through Jordan itself, still glorying in the cross, for in the heaven of glory you will find that the blood-bought hosts celebrate the cross as the trophy of their redemption.

Are you trusting in the cross? Are you resting in Jesus? If not, may the Lord teach you this blessed privilege. There is no joy like it. There is no strength like it. There is no life like it. There is no peace like it. At the cross we find our heaven. While upon the cross we gaze, all heavenly, holy things abound within our hearts. If you have never been there, the Lord lead you there at this very hour; so shall you be pardoned, accepted, and blest for aye. The Lord grant that you all may be partakers of this grace for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

WHILE the parting interview between the two lovers was taking place within, a weary man with a letter in his hand stood without, anxiously awaiting Christian's appearance. One by one the lights went out in the windows; one by one the passers-by disappeared from the quiet street. The moon rose over the distant hills like a huge ball of fire; rose higher and higher in the clear heavens with a gradually silvering light, and still he waited.

The city clocks struck out the passing hours; the low fall of the waves on the shore was the only sound of the silent night, for it was past midnight, and the city was asleep.

In the distance at last was heard the sound of approaching footsteps, and the almost wearied-out watcher roused himself.

"Here he is at last!" he murmured; "I thought he'd never come."

With quick, hurried steps, Christian Hilliard came up the street, and stopped at one of the doors. Taking out his latch-key, he was about to let himself in, when a timid touch on his arm made him turn quickly.

"What on earth are you doing here this time of night?" he exclaimed in astonishment. "Is any thing the matter?"

"I beg your pardon for intruding, sir," was the low, tremulous answer. "Will you please to read this when you get in? It won't take you long," he added, entreatingly.

"What is it? Here, Milby, where are you off in such a hurry?" cried Christian, as the man began to move away.

"I only wanted to give you that, Mr. Christian. I've been waiting here since dark. You will read it, won't you, sir?"

"Read it! of course I will. It was written to be read, I suppose. Come in and have a glass of something—wine, ale, any thing you like."

"I'd rather not, sir; indeed I'd rather not. If you'd please to let me go, Mr. Christian."

"Go on, then," said Christian, good-humoredly. "I believe you're afraid I shall make you drunk. You are a teetotaler, aren't you?"

"Yes, sir; good-night, sir," said Milby, looking round with fearful eyes. "You won't let anyone know I wrote that, will you, Mr. Christian?"

"Of course not. There, make haste home to bed; I'm sure that is the best place for you." He put his hand in his pocket as he spoke, with the ready generosity which was always prompting him to give of his abundance to those who had need. Seeing him do it, Milby hurried down the street, and in a few moments was out of sight round the corner.

Christian went in and shut the door. Turning up the gas, he found a whole budget of letters lying on the table. They had come by the late evening post, and among them were some he had been anxiously expecting for days.

The sight of these banished all thought of the letter he had just received, and thrusting it with his gloves into his pocket, he sat down, and was soon absorbed in their contents, forgetting the lateness of the hour. In vain the clock warned him that morning was drawing near; there were answers to be written, and he must write them; there would be no time in the morning. Wearied out at last, he rose and swept the letters aside.

"That's done!" he murmured, still forgetting Milby's letter. If he had read that he would not have gone on his voyage; probably the ship itself would not have gone, and a world of sorrow and agony would have been prevented. It was one of those little oversights which so often occur in our lives—the little thing on which so great issues hang.

"Now for bed," said Christian, "and my last sleep on shore."

He slept heavily and late. The sun was shining high in the heavens when he drew aside his curtains the next morning, and for a few minutes he stood in silence, watching the busy world below. A knock at the door roused him from the reverie into which he had fallen. One of the sailors had come for his portmanteau. He hurried down, and found Cairns waiting in the hall.

"The skipper sent me for your portmanteau, or any thing else you wish to send on board, sir," he said, in an absent, preoccupied tone. There was a tired look about him which attracted Christian's attention.

"What is the matter, Cairns?" he asked, kindly; "you look as if you had been up all night."

"So I have, sir. It's the little maid; she has been very ill, and the doctor seemed rather queer about her. I asked him if she was going to die, but he said he hoped not yet."

"But it's very sudden, isn't it, Cairns? Is it the one I saw last night?"

"Yes, sir; it's Nannie. No, it ain't what you may call really sudden. You see, she've been in a sort of decline for the last year or two; just quietly fading away from us; and I suppose nothing can save her. I don't think she'll last much longer."

"Don't you think she will live till you come back?" asked Christian, with sympathy.

"Well, sir, the doctor says he thinks she will, and he ought to know more than me. She sticks to it that she's going: that's the queer part of it! —the child seems to know."

"Would you rather not go, Cairns?" said Christian. "Would you like to give up this voyage."

Cairns shook his head. "No sir, thank you. I should have to do something, get another ship, you see, and I mightn't find a berth on any of them short voyagers. I've had such a many frights about Nannie afore now."

He shouldered the portmanteau and went off, his usually bluff, hearty face subdued and saddened.

"Everybody has some trouble," though Christian. "No one escapes in this world.' He sat down at the breakfast-table, debatin within him whether he should go and see his father or not. He had resolved not to go, feelin only too sure of the manner of his reception; bu now that the starting-day had really come, h hesitated, his resolution wavering.

"I have plenty of time to ride over," he murmured. "It doesn't seem the right sort of thin to sail, for no one knows how long a voyag without a word from him. I think I will go."

Mr. Hilliard sat at his lonely breakfast-tabl reading the paper. At every sound outside th house he started, looking up with anxious, expectant eyes. He looked haggard and worn, an the breakfast before him was untouched, th coffee and steak rapidly getting cold.

Up the drive, at last, dashed Christian's beautiful mare, her glossy coat gleaming in the su shine. At the hall-door she stopped of her ow accord, arching her slender neck as if proud the firm, cool hand on her rein. Giving her pat, and an injunction to stand still till he can out again, Christian entered the house.

"Good-morning, sir," he said, frankly extending his hand. "I have run over to wish you good-by. The Eglantine sails this afternoon."

Mr. Hilliard looked coldly up. "You have given yourself needless trouble," he answered, ignoring his son's outstretched hand.

"I have still several things to see to before I go on board," said Christian, restraining a strong inclination to walk out of the room; "but I knew Lucrece would bring me here and back in a few minutes, so I had the saddle put on."

He stood before his father in his stately, gracious manhood, waiting with quiet dignity for the word or look of reconciliation, but waited in vain.

"If you can spare a few minutes, sir, I should like to speak to you on one or two subjects before I go," he said, patiently. "My time is very valuable."

"So is mine," was the brief reply.

"I know it, and I will not trespass upon it. What I have to say will only occupy a few minutes."

"Which I have not to spare," said Mr. Hilliard, rising from his seat.

"Then I will wish you good-morning. I am sorry if I have disturbed you," said Christian, with an expression half of annoyance, half of pain. Again he stretched out his hand, and after a moment's hesitation Mr. Hilliard touched it with the tips of his fingers.

The door closed, and then he heard Lucrece galloping down the drive, and he was once more alone. Alone! and his only son on his way to a watery grave. Do what he would, he could not banish the thought. In vain he strove to comfort himself with the recollection of other vessels which had safely weathered the wild storms of the Atlantic, and reached home unharmed, although they had been as unseaworthy as the Eglantine.

Taking his telescope, he went upstairs to a little room, from which he was accustomed to watch his vessels sail out of the docks. Slowly passed the weary hours as he waited and watched—watched for the black-hulled ship which was taking his son out among the dread perils of the deep. He knew she would not sail till late in the afternoon, and yet he sat at the open window, straining his eyes, tormented by the vague fear that she might in some unguarded minute pass, and he not see her.

She came at last; her sails idly flapping in the scarcely perceptible breeze, her black hull blacker than ever, her dingy, battered figure-head giving flat contradiction to the sweet suggestiveness of her graceful name. Lower in the western sky sank the setting sun, shedding its flood of light upon the tranquil sea. And into the golden glory sailed the Eglantine, a fresh wind catching her sails and speeding her over the glittering waves. Like a dark speck she appeared, and was then gradually lost in the glowing west.

Then he went to his office and sought by unceasing attention to business to banish the thought of what he had done. The first to arrive in the morning, the last to leave at night, his energy seemed untiring; his desire was to get continuous occupation, not to leave a moment free, for he found that if he did so, in that moment a vision of the Eglantine with her precious freight rose before his mind. He imagined her in all kinds of circumstances—wallowing in the trough of the sea, her rotten timbers parting asunder, or going down with all on board; then he saw her in a gale at night, pitching and tossing for a time, and at last sinking stern foremost. His thoughts seemed to be filled with a powerful spring which, when released from business, always flew to the ship and always painted her in distress ending in wreck. He dreaded the night most, for there in his solitary home, with no business matters to fill his mind, he was attacked with horrible presentiments. Remorse if not repentance took possession of him, and he yearned, as he had never yearned for any thing before in his life, once more to see his son and to press him to his heart.

But even yet repentance toward God he experienced not; his sin had led him into a difficulty, and having done that he hated it, was sorry for it in that light, but apart from its consequences he did not abhor it. God, the avenger of widows and orphans, was angry with him, but Richard Hilliard thought not of that. With him the perpetual bemoaning of himself was, that his sin was coming home to him, that he had been compelled by his position to sacrifice his son; but that he had sinned against God and thereby wronged his own soul (Prov. 9: 36), occasioned him no distress.

That was an anxious time for the merchant, and his anxiety affected the whole man. People observed that he was growing more and more morose as the weeks went on. His clerks grew restive beneath the iron hand which held so stern a check upon them, and secretly hated the cold impenetrable face which only appeared to herald reproof and withering sarcasm.

The bright warm days gave place to wintry winds and biting frosts or dreary fogs. At last news came that the Eglantine had reached her port in safety, after a quick and easy voyage, and was busy unloading. Richard Hilliard's heart grew lighter. "If she got there safely, why shouldn't she come back with equal safety?" he thought, and comforted himself with the thought. To one thing he made up his mind—he would sell the Eglantine, and never run such a risk again. Once let him see her safe in the docks again, and she should never sail out again claiming him for her owner.

So he said to himself, and as the time passed he passed under a fresh influence. He blamed himself for his forebodings, and chid himself as he would have done a nervous child for his fright. He hardened himself more and more against the son who, to use his own words, had set his authority at defiance, and abetted the crew in their rebellion. More determinedly than ever he resolved to give no countenance to his engagement with Maud Ingleton, and to disown and disinherit him if he persisted in marrying an almost penniless girl.

MAN AND HIS MASTERS.

A London Oration by J. B. Gough.

Slaves to Sin and their Memories—Cowardly Men—Divers after Pearls—Mr. Gough's Affecting Interview with a Hard Case—Luke the Drunkard and his Patient Wife—Blight of Intemperance—True Love to Our Neighbor—A Plague-stricken Vessel—Christ's Example—Enthusiastic Excitement about the Missing Steamship Atlantic.

Oh! let me recount to you one day in my own life—just but one day. It was a bitter day to me—the most miserable day I ever witnessed; and God in His mercy save me from such another! It was the 4th of July, 1842, in the city of Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts. I was then working at my trade as a bookbinder, and the morning dawned bright and beautiful, and others were enjoying themselves. I had no friend. I had plenty of acquaintances, but not a friend. Acquaintances are not always friends. It is easy to say "no friends"—it is hard to feel it; to be like a waif upon life's wave, like a bubble upon the breaker, no man caring for your soul. And therefore I worked at my trade, for I cared not to enjoy all that was to be enjoyed by others that day.

I was hammering away at my books, and I heard music. I am passionately fond of music; I heard it, and I started. It came nearer and nearer, and I took off my apron, and put on my jacket, and said, "I'll go and hear the music at any rate." I went to the door, and some one said, "A very beautiful sight! beautiful sight!" "Yes," said a gentleman, "it is; what is it?" "Oh! it is the Temperance Society that is going forth at the back of the hospital to a sort of picnic there; some ministers are to speak to them." The moment I heard the word temperance I said to myself, "Temperance Society! oh! I have got nothing to do with them;" and off went my coat, and on went my apron, and I hammered away again. But the music came nearer, and nearer, and nearer; and the beating of the drum and the sounds of the instruments came full upon my ear; and I said to myself, "I don't care whether it is a temperance band or not—I'll go and hear the music."

Off went my apron again, and on went my jacket, and I went and leaned against the post of the hotel; and I looked as a great many affect to look at the temperance movement. I put a sneer on my lip, as much as to say, "Oh! a parcel of old women and children! a lot of people that can't take care of themselves! ah! ah!" I intended that those who passed should see and admire my utter contempt of the whole movement. I looked at them—the sneer on my lip, bad thoughts in my heart; and when the last little boy had turned the corner, it seemed as if a beautiful picture had been hidden from me suddenly, and I straightened myself up to go back again. But I wiped away the tears; I struggled to keep down the sobs that seemed as if they would choke me.

Why? I had been, in spite of the sneer, involuntarily thinking — thinking of what? Thinking of happy, care-free days—thinking of the time when I was a boy—thinking of that bright Sabbath of the year when I stood up in the Sunday-school, and repeated two lines of a hymn for the children to sing; thinking too of another time, when William Wilberforce, in the village of Sandgate, my native village, gave me a prayer-book, on my reading to him while I sat upon his knee, and wrote his own name in it with mine. I remembered that; and every pleasant thought and every pleasant reminiscence were there—all distinct, but distant—all clear, but very, very cold; and I contrasted all that with the horrible present, and it seemed as if my heart would break. I bowed my head when I went back to my place of business, and wept like a broken-hearted child.

OH! the memory of a man that is a slave to sin—a slave to any sin; his memory is not pleasant. The memory of the past, unconnected with sin, is pleasant; but contrasted with a present condition of bondage to an evil passion, oh! it is terrible suffering; and yet, in spite of all this, men go on, and on, and on. And not only is this a bondage that brings these qualities down into subjection, but it seems to dry up all the freshness of feeling, and whilst it wipes from a man's face the last lingering trace of human beauty, it seems to dry up the fountain of his affection, and make him a pitiful, selfish being. We often look upon the drunkard as a being altogether naturally our inferior.

We hear of brutal deeds committed by men under its influence, and we look at them and we say, "Oh! the brutes!" So I say; and yet sometimes I am sorry when I say it. When I hear of a man dashing his fist into the face of the woman he has sworn to love, cherish, and protect, I feel the blood tingle at the tips of my fingers.

I believe a man who will strike a woman is a coward—a coward whether drunk or sober: whether it is the long-fingered, soft-handed slave-holder, who will lay the lash by proxy on the back of his black sister, or the man who strikes his wife in the face—he is a coward,—a poor, miserable, pitiable, contemptible coward, and no matter what the provocation may be either—how long her tongue may be or how fast she may talk; it makes no difference at all how aggravating she may be—if a wife should make a man's home a perfect pandemonium for him, until the cloud blows off let him act like a man and run away. If I should see a man running through the streets to-morrow with a woman after him, I should say, "You are a brave fellow!" the very moment he turned and knocked her down I should say, "Ah! you coward!"

But now let us look at the matter for a moment. I do not wish to thrust these opinions upon you; but I wish simply and briefly to bring before you the temperance enterprise. We have in our ranks thousands of reformed drunkards—bright and beautiful pearls some of them, washed by the foul tide of drunkenness under the black rocks of oblivion, and we have been sending divers after them, and bringing some of them up, flashing forth the fire of intellect to-day, and some of them radiant and glowing with the hues of the Christian graces; and among the number of our reformed men you cannot find me a man that is a brute, in this sense of the word, to his family.

There is no power on earth will make a man a fiend like the power of the drink. One circumstance in my own reminiscences I will give to you.

AFFECTING INTERVIEW WITH A VERY HARD CASE.

LUKE THE DRUNKARD AND HIS PATIENT WIFE.

I was asked by an individual to go and see the hardest case there was in the town. I said, "I have no right to go and see him; he will say to me, 'Who sent you to me? who told you I was a drunkard? You mind your business and I will mind mine; you wait until you are sent for; and when I want you I will send for you.'—I have no right," I said, "to go to him." "Well," said he, "he is a hard case; he beat a daughter of his, fourteen years of age, with a bootmaker's strap, so that she will carry the marks to the grave. His wife is very ill now with a bilious fever, and the doctor says he thinks she cannot get over it; the man has not been drinking for some days, and if you can get at him now, I think you might do him good."

I thought I would go. I knocked at the door; he came to open it. He had been to one or two of our meetings. The moment he saw me he knew me. Said he, "Mr. Gough, I believe." "Yes, that is my name: would you be good enough to give me a glass of water, if you please?" "Certainly," said he; "come in." So I got in. I sat on one side of the table, and he sat on the other. There were two children in the room playing together, and a door half-way open that led into the room where the wife was ill. I sat and talked with him about every thing I could think of but the subject; I talked of trade, and crops, and railroads, and money matters; and then I got on to public-houses, and then drinking, and he headed me off in a moment.

I began again; talked of the rising of the river and the badness of the roads, and then drinking, and he headed me off again. I looked, and I thought I saw a malicious twinkle in his eye, as much as to say, "Young man, you are not up to your business yet." I was about to give it up; but, I think providentially, I saw the children. I said to him, "You've got two bright-looking children there, sir." "Oh! yes, yes, bright little things!" Said I, "You love your children, don't you?" "Bless the children, to be sure I love them." Said I, "Wouldn't you do any thing to benefit your children?" He looked at me, as if he thought something else was coming after that. "Well, to be sure, sir," said he, "a man ought to do every thing to benefit his children."

Then I stood up, so that I might get out of the door as speedily as possible, and said, "Don't be angry with me; I am going to ask you a plain and simple question; you know who I am, therefore you won't be angry. Suppose you never used any more intoxicating liquor, don't you think those children would be better off?" "Well, well," said he, "you have got me this time." Said I, "You have got a good wife, haven't you?" "Yes, sir, as good a woman as ever a man had for a wife!" "And you love your wife?" "To be sure I do; it is natural that a man should love his wife." "And you would do any thing you could to please your wife?" "Well, I ought to."

"Suppose you were to sign a temperance pledge, would that please her?" "By thunder, I rather think it would! I could not do a thing that would please my wife like that. If I was to put my name down there, why, the old woman would be up and about her business in two weeks, sick as she is now." Said I, "Then you will do it?" "Yes, I guess I will do it." And he at once opened a closet, took out pen and ink, and I spread out the pledge, and he wrote his name. The children had been listening with eyes, ears, and mouths wide open, while we were talking about temperance. They knew what a drunken father was; they knew what the principle of abstinence would do for him; and when he had signed, one said to the other, "Father has signed the pledge!" "Oh! my!" said the other; "now I'll go and tell my mother;" and away she ran into the other room.

But the mother had heard it; and I listened to her calling, "Luke! Luke! come in here a moment." Said he, "Come in here along with me; come in and see my wife." I went and stood by her bedside. The face was ghastly pale, the eye large and sunk deep in the socket; and with her long, thin, bony fingers, she gripped my hand, and with the other took the hand of her husband, and began to tell me what a good husband she had. "Luke," said she, "is a kind husband and a good father; he takes care of the children and is very kind to them; but the drink, oh! the drink makes terrible difficulty." That difficulty! God only and the crushed wife of the intemperate man know any thing about it.

The man shook like a leaf; he snatched his hand from the grasp of his wife, tore down her night-dress from her shoulder, and said, "Look at that!" and on her white, thin neck, close to the shoulder, was a bad mark. Said he, "Look at that!" and when I saw the mark of a bruise, I felt my flesh creep. Said he, "Look at that, sir! I did it three days before she was taken down upon the bed; and she has told you she has a good husband. Am I? Am I a good husband to her? God Almighty forgive me!" and he bowed over that woman and wept like a child, gripped the bed-clothes in his hand, and hid his face in them. And she laid her thin hand upon his head, and said, "Don't cry, Luke; don't, please don't; you wouldn't have struck me if it had not been for the drink. Mr. Gough, don't believe him; he is as good a man as ever lived. Don't cry, Luke!"

These are the men we call brutes and fiends; strip them from the accursed power of the drink, and they are men, with hearts as warm, and feelings as tender, and sensibilities as keen as yours. Oh! the terrific power of this fearful habit in enslaving the man, in reducing him below the level of the brutes that perish. Oh! when I think of intemperance, the curse of the land; intemperance, that wipes out God's image, and stamps it with the counterfeit die of the devil; intemperance, that smites a healthy body with disease from head to heel, and makes it more loathsome than the leprosy of Naaman or the sores of Lazarus; that dethrones man's reason, and hides her bright beams in the mystic clouds that roll round the shattered temple of the human soul, curtained with midnight; intemperance, that has sent its thousands and tens of thousands into the drunkard's grave and the drunkard's eternity; intemperance, filling your gaols, and your almshouses, and your lunatic asylums;—oh! we might ask the very dead, the drunken dead, to lift the turf above their mouldering bones, and stalk forth, in tattered shrouds and bony whiteness, to testify against the sin of intemperance! It is rolling over the land like a burning tide of desolation; and we plead with young men that they may never subject themselves to this bondage, and that they may do what in them lies to build the wall of prevention between it and their fellows.

Every man is in a degree a slave who is not in entire and constant subjection to righteous law. Every man is a free man, in the highest and truest sense of that term, who renders swift, steadfast, constant obedience to righteous law. "This is the first and the great commandment, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind, soul, and strength: and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: on these two"—not on one or the other—"hang all the law and the prophets." My professions of are utterly worthless unless they beget in me love to my neighbor; and while we would ask young men especially to see to it that they themselves are free, we would ask them, in love and benevolence, in the spirit of sympathy for their brother, to help in freeing him.

And remember, young men, that when you stoop to help a weak brother, you do not make yourselves partakers of his weakness, but you impart to him a portion of your own strength. God supplies to you a double quantity for every portion that you give to a falling, a weak, an erring brother; and therefore we consider the highest position of freedom a man can occupy is not only to be free from vices and evil passions himself, but free to help the oppressed. Ah! the very names you love are the names of those who labored for others, such as Elizabeth Fry, for example, whose name is as familiar as a household word—one of whom many said, "I was sick, and in prison, and she ministered unto me"—one who went to lift up the oppressed—one whom we loved in our heart of hearts, and pray God to raise up others like unto her—a true mother in Israel.

Yes, we speak of those who have labored for others; and young men, those of you who profess to be, those of you who desire to be, followers of Christ, remember Christ pleased not Himself; and we must be prepared, if we would labor for others, and follow Him, and enjoy that true, that perfect liberty which every man may enjoy, we must come in the spirit of self-denial, and with some degree of moral courage, to help our falling and our erring brother. How many are there that need your aid and need your assistance? Oh! if every one in this assembly could but put his arms round one other one, and save him from perdition, it would be worth a lifetime—a lifetime of exertion.

If you can lie down upon the bed of death, and ask, Of what avail has been my living? and only one redeemed by your agency, only one, could stand before you—only one of whom, with your dying eyes fixed upon him, you might feel "God has given me that as a seal to my ministry:" feeble though it may be, it should be enough. It should be enough—for the redemption of one man, when we consider what man is, worth all God's material universe, is worth a lifetime of toil and self-denial to accomplish; and in this we ask you to help your neighbor.

"Who is your neighbor?" Ah! go with me into the lowest dens of vice in this city; go with me into yon garret; go into that damp, filthy cellar, and see a man upon a heap of rotting rags, and his head pillowed with a bundle of mouldering straw, covered, perhaps, as one I knew of was, with an old soldier's coat, and clasping his fingers, that look like the claws of an unclean bird, with his thin lips drawn tight across his teeth, the rattle in the throat telling that the cold fingers of death were feeling for his heart-strings! That debased, degraded, miserable, filthy, pitiable, dying man is your brother—is your neighbor. God has made him, and in one sense he is as much an own child of God Almighty then as on the day when he was carried to be baptized. Oh! we look at man as he has made himself, and we say, with reference to the debased and the degraded, "They have brought it upon themselves, they are unworthy of sympathy," and we pass them by. Oh, how often have we passed them by for fear of contamination!

I remember reading that in mid-ocean a ship was ploughing her way through the sea, and a vessel was spied in the distance, appearing to be in distress; they made all sail to come up to her, and there they saw some miserable, haggard, emaciated, tattered wretches clinging to the shrouds, with scarce strength enough to hold themselves in the position to look over the bulwarks, and they let down the boat, and manned t to go to the rescue of their brethren. When within a boat's length they discovered that the plague was on board; "Hard up the helm, hoist the sail!" and they speed away, to leave their plague-stricken brethren to die in mid-ocean.

So have we left the scenes of degradation; so have we left the poor creatures who are slaves to a fearful habit; and excused ourselves by the thought, "They have brought it all on themselves." Young men, if He who "spake as never man spake"—if He who loved His erring creatures with an unbounded love, had said thus of us, where should we be to-day?—if He had said, "Let them alone, shut them up in the prison-house of dark despair; let them alone, they have brought it on themselves!" But was it so? Oh no!

See Him toiling at the foot of yon hill, with the cross upon His shoulder; see the blood standing upon His forehead; see Him bowed down under the weight of His own cross; see Him again suspended between the heavens and the earth, a malefactor on either side of Him; see Him there; not a groan, not one word of agony, until, in the moment when He "bore our sins in His own body on the tree," He cried out, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani!" for you for me, to redeem us from the terrible curse we had brought upon ourselves.

He did it; and if we are followers of Him, let us stoop to lift the debased, and the degraded, and the low, though we put our hands down deep to our elbows in the slime in which they lie. We may be instrumental in saving our brother, by exercising the self-denial which is required, and the moral courage which every man should have, who goes out to do good to his neighbor, to his brother, to his friend.

A DYING WOMAN'S FAITH.

THE simplicity of faith, says an eminent American minister, was once strikingly illustrated to me in this manner.

I had been preaching my ordinary week-day sermon in the evening, when I was sent for in great haste to visit a woman who was said to be dying, and who very much wished to see me. I went almost immediately to her house, for she was a member of my church, whom I had known for years. When I entered the room where she lay, I found it filled with her friends, who had gathered around her to see her die.

Making my way through the midst of them, I reached the side of her bed, and found her apparently in the last agonies of death. She was bolstered up in her bed, painfully gasping for breath, almost suffocated by the asthma; and the whole bed shook with the palpitation of her heart, which seemed to be shaking her to pieces. It appeared to me that she could not live an hour. I said to her, "Mrs. M., you seem to be very ill?"

"Yes," said she, "I am dying."

"And are you ready to die?"

She lifted her eyes upon me, with a solemn look, and speaking with difficulty, said:

"Sir, God knows—I have taken him—at his word—and I am not afraid—to die."

It was a new and striking definition of faith. "I have taken him at his word." It struck me in an instant as the triumph of faith. "God knows, I have taken him, at his word, and I am not afraid to die." It was just the thing for her to say. I have often since tried to think what else she could have said that would have expressed so much in so few words. I prayed some minutes by her bedside, read some passages of God's Word, and was about to leave her for a moment to her friends, whom she seemed anxious to address. She held me by the hand, and uttering a word at a time, as she gasped for breath, she said to me: "I wanted to tell you—that I can—trust—in God—while—I am dying.—You have—often told me—he would not—forsake me.—And now—I find it true—he does not—forsake me.—I am—at peace—I die willingly—and happy."

THE SECOND TEMPLE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 5th.—Ezra 3. Golden Text, Verse 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN our lesson for June 30th of last year, we learnt of the wondrous intervention of God for His people in fulfilment of prophecy, and in answer to Daniel's prayer. We learnt how God can arrange the means for the doing of His work when He wills it to be done, and that with Him all things are possible. In the same book of Ezra the Scribe are given the names and the numbers of the different families which came up out of Babylon "unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one unto his city" (Ezra 2:1). There were amongst them some who "could not show their father's house, and their seed, whether they were of Israel" (Ezra 2:59).

Oh, how important is it for every man to know assuredly whether He is one of God's people or not! Any thing may be left undecided rather than this. There were even some who took their place among the priests without having a right to the office. "These sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but they were not found: therefore were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood" (Ezra 2:62). When the external Church of Christ in a country or in a town is cold and lifeless, many find their way as members into the church whom God has not reckoned as such. The register which man has made is not confirmed in heaven, and when a time of spiritual awakening comes, then comes the searching for the register of God's children. A lifeless ministry is easily discovered; when there is spiritual life around, lifeless members can no longer retain a name to live while they are dead (Rev. 3:1).

In the chapter from which our lesson is taken, we find that the children of Israel "gathered themselves together as one man to Jerusalem." Here was unity, and without unity amongst Christians little real glory can be brought to God. It is our vocation to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." It was the Lord's special prayer for His followers, "That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me." The only real possibility of unity among God's children is when the more advanced Christians practise loving forbearance with younger and weaker ones. Harsh judgments of others never come from those who live near to the heart of Jesus. We do not judge, but we yearn over those for whom we pray.

The first act of the priests after they were separated from strangers and bound together in unity was to build "the altar of the God of Israel, to offer burnt-offerings thereon." And so God's claim was recognized. Christ "died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again." There must be no reserve. "I am crucified with Christ. As He laid His will on God's altar, and gave to His Father all choice about every thing, so I as His representative will have no will, no choice."

I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service. This is the spirit of the burnt-offering, and Paul supposes that we only need to know the will of God in order to do it. Our mind can only be renewed by the coming of another mind into ours (Isa. 50:4, 5; John 5:30).

These children of Israel, who had returned from the Babylonish captivity, set the altar upon his bases (for fear was upon them because of the people of those countries). It appears that it did not occur to them to arm themselves for their defence against their enemies. They would take refuge in their God, as though to say, "We will honor God, and then He will not fail us." "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty" (Ps. 91:1; see also verses 2, 7, 9–16). They re-established the daily burnt-offering, just as we with Paul must die daily; yesterday's consecration will not avail for to-day. And we find the result in the offering also of "every one that willingly offered a freewill offering unto the Lord." When the whole is given to God in a life of self-renouncement, the details follow, and every thought, and act, and word becomes a freewill offering.

"They kept also the feast of tabernacles." It was in remembrance of their pilgrimage in the desert (Lev. 23:43) that they were to dwell in booths during seven days.

"But the foundation of the temple of the Lord was not yet laid." The temple of Solomon was God's one place of witness upon earth; and, while the temple lay in ruins, there was no open witness before the world for the honor of His name. Another and an everlasting temple is now in building. "Ye are the temple of the living God" (2 Cor. 6:16), "Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: in whom we also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2:20–22). The witness for God which must vindicate His honor eternally is the bride of the Lamb, who is now making herself ready. It is the new Jerusalem, built "of lively (living) stones" (1 Pet. 2:5), which out of many is made one.

The great triumph of Christ over Satan is not only that He has redeemed our souls from death, but also that He has created anew a people in whom His divine unselfish nature dwells and manifests itself—a people who are supernatural. For as it is our nature to seek our own (Phil. 2:21), so it is Christ's nature to seek not His own (1 Cor. 13:5); and He triumphs when Christ is "formed in us" (Gal. 4:19)—i.e., when His nature supersedes and takes the place of our nature. Our nature is to make every thing revolve around ourselves, and, in order to be one in Him, self must cease to exist. While we are sensitive as to the words or opinions of others, and while we consider what is due to us, the self life is there, and the Christ life is wanting, and we are not doing Christ's work. Every thought of self is one thought less for Him, and it weakens the cause for which He died for us.

But the time came when these returned captives began to think of setting forward "the work of the house of the Lord." And it was with joy. Although no personal benefit should accrue to them by the existence of God's temple, yet that God should be glorified lay near to His servants' hearts. So when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they "set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites the sons of Asaph with cymbals to praise the name of the Lord," etc. "And all the people shouted with a great shout when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid." But some who remembered the first temple wept; they remembered their sin and their punishment, and the singing and the weeping could hardly be distinguished.

Perhaps they called to mind the great awakening in Josiah's time, and were then themselves converted, and perhaps they would remember how in their youthful zeal they and Daniel had borne witness for God. They would remember the declension of the people, the sinfulness of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, the weeping of Jeremiah, etc.; and it may be they had been so accustomed by the waters of Babylon to sit down and weep, that it was not easy now to forget the past and to mingle with the joy of the younger believer. But they wept unto God as the others shouted unto the Lord. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep" (Rom. 12:15). This is our privilege as those who are set free from the slavery of living unto ourselves; and there is one who says of His joy (John 15:11), "These things have I spoken unto you, that My joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full."

FOREIGN EVENTS.

The Marriage of the Princess Thyra, third daughter of the King of Denmark, to the Duke of Cumberland, son of the late ex-King of Hanover, was celebrated on Saturday, December 21st, at the royal palace in Copenhagen.

The marriage can scarcely be considered so brilliant, financially or socially, as those made by the other children of the Danish King, who has a son already on the Greek throne, a son who will sit on the Danish throne, a daughter who will sit on the royal and imperial throne of England and India, while another daughter will wear the diadem of Czarina of all the Russias. But as the New York Herald observes, the Duke of Cumberland is respectable. If he is not a king, he is one of the next best things to it—namely, the son of a dethroned monarch. Such a young man is handy to have in the family if any fresh kings are wanted, as in Greece, or not long since in Spain, and at present in Bulgaria.

The Duke and his father-in-law will at any rate have one sentiment in common—they both hate Bismarck, who has despoiled them both, and keeps his iron hand on his prey. The kingdom of Hanover is in his keeping.

The Emperor of Germany appears to have been set a-thinking by his almost miraculous escape in the recent desperate attempt on his life. The veteran monarch, in an interview he held with the members of the Berlin Corporation, confessed that the expression of the exuberant loyalty of his people on his return to Berlin had entirely removed the painful impression made upon him by the Socialist outrages, and he piously added: "In being rescued, I perceived a warning to examine myself as to whether in my career of life I had fulfilled my duties in such a manner as to be worthy to be saved." While still insisting, though much more mildly, on the necessity for corrective measures, he indicated a reviving preference for preventive rather than for repressive legislation. "Human foresight," he wisely said, "against such things as happened to me is powerless;" and, therefore, although increasedly stringent laws may be desirable as a means of protection, the real and best security is [illegible] be found in bringing home to the people a conviction of the evils of Socialism.

If the Emperor's opinions are lasting, we may hope to see more free and enlightened principles operating in the government of the German people, and a less rigorous insistance on such exploded fallacies as "the right divine of kings to govern wrong." So God may have brought good for a whole people out of the act of a lawless assassin.

Prince Bismarck's Religion.—From Dr. Busch's book on Prince Bismarck, just published, we learn some interesting particulars of the great statesman's religious opinions. He has expressed himself as follows: "But for my strict and literal belief in the truths of Christianity; but for my acceptance of the miraculous groundwork of Christianity, you would not have lived to see the sort of chancellor I am. Take away my faith, and you destroy my patriotism." Nay, the only thing, as he affirms, that keeps him at his post is the fact that there is no Christian to take his place as chancellor. "Find me a successor who is as firm a Christian believer as myself, and I will resign at once. But I live in a generation of pagans."

It appears that Prince Bismarck's religion is very different from the gaseous rationalism of the German universities. His favorite books of devotion teach that humanity is guided by continuous inspiration; that miracles of Providence are wrought every day; that each thought and act is dictated by divine influence, even going so far as to believe, with the Moravian brethren, whose devotional books he peculiarly sympathizes with, that the guiding hand of Providence is to be discerned in the first verse the eye may light upon on opening the Bible for counsel. Some of their books were found in his bed-room when he was hastily summoned to receive Napoleon III. at Sedan.

In Afghanistan internal dissension among the followers of the Ameer is said to be fighting on the side of the British arms. Important despatches have reached the English Government, which have not yet been made public; but newspaper correspondents report that the Ameer has fled from Cabul, and that his son Kakoob Khan has been proclaimed in his stead. The sections of the Afghan notables are variously affected, some advocating submission and alliance with England, and others that overtures be made to Russia. Afghan troops in considerable numbers are said to have deserted from the Ameer and joined the British forces. England may therefore be said to have practically acquired possession of Afghanistan; the question for her to decide now—and it is one that will demand all the wisdom of her statesmen—is, what shall be done with it?

The Relations between the Governments of England and Russia are, according to the latest reports, somewhat less strained than formerly. Russia professes herself anxious for the friendship of England, and to be desirous of removing the feeling of distrust that prevails in that country. She has withdrawn her mission from Cabul, as a proof of this amicable desire; but sceptical people in England say, that measure is one of timely precaution, rather than of gracious concession; and that Russia, seeing the rapid and successful advance of the British forces towards Cabul, was desirous of avoiding disagreeable complications, and withdrew her representatives voluntarily to avoid a forced ejection.

Commercial Distress is very prevalent in England, and all classes of society are affected. The upper classes who have suffered by bank failures and reduced dividends on shares, are retrenching, and in doing so necessarily curtail the business of the tradesmen; who, reducing expenses in their turn, affect the class below them who depend for their subsistence on the remuneration the tradesmen pay them for their labor. When a stone is cast into a placid lake the circles widen and widen until the whole surface is perturbed; so in English society, pecuniary trouble has spread from rank to rank until an universal depression has settled on the community.

The London Workhouses and the reports of charitable organizations prove how wide-spread and deep-seated is the prevailing poverty and distress in that city. The applicants for relief are so numerous that the accommodation of the workhouses is totally inadequate to meet the demand; and while the funds of the various charities are nearly exhausted, pressing and urgent cases for relief are continually being presented to them, in which to refuse help would frequently involve death from privation. The severity of the winter is being severely felt, especially in the Eastern districts of London, where the poorer classes reside. Poplar, Spitalfields, Milwall, Limehouse, and Haggerston are said to be in a most deplorable state.

Cruel Treatment of Bosnian Refugees.—Miss Johnston writes, under date Pakratz, November 12th: "We only arrived here yesterday. The order for the sending back of the Bosnian fugitives has come, and go they must. No matter that the late autumn weather is already bitterly cold, that rain is pouring, the roads almost impassable from mud, every brook and river overflowed worst of all, that there is nothing to go to, only the ruins of burnt homes and waste fields. Three women now come to our door they are in charge of a soldier, who is to see them over the Save and into desert Bosnia, to watch that they don't creep into some hut by the way, or perchance lie down to die before they get there. All three are in tears. Two have babies in their arms—little pallid creatures, quiet from cold and weakness; one is only two weeks old. Will that soldier get it and its poor tottering mother even as far as the river? Three more tiny children are of the party. Our stores of blankets and clothes are very low, but we are making them reach as far as possible for the poor travellers, and we are buying 'opankés' (their hide shoes), and giving each a little supply of money for the way. Some, too, who are now on the journey, making this a stopping place, must have a good hot meal. I happened, while we were hearing some of the sad tales, to take up a Serbian Testament, and my eye rested on verses 19, 20, 21 of Matthew 24. What a terrible, clear light is now thrown on those prophetic words of our tender, pitying Lord! We hear 'all the fugitives are to be in Bosnia before the end of November.' How many of them will be alive at Christmas?"

Lord Selborne, who held the office of Lord High Chancellor of England in Mr. Gladstone's Administration, has recently been elected rector of St. Andrew's University. In his address at his installation he made some remarks which, coming from so high an authority, are worthy of every young man's attention. He said: "If I were asked what I thought the first, second, and third requisite of a successful and noble life, I should say, and I should reiterate, a good conscience. There is no lever like this to overcome the difficulties of life; and, on the other hand, those who contract bad habits in their youth can never be the same men afterwards as if they had not done so. They may recover themselves so far as to escape from total debasement; they may follow in later life the calls of honor and virtue, but they are handicapped in the race, and they would probably be glad to sacrifice any object of worldly desire in order to undo the past, if that were possible."

A Useful Dog.—The other day a small dog, belonging to a gentleman in Bank Street, Preston, England, was fighting with another dog rather larger than himself, when he came to grief, and was struggling in the mud with his antagonist on the top of him. A large mastiff, belonging to the same gentleman, and a companion of the small dog, came up, and with his massive jaws took the conquering dog up by the back of his neck and lifted him quietly off his opponent. He then took the small dog by the ear and quietly led him over the road, and in canine language bade him haste home. He performed a valuable service to the canine community, and if some like powerful functionary existed among nations and individuals he would find many opportunities for the exercise of his capacities.

A curious mode of raising funds for a charitable purpose is in operation in Germany. It is organized by an association called a "Society of Collectors of Cigar Cuttings." The unsmoked portions of cigars are collected, remanufactured into snuff, and sold; the proceeds being devoted to the support of orphan children, of whom thirty were provided for from this source alone in 1876. It is estimated that there are ten millions of smokers in Germany, and if they could all be persuaded to forward their cigar-ends to the receptacle of the charity an income of $162,000 per annum would result.

A Lady Enriched by being Robbed.—The following singular fact relating to the Glasgow Bank failure is related by the Pall Mall Gazette: "A. B., an old lady with a fair fortune of 8000*l*. or 10,000*l*., had a legacy left her of 2000*l*. This, after much cogitation, she, following her Free Church clergyman and other religious authorities, invested in the Glasgow Bank, and for some years drew the dividends satisfactorily. Then came the failure, and the old lady was distracted by the thought of future beggary. Her neighbors got their calls, but she (as it seemed from the special hard-heartedness of the liquidators) did not get even the notice vouchsafed to others anxious to make arrangements and prepare a retreat from the wreck. She went to Edinburgh to cunsult lawyers as to the failure of notice, and after inquiry found that her agent is at present eluding the police; in fact that, in addition to other frauds, he has pocketed her 2000*l*., and has been paying her interest out of the capital. She is thus free of all responsibility as regards the rest of her fortune, and will legally be able to sue the agent, should he turn up, for the repayment of her 2000*l*."

CAPTAIN J. E. DUTTON, the Christian Sailor.

CAPTAIN DUTTON.

Early Fondness for the Sea—Emigrates to New York — His Conversion — Mockings — Little Meetings on Board—Marriage—His Labors in the Forecastle—Services in New York—Anecdote of Mr. Müller.

TO many Christian people, who have had occasion to cross the Atlantic during the past few years, the name of Captain Dutton is familiar. The Transatlantic steamer of the Allan line which is commanded by him is especially sought after on account of the religious privileges enjoyed on board, and for this reason Messrs. Moody and Sankey and Mr. George Müller and Miss Macpherson and other prominent Christian workers have preferred to make their voyages in it. While he is captain in the mercantile navy, his rank in the British Royal Naval Reserve is Lieutenant.

Lieut. J. E. Dutton, R.N.R., son of J. T. Dutton, manufacturing chemist, scion of an old Cheshire family, was born at Harrington, near Whitehaven, England, February 8th, 1828. He had an ardent love for the sea, from a boy, and was of a fearless disposition. When only seven years of age he would often be found at the masthead of the collier brigs in the harbor.

After leaving school, the family removed to New York, where he was apprenticed to a celebrated architect; but, his health failing, he went to sea, in 1845, in an American whaler, bound for the South Sea in search of sperm whales. While on board this vessel, about a year afterwards, when it was off the coast of New Zealand, a tract fell into his hands, entitled "The Swearer's Prayer." It convinced him of the sinfulness of that habit, and he tried to shake it off, but without avail. Gradually he was led by the Holy Spirit to see himself a lost sinner, and he began to cry for mercy, but there was no one on board who could point him to Jesus.

He commenced, however, to read the Bible perseveringly, and to seek the salvation of his soul; and at the masthead or on the watch at night his constant cry was, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." At last light broke into his soul, and he was enabled to cast himself entirely on the finished work of Jesus, and to find rest and peace in Him. He had no book but the Bible, which became his constant companion and study.

The rest of the crew could scarcely understand what was the matter when he began to tell them what the Lord had done for his soul, and to urge them to flee from the wrath to come. Some laughed, others were vexed; some scoffed, but still he persevered. Just at this time he met one like himself on board another ship, who had found Christ, and they were mutually helpful to each other; the Master was, indeed, present as these two walked the deck and held sweet communion with each other: "Jesus himself drew near."

When next the two ships met, Lieut. Dutton inquired for his new-found brother, and was told that while catching a whale the rope got foul and drew him over the bow of the boat, and he was never seen any more. For two years after this Lieut. Dutton, during his voyages, did not come in contact with any Christian with whom he could converse on the matters nearest to his heart. Subsequently he stayed a short time in the Island of Vauvan, Friendly Islands, and there met some of the crew of the John Wesley, missionary brig, and was much blessed and encouraged by intercourse with them. Soon afterwards, four of the crew becoming anxious about their souls, he was able to lead them to Jesus. Many were the sweet communings these five had during their voyage, whenever their duties would permit, and then they would sing and pray and talk of Jesus together. They continued these meetings, and enjoyed them in spite of the jeers of the other sailors, who nicknamed them "Psalm-singers."

After many hairbreadth escapes he arrived at home and joined the Methodist Church. After staying at home six months he sailed again in American ships in various capacities, as carpenter, and, subsequently, as third to first mate, mostly between New York or New Orleans and Liverpool, and in this capacity endeavored to speak for Jesus as opportunity offered.

In 1854 he sailed from Lake Ontario to London, in command of the first ship ever built on the Canadian lakes. In 1855 he joined the Montreal Ocean Steamship Company, in which he has continued ever since.

Soon after, he married a lady with whom he had formed an acquaintance years before when at school. She was like-minded with himself, and, like him, an earnest, sincere lover of Jesus.

At this time he felt oppressed by the condition of the common sailors on the vessels, and desirous of aiding them he began to teach the men in the forecastle navigation, and to urge them to self-improvement. He also formed a library on board especially for their use. Many availed themselves of the opportunity, and are now able navigators. He also held religious meetings with the men on Sunday evenings.

In 1860 he commanded one of the Montreal Ocean Company's steamers out of Glasgow. In that year he also joined the Rev. Andrew Bonar's church, and was greatly blessed under his ministry. About this time he began to hold a daily Bible reading with the men, which has been continued to the present time; and numbers of the sailors have been converted through the reading of God's Word.

In 1868 he began to mark the Bible, to enable him to see what truths were spoken of in each page. The mark for redemption and salvation was +; for resurrection, V; for the Lord's coming, +, etc. He soon found, in the reading and study of the word, how often the +s occurred, sometimes five or six times on a page. He found the Epistles to be full of this truth; the more he looked into it, the more he saw that the Lord's speedy Second Advent was the glorious hope of God's people.

For example, when the apostle wished to stir up the saints at Corinth to diligence, he speaks of the Lord's coming in 1 Cor. 1:7; he urges it as a comforting hope in 1 Thess. 4:16, etc.; to commend them, 1 Thess. 1:9, 10; for purifying, 1 John 3:2, 3; for watchfulness, Mark 13:32–37, Rev. 22:12.

Second Advent truth came to his mind like a new conversion. God's Word seemed a new book. This truth seemed to stir him up afresh to fresh consecration. He now began to speak more earnestly for Jesus, knowing "the night is far spent, the day is at hand," and to urge this truth on Christians as an incentive to faithfulness.

In 1870 he became acquainted with Miss Macpherson and her work, and received great help and encouragement from that esteemed lady: about 2000 of her children have crossed in the ship commanded by him. As opportunities offered, he held meetings in the steerage, when God's power has been manifested; as many as thirty souls have been saved in one passage, and hardly a trip but some one is brought into the light of the Gospel.

For a number of years he has been Commodore of the Allan line of the Transatlantic steamers, and has altogether made over 360 trips across the Atlantic. He has also given lectures to Sunday-schools on "The Tabernacle in the Wilderness," of which he made a model and explained it to the sailors, that they might see the truths it so clearly taught. Many have seen the way of salvation by these talks on the Tabernacle, and been enabled to rest on Christ. He felt that nothing shows how God justifies the sinner and purifies the saint more than these truths. He has organized a church on board, and they regularly break bread together in the name of the Lord, and many of the passengers of all denominations are delighted to join them. Many look back to times of blessing on board. When ashore he is actively engaged in evangelistic work.

The following extract from a New York newspaper gives a specimen of his evangelistic addresses: "The services at the M. E. Church were especially interesting yesterday, from the fact that they were conducted both morning and evening by Captain Joseph C. Dutton, of the Allan line steamship Sardinian, now lying at Locust Point. Last summer Captain Dutton, whilst in command of the Nestorian, officiated at an afternoon service at the Emory Grove Camp Meeting, and his remarks on that occasion are held in most favorable recollection. In the sermon which he preached yesterday morning he took his text from the 29th verse of the 10th chapter of Numbers: 'We are journeying into the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you; come thou with us, and we will do thee good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.'

"The speaker said that the exodus of the people of Israel from Egypt, and their protracted journey towards the land of promise, attended by peril and privation, is typical of the struggle of the Christian in reaching the heavenly Canaan. We all are journeying; we are on a pilgrimage beset with dangers and temptations, and as the Israelites separated themselves entirely from Egypt, so should the Christian leave behind him all that is worldly in his journey through life.

"The sermon was profusely interspersed with anecdotes and quotations, and in making citations of Scriptural passages the speaker displaye a most remarkable power of memory. He re ferred perhaps some fifty or sixty times to th words of the Bible, always giving the number c the chapter and verse without hesitation, and re peating the language with entire correctnes He is very earnest and forcible in all his utte ances, eschewing elaborate diction, and flights rhetoric, and has an irresistible way of carryin truth home to the minds of his hearers that is pleasing as it is effective. Captain Dutton is man of about middle age, and is a typical Brit in appearance.

"He has religious service on his vessel eve day, generally conducted by himself, and thou attendance is wholly optional, the sailors a generally nearly all present."

Captain Dutton relates an interesting an dote in regard to Mr. George Müller, who cross the Atlantic in his steam-vessel in the autu of this year, 1877. One day the steamer w obliged to slacken its pace on account of a den fog, which involved a certain degree of risk, they were in the vicinity of icebergs. About noo Mr. Müller asked the captain if he had a f minutes to spare for prayer. They accordingly tired into a room and kneeled down, and M Müller prayed to God as the God of love and mighty power to remove the fog for the sake His dear Son Jesus Christ; and in his prayer expressed confident trust that God would gr that request. They then both went on de and found that while they had been praying dense fog had completely disappeared, and vessel was enabled to proceed at full speed.

LORD SHAFTESBURY'S NURSE.

IT is said that when John Wesley was told th his congregation consisted largely of serv girls, he replied he was glad of it, as they the care of the children, and if the servant-g were converted they would train the chil in the fear of the Lord.

A notable illustration of this truth is found in the case of the Earl of Shaftesbury, one of Eng land's most honored noblemen, whose father as by no means a religious man. A half a cen ry or more ago his mother had a servant-maid nd housekeeper, named Mary Millas. She had he care of this child, and trained him up unt he was seven years of age, when she died. But he seed which she had sown was not lost. She ad set an indelible mark upon the tender mi of the young nobleman, and her example, prec ts, and prayers, remembered by him, fixed nd formed his character for good at that early ge. To-day that little child is known and hon ed throughout England by every class, from he beggar to the prince, and his name is graven on the hearts of the poor throughout the length nd breadth of the land.

CROSSIXG JORDAN.

Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached December 22d.

A River to be passed in the Way to Heaven—The Death of a Little Child.

I HAVE spoken to you of the passage of the raelites across the Red Sea ; but now I will eak to you of that passage across the river rdan which was on a different wise, and show u the great disaster to human life on the occaon when the Israelites went through the Red a, and their enemes were destroyed in the purit ; but there was no damage done at that ne to the Israelites, not so much as the loss of lynch-pin. The priests came ahead, and havg reached the brink of the river they lifted eir foot, and no sooner had they planted it on e margin of the river than the waters fled ; on e side rolling off toward the sea, on the other de halting and rearing into a great mountain crystal. Immediately after the priests came e armed hosts. After them came the wives, e children, the flocks, the herds, and passing dry-shod across the river I see some of them atching these walls of crystal, and fearing lest efore they reach the opposite bank of Tamond and Oleander the walls of crystal will fall n them ; and so they hasten, hurry, to get them p the other bank and reach the armed hosts, e wives, the children, the flocks, the herds, and et the complete story be told of the passage of he river Jordan.

Seated to-night on a shelving limestone, lookng off upon that historical river, famous for the assage of the Jordan, when on one hand was he triumphal arch of the rainbow woven out of he spray, famous for the fact that the axe-head niraculously swam upon it, and memorable in istory as being associated with many demontrations of heroic faithfulness and Christian fortitude, at the same time being a type of somehing that is yet to take place in your lifetime nd in mine, our souls ought to tingle with ininite gladness.

I have to learn from this subject of the passage of the river Jordan : I. that difficulties ouched vanish. I have no doubt in the disance this river having overflown in a freshet was very alarming. There was not one man in all that host that could understand how he could get through. But they marched on. The priests lifted their feet and planted them on the margin of the river, and lo ! the river was gone. These men of God did not wade in chin deep, or waist deep, or knee deep, or ankle deep, but they touched the river and it fled ; they went through dry-shod.

Why, that is true in all our histories : difficulties touched vanish. It is obstacles in the distance, great anxieties about something ahead, troubles to come, that worry your life out. But you approach trouble, you touch it, it is gone.

I have been told by travellers in Africa that when they were assaulted of wild beasts, or about to be, if they could only get their eyes firmly fixed upon the wild beast it would cower and slink away. And so it is in all the troubles and anxieties of this life ; once put your eye of Christian courage upon them and they are gone.

There is

among the American Indians that Marathon was travelling in the invisible world, and that going along his journey he saw a barrier of briers, and then wild beasts glaring on from the thicket, and then an impassable river ; but as Marathon went on, determined to proceed, he found that the barrier of briers was only a phantom, that the wild beasts were powerless ghosts, and that the impassable river which forbade him rushing into the arms of his loved one was only a phantom river. So it is in all our lives. Trouble in the distance reached disappears, marched upon vanishes. Jordan touched, gone.

You say there is some great difficulty in the future, some great work to be performed for God or the Church ; you say it is impossible, I can never go through it, and you worry and worry. Why don't you start ? If God tells you to start it is safe to start, only start. Plant your foot on the margin of the river, and it is gone. Difficulties touched vanish.

So it is with a great many Christians in regard to the hour of their death. They look upon that moment of death as something horrible. Why ? because it is in the distance. Did you ever see a Christian who is abont to confront death, and afraid ? No. Good John Livingston was sailing in a sloop from Elizabethport, N.J., for New York. A squall came upon the river, and there was some prospect of the boat being lost, and it was a surprise among a great many good people on that boat that John Livingston, so well prepared to die, should be afraid and affrighted in the storm. You know the reason ? My friends, it was because his death hour was far away. God never prepares a man for death until he comes up to it. Years passed along in the history of John Livingston's useful life, and when the hour of his departure came he went sweetly and peacefully into the kingdom of heaven. No doubt, no fear. The high-priest of his profession with bruised foot went ahead, and having touched the margin of the river it was gone.

> " Oh ! could we make our doubt remove,
> These gloomy doubts that rise,
> And see the Canaan that we love,
> With unbeclouded eyes ;
> Could we but climb where Moses stood,
> And view the landscape o'er,
> Not Jordan's stream nor death's cold flood
> Could fright us from the shore."

Theodore Freylinheusen, one of the best men New Jersey ever produced, famous in the senate, his name forever associated in the memory of these aged men in this house with the charmed name of Henry Clay—Theodore Freylinheusen, passing all his life near to God, his name associated with every grand and benevolent enterprise, president of the American Bible Society, his heart enlisted in all that was good and glorious for Christ—all his days was afraid of the last hour, talked with every clergyman he met in regard to it, and shivered at the thought of leaving this world ; but when the hour of departure came, in the history of all the ten thousands of Christian death-beds in Christendom, not one went away more grandly than Theodore Freylinheusen. The river dark and wide and terrible in the distance, no sooner had he touched it than it was gone.

II. So I learn also from this passage of the river Jordan

THE COMPLETENESS OF EVERY THING THAT GOD DOES.

Now when God stopped that river Jordan, natural law would have overflowed all the region round about, to its destruction ; but when God planted a dam at the head of that river, He planted one also on the east side, and one on the west side of the river, and so when it stopped on this side it stopped on that side, and heaved a great mountain of crystal. Oh ! the completeness of every thing that God does. One would have thought that after the water had been drawn off the bed of Jordan there would have been mud and slime so much that the army of Israel would have trouble to pass. No, in one instant it was dry. If now the waters of the Hudson or the Connecticut should be drawn off from their bed it would take days and weeks for the ground to become solid, and yet one moment Jordan is flowing fast, the next moment Jordan halts, the next moment the ground is dry.

Oh ! the completeness of every thing that God does. Does he make a universe ? It is a perfect clock, running with no need of being wound up, the fixed stars the pivot, coonstellations the interjoining wheels, and ponderous laws the mighty swinging pendulum. A perfect universe. I never heard an astronomer suggest an improvement.

If God makes a Bible, it is a perfect and complete Bible. Standing amid its dreadful and sublime truths you seem in the midst of a great orchestra, while wailings over sin, rejoicings over pardon, and martial strains of victory make a chorus like the anthem of Heaven. A complete book. You cannot make a single suggestion of improvement ; complete miracles, complete parables, complete history, complete from Genesis to Revelation, complete in style, complete in every thing.

Does God provide a Saviour ? He is a complete Saviour. God, man—human, divine. He it was who furnished the sardonyx and the crystal for the walls of heaven, putting down jasper for the foundation, and heaving up amethysts for the capital, swinging the twelve gates which are twelve peals, yet a child in a manger, His mother teaching Him to walk ; one year old,.five years old, ten year sold, fifteen years old ; omnipotence sheathed in a child's arm, omniscience strung on the optic nerve of a child's eye, infinite love beating in a child's heart. God, man, human, so he can sympathize ; Almighty, so he can deliver ; a complete Saviour. And so it is in all the round, complete ; complete universe, complete Bible, complete Christ, complete passage of the Jordan. All that God does is complete.

III. But I go further in my subject and learn from it that between us and every thing that is worth having there is a

A RIVER OF DIFFICULTY TO BE CROSSED.

I suppose some of these soldiers in the army of Joshua might have said, " Oh ! I wish I could have some of those grapes on the other bank." " Well," says Joshua, " if you want the grapes, go and get them ; cross over and get them. We can't get them here." Between men and every thing that is worth having there is a river of difficulty. That is beause

NOTHING IS WORTH HAVING WITHOUT DIFFICULTY.

Why does God make every thing valuable difficult to get at ? For the same reason that He put gold down in the mountain, and pearl down in the sea, and we must dig and dive for them.

We all recognize this in worldly relations. We all understand that between a man and financial success there is a river of difficulty. We are not surprised when we read the story that Cornelius Vanderbilt had his hand blistered with the oar of his own ferry-boat. We are not surprised that A. T. Stewart swept out his own store. We get accustomed to these men who have risen and through great struggle have achieved great financial success. They have beautiful houses, walls abloom with pictures, horses neighing and pawing at the doorway, the harness tinkling with silver, and the black carriage moving through that sea of New York life a wave of beauty, of beauty and splendor. The summer air coming through the window stirs tapestry fit for a Turkish sultan. Who is this man with great and grand success ? Why he was the lad that came to New York with a dollar in his pocket and all his estate flung over his shoulder in a cotton handkerchief. He started from the very bottom, he went to the very top. We all understand that between financial success and every man there is a river of difficulty to be crossed.

So it is in attaining knowledge. What a wide river between Shakespeare the boy holding horses at the London Theatre, and Shakespeare the dramatist writing tragedies for all the ages, applauded of all lands ! What a wide river of difficulty between Benjamin Franklin, the boy with a loaf of bread under his arm walking through the streets of Philadelphia, and that same Benjamin Franklin the philosopher, just outside of Boston, playing kite with a thunder-storm! What a vast difference, what a river of difficulty to be crossed!

Now, my friends, I want you to recognize that what is true in the world is true in grace. You see a man strong for Christ, faithful, valiant, stalwart in Christian experience, how did he get all that? Just happened so accidentally? Did he glide into it? No. It was in a great Solferino he learned to fight, it was in shipwreck that he learned to swim. These men who have achieved any thing for God or the Church have invariably gone through strong difficulty.

Who were those men in olden times who were bowed in sheepskin and wandered in goatskin, of whom the world was not worthy (Hebrews 11:37), and yet it was through that very discipline of hardship and trial that they achieved the mission for which God had called them. So I say to all of you, be faithful to God, though there may be a river of difficulty between you and grand Christian achievement cross the river; then you will be able to say with the Apostle: "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Romans 8:38.

And so I say to all young men in this audience who have worldly trouble; I say to all those people who have any kind of trouble, financial struggle, mental struggle, literary struggle, artistic struggle, whatever be your struggle in life, be encouraged when I tell you that it has been the history of all those who have gone before you that between them and great success there was a river of difficulty, but God gave them grace to cross. But I cannot give you an idea of my subject unless I show you (IV.) also that between us and there is a river to be passed. Have you never sat at your table with your family all around you, wishing that you might just take them all up with you, and pass over into the glories that God has provided for His children? I think there are hundreds of people in this house who have been weary of temptation and every thing of this earth, and if they could really gather up all their family, and take them with them into the eternal rest of heaven, they would not take two minutes to make up their mind about their departure. But it is the going here of one, and here another that breaks the heart, and brings the wrinkles to the face, and whitens the hair; and yet be not discouraged, be not despondent, be not gloomy at the thought God is going to help you through.

Those of us who were brought up in the country remember how, as the summer approached, we used to ask our parents and beg them to let us go barefoot, and we remember how the cool grass and the dry dust felt to our uncovered foot. Well, my friends, the day will come when we will have to go through the Jordan of death; then the shoes we wear, lest we be cut of the sharp places of this life, will be laid aside, and we will put our uncovered foot on the bed of the river, one foot in the bed of the river, the other foot on the other bank; we will spring upward, and that will be heaven.

Oh! there is something exquisitely beautiful in the expression of the husband, when dying, who said to his wife: "How the candles flicker, Nellie. Put them out. I shall sleep soundly to night, and wake in the morning." Oh! that was beautiful, passing through Jordan dry-shod. And so it was in my parish in Philadelphia. I went in to see depart. She had suffered all her days, she never had a well day. But oh! how they did struggle to keep her, she was so beautiful, so sweet. About twelve o'clock at noonday she thought the evening was coming on because the world was fading from her sight, and she threw up her hand to her father, and said, "Good-night, papa." She threw up her hand to her mother, and said, "Good-night, mamma." And so it was that then she went away from us, the poor crippled child that she was, so still, with a face so beautiful; heaven had already dawned before she left that family of my congregation. Good-night! She could never be well. Good-night! She had no fear. Good-night to all sorrow; but it was good-morning to heaven, good-morning to Christ, good-morning to the companionship of angels, good-morning!

That was the same style of experience which Hugh McAll had when he was crossing Jordan, although it seemed a bloody river, and his soul shuddered at the start, yet standing on the scaffold of martyrdom, he turned to one side of that scaffold and said, "Farewell, father and mother; farewell, sun, moon, and stars; farewell all earthly delights." Then turning to the other side of the platform of the scaffold he said, "Welcome, Lord Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant; " welcome the society of angels welcome death; welcome glory." Oh! what rapture passing Jordan.

Now, my friends, it seemed to me there would be great comfort for all the bereaved in this subject. You see our departed friends have not been submerged, not extinguished, not blotted out, but they have crossed over. These Israelites were just as certainly alive when they got to the eastern bank of the Jordan as when they stood on the western bank of the Jordan; and our friends are just as certainly alive in heaven as they were alive on earth; better reconstruction in all their vigor, mightier pulsation, brighter prospects; crossed over; they left all their sins behind them on this side, all their temptations this side, all their troubles this side, and all human and satanic assaults which may pursue them will come up to that river, but they cannot cross; God divides the Jordan only for His children. So our dear friends who have left us have only crossed over, and I give congratulation to all of you to-night who have loved ones in heaven.

You may remember a year or two ago there was a great excitement in New York, and great joy. Why was it? Why it was because the news came that the City of Brussels had arrived at Liverpool. That vessel had been gone from her port I think three weeks, the probability was it had gone to the bottom of the sea; there was great anxiety among friends in our cities here about their friends on board the City of Brussels; but when that vessel sailed up the Liverpool harbor, and it was found that no damage had been done, that she had only been detained by broken machinery, when the City of Brussels went up Liverpool harbor, and the oceanic cable telegraphed to these lands, "The City of Brussels safe, all hands well," oh! what a congratulation of friends in New York over their friends arrived in Liverpool.

Am I not right in congratulating those whose friends are safe in heaven? They have arrived on the other side; they have escaped all the perils of the voyage. There they are safe forever, and I congratulate you. Oh! would you have them back? Would you have your parents back? Didn't they struggle long enough? You know how many hardships they had, would you have them back? You know in the heat of the summer weather how hard it was for them to breathe; you know in the chill winds of the winter how they suffered, and they were so weak, and they were so full of ailments, would you take the responsibility of calling them back if you could? Would you make them cross the river of Jordan three times, in addition to the crossing already made? Would you have them cross back again to greet you, and then in a few years, at the longest, cross again into the skies? For you certainly would not want to keep them here forever, and forever. Would you want to make them cross three times? I ask the question, and the answer comes back in celestial echo: What! will you never be sick again? Never sick again. What! will you never be weary again? Never weary again. What, will you never sin again? Never sin again. What! will you never die again? Never die again. Oh! ye army of the redeemed, we hail you from bank to bank. Wait for us. When we come to the river it will part for us as it used to part for you, then come down and meet us half way between the walled banks of earth and the palm-groves of heaven. Come half way. Hail, ye redeemed of the Lord, hail. God grant that when we come down to the river to cross, that our High-Priest, with his bruised foot, may touch the water, and that then over beds of coral, and flowers of heaven, and paths of pearl we shall go in.

If I should ask this audience with what hymn to close to-night I think a thousand voices would suggest one hymn, the old hymn that comforted so many going across through the valley and across the river, the old hymn to the old tune:

> "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
> And cast a wistful eye,
> To Canaan's fair and happy land,
> Where my possessions lie.
>
> "Oh the transporting, rapturous scene,
> That rises on my sight,
> Sweet fields arrayed in living green,
> And rivers of delight."

[Dr. Talmage did not occupy his pulpit last Lord's day, we therefore publish the above sermon, preached by him December 22d, and specially reported for this journal.]

AN ENGLISH YOUNG LADY'S DAY.

THE London Spectator states that Dr. Fraser, the Bishop of Manchester, was recently urging a young lady of his acquaintance to engage in some Christian work when he was met with the reply that she already found her time fully occupied. Sceptical on this point he pressed her for an account of her work, and received the following reply:

We breakfast about ten. Breakfast occupies the best part of an hour, during which we read our letters, and pick up the latest news in the papers. After that we have to go and answer our letters and my mother expects me to write her notes of invitation, or to reply to such. Then I have to go into the conservatory and feed the canaries and parrots, and cut off the dead leaves and faded flowers from the plants. Then it is time to dress for lunch, and at two o'clock we lunch. At three my mother likes me to go with her when she makes her calls, and we then come home to a five-o'clock tea, when some friends drop in. After that we get ready to take our drive in the park, and then we go home to dinner, and after dinner we go to the theatre or the opera, and then when we get home I am so dreadfully tired that I don't know what to do."

Tennyson's words,

> "A life of nothings nothing worth,"

may fitly be applied to such an existence; but what words can express the dreadful position of such an one when called upon by the All-seeing Judge to give an account of her stewardship!

$5000 FOR A DAY'S LIFE.

THERE was a rich man dying in Cornwall— man who lived for the world and without God As he lay upon his deathbed the doctor said to him, "I am sorry to have to tell you, sir, your hours are numbered." The dying man started up in his bed with a look of despair, and, grasp ing the doctor's hand, said, "You don't mean that, doctor!" "I do," said the doctor. "But doctor, I must live!" "I can't make you live my dear sir; you have only got a few hours be fore you." "Doctor, I must live another day!" "You are past my power, sir." "Doctor, I wil give you a thousand pounds for one more day' life." But it was no use. It would have been a grand bargain if he could only have had it Fancy one day more being worth a thousand pounds to him! But he couldn't get it. Th value of money, then, is what it brings. Wha has it brought you? Has it brought you peace Has it brought you hope? Has it brought yo calm? If not, it has not done much for you.

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE

At the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York.

HISTORY OF THE PRE-MILLENARIAN DOCTRINE.

By the Rev. Dr. N. West, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Doctrine a Protest against Unbroken Evolution—Grounded on the Visions of Daniel—Daniel's Visions Identical with those of John—The Opening and Closing Events of the 1000 Years—The Doctrine in Abeyance as the Church became Prosperous—Errors of the Fourth Century—Progress of the Doctrine in the Present Century—Eminent Advocates of the Doctrine Dead and Living—The Ordeals it has Survived—Persecutors always Anti-Chiliasts.

CHRISTIAN Chiliasm, or Pre-Millenarianism, is the doctrine of the personal reign of Christ upon earth 1000 years after Beast, False Prophet, and Apostate Christendom have been judged and perished in a common doom. It is the doctrine of a visible and external sovereignty of Christ upon earth as the outcome of history, the redeemed Church of all ages rejoicing in the fulness of a resurrection-life, in the actual presence of Him who is the "Prince of the Kings of the earth," a kingdom of outward glory, established upon the ruin of the polities of all nations, wide as the canopy of heaven.

It is a kingdom spiritual, in which carnal beatitudes have no place, the beggarly elements of Judaism no honor; a kingdom terrestrial and yet celestial, not of this world but of heaven; one in which Jew and Gentile, incorporated together, share the victory, blessedness, holiness, dominion, and communion of their Lord.

Redeemed humanity has another goal on earth than common zoology, and that goal is the kingdom of the resurrection. As Dörner has beautifully said: "Complete victory Christianity never can be, until nature has become an organ of its service, a willing instrument of the perfect man, that is, of the righteous who are raised from the dead."

As to the history of our earth, it looks upon the old Genesis as an apocalypse of the past given to Moses, the new genesis as an apocalypse of the future given to John, crowned with redemption. Its eye sweeps the whole field of development from Paradise lost to Paradise restored. The relation of the dispensation of the Promise to that of the Law is the analogue of the relation of the present dispensation to that of the Millennium. As the first was succeeded by a new age and a visible Kingdom of God on earth, so the present shall be succeeded by a new age, and the visible Kingdom of Christ; after which is the final consummation and eternal glory. "God may be all in all."

Pre-Millenialism is a protest against the doctrine of the unbroken evolution of the Kingdom of God to absolute perfection on earth, apart from the visible and miraculous intervention of Christ. It is an equal protest against that vapid idealism which volatilizes the perfect kingdom into a spiritual abstraction apart from the regenesis of the earth. It asserts that "glorified corporeity is the end of the ways of God," working from within outward, from the spirit to the body of the believer, and from both to the renovation of the planet. The Millennium is the transition stage in this process, succeeded by the everlasting state.

The evolution and history of the doctrine run parallel with the development and progress of all revelation. It does not rest upon an isolated passage in the Apocalypse, as many suppose; but upon the whole covenant of God in Christ for the redemption of man and earth from sin and its curse, and is the central point of eschatology. The circumstance that John, six times, in six consecutive verses of the same chapter, emphasizes the Kingdom as the reign of "a thousand years," vacates not the fact that, in connection with the sufferings of Christ, it was a chief part in the burden of "all that God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." (Acts 3: 21.) And the circumstances that some, who, in ancient as in modern times, have abused the doctrine to a carnal sense, have been called "Chiliasts," or "Millenarians," vacates not the fact that a true Christian Chîliasm was the orthodox faith of the primitive Church in its purest days.

"Christian Chiliasm showed no favor to the fleshly Israel, nor even to its holy city." "So far from being derivable from it, it may in part be more justly regarded as a polemic against Judaism, on the part of Christianity. Pre-Millenarianism is no device of "later Jews" sighing for temporal deliverance from a Syrian or Roman yoke. They never admitted a "Second Advent" in any case. They knew no Millennium save a perpetual kingdom of Solomonic and carnal splendor, under a temporal prince, with the Levitical cultures revived. Their motto was, "Moses forever!"

It is no Gnostic conceit nor Patristic invention. Not Cerintheus nor Papias were its authors, but John the Apostle. Not John the Apostle alone, but Peter and Paul, Isaiah and Ezekiel, Daniel and Zechariah, Moses and David and Enoch, "holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (2 Pet. 1: 21.) That it has thus an inspired Jewish origin, so far from being a prejudice against it, only entitles it to universal acceptance, for "salvation is of the Jews." That it should be denied because traduced or perverted, or that it should be held responsible for the misrepresentations of its enemies, or the indiscretion of its friends, is a method of estimation that files us at once, in funeral procession, to the grave of all Christian doctrine.

That it is beset with difficulties and suggestive of questions none may resolve, and productive, at times, of seemingly irreconcilable contradictions, is only what is common to all the doctrines of grace, cherished by the whole Church as the inspired word of God. The question, "How can these things be?" is not of faith, but of puny reason baffled by a mystery of glory no less than by a mystery of grace. Nicodemus would have been an Anti-Pre-Millenarian. As the doctrine stands in the Scripture, it is the doctrine of the "Day-Dawn," and "Phospher" of eternal glory, more sure than the vision on Tabor's height or audible voice from heaven, part of the "Sabbatism" that remains for the people of God, the earthly bloom of "a Kingdom that cannot be moved," when the Voice that once shook the earth shall shake, once more, "not the earth only, but also heaven. (Heb. 12: 26.)

The history of the Pre-Millenial Doctrine grounds itself eminently in and so far as inspired record of it goes, completes itself in the visions of John. The prophetic page of Daniel was regarded as a sacred calendar of the future, measuring the range of successive Gentile empires from the captivity date to the finishing of the mystery of God under the seventh trumpet, embracing the conversion of the Jews or recall of Israel to the covenant, the overthrow of Antichrist, and the first resurrection, a course of history spanning 490 years of the later Jewish dispensation, all the Christian dispensations closing with the overthrow of the Beast and Little Horn, and the erection of Daniel's fifth and everlasting kingdom as an external polity, upon the extinct polities of all nations. The whole time thus coverd by this scope was the long period of Israel's expectation, running parallel with the Captivity, Restoration, Rejection, the times of the Antichristian Apostacy, and the time of the end.

The prophetic page of John, too, was regarded by the early Church as a compend, not of the details but of the chief events and results of history in their relation to the coming Kingdom, a further development of the vision of Daniel, depicting the rise and progress of Antichrist, the final overthrow of the ten-partite Roman Empire, and the judgment on Antichrist at the end of the mystic 1260 days—the Great Image no longer standing on its feet, Beast and False Prophet no longer existing, the Millennial Kingdom coming with One who comes in the clouds of heaven. With such a view it was impossible for the early Church not to be Pre-Millenarian, for the visions of Daniel (7) and John (Apoc. 4: 22) were one.

The carnal hope of a Jewish Kingdom having perished with the death of Christ, the Apostolic Church addressed itself to the work of winning souls to Christ, in a present spiritual kingdom of inward hidden virtue, a life with Christ in God, yet destined hereafter to bloom into glorious visible dominions, at the manifestation of the sons of God. The certainty of the "Appearing and Kingdom" coming both together, in outward splendor on earth, was never doubted by any save such as Hymeneus and Philetus, who denied the resurrection. The whole dispute in the early Church centred around the order and relation of certain events and the time of their occurrence—a dispute terminated by the declarations of Paul and the visions of John.

PARALLELISM OF DANIEL AND JOHN.

The early Church saw a complete identification between the vision of Daniel 7, and the Apocalypse of John 4, and onward. It was impossible to avoid the conviction that Daniel 7: 9–15, 18, 22, 26, 27, described the scenes attending the second advent, and was parallel with Apoc. 19: 11, 21; 20: 1, 7, the Apostle simply introducing the one thousand years, and separating certain events, according to their relations, in the remainder of the chapter. This is manifest if we compare the parallel expressions of the two visions—a parallelism that has attracted the notice of so many critics, and which is here explained more fully than is usually done:

Daniel says:	John says:
7: 13: "I gazed in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven."	1: 7: "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him."
7: 9, 10: "I went on gazing till the thrones were set."—"The judgment was set, and the books were opened."	20: 4: "I saw thrones and they sat upon them." 20: 11: "I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it." 20: 12: "The books were opened."
7: 22: "And judgment was given to the saints of the Most High."	20: 4: "And judgment was given unto them."
7: 22-27: "And the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. And the kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven was given to the people of the saints of the Most High."	20: 4, 5, 6: "And they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. This is the first resurrection. They shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years."

And as to the duration of the dominancy of the persecuting Antichrist, or ten horned beast, with its ruling head developed from the horns, and its final ruin,

Daniel says:	John says:
7: 25: "It was to be for a time, times, and the dividing of a time."	11: 2, 3; 12: 14. "It was to be a time, times, and half a time."
7: 11: "I gazed on till the beast was slain and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame."	19: 20: "And the beast was taken, and the false prophet, and both were cast alive into a lake of fire, burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain." etc

Nothing is clearer than that the announcement of the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven relates to His "Second Advent," and not to his first, and that the early Church was not in error when identifying these visions as one—the latter only an expression of the former, developed under the higher light of a later eschatology. Certain events, combined in one and the same scene in Daniel, are sundered, by the revealing spirit in John's vision, 1000 years apart. A new vista is opened in the bosom of the later Apocalyptic. But Daniel's vision takes in all at both ends of the 1000 years in John's vision. It is that very vision to which Christ alluded familiarly to the Sanhedrim, when in solemn utterance, and on trial before Caiaphas, on the morning of his crucifixion, He said: "Hereafter ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of Power, and coming in the clouds of Heaven." (Matt. 26: 64.)

Another Sanhedrim of the Holy Ones should sit, God the Father, not Caiphas, presiding, the Son of Man coming with His saints to receive the Kingdom forever. It settles the question that the vision of Daniel refers to the second advent, and that the earthly kingdom he describes as set up "under the whole heaven," and "given to the saints of the Most High," and received by Christ, is a kingdom given Him, not upon His ascension into heaven, but upon His return to earth for judgment of the Antichristian Beast and the persecuting Horn, at the end of the 1260 days, in other words, the millennial kingdom named by John.

I may add in vindication of this harmony, which the primitive Church clearly saw, that if, as Dr. David Brown holds, in his work on the "Second Advent," the vision of Daniel, chapter 7, "has nothing to do with the second advent of Christ," then the vision of John has nothing to do with the Second Advent, for both are confessed to be the same vision alike by himself and Dr. Fairbairn. But if the vision of Daniel does relate to the Second Advent, as Christ's words to Caiaphas clearly show, then John's vision relates to the same, and the outward kingdom described by both is the same, "erected" at the same time—the time of the smiting of the Image on the Toes, and of the Judicial Verdict on Beast and False Prophet ; the time of the second coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven. The "Blow" and the "Verdict" fall together. The "Stone of Israel" is the "Judge."

Nor was the early Church in error, when regarding the 1000 years of John as a measure of time, more or less, dividing the great events of a vast transition-age between the close of the present age, or "last time," and the age that is ended ; clearly it noted the vivid contrast between the four great events marking the opening, and the four corresponding, but contrasted events, marking the close of the 1000 years. They are :

1. Satan bound for 1000 years, and cast into the abyss.	1. Satan loosed out of his prison when the 1000 years are expired.
2. The nations deceived no more till the 1000 years are fulfilled.	2. The nations deceived which are in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog.
3. Thrones and judgment given to the saints living and reigning with Christ a thousand years.	3. The camp of the saints and the beloved city compassed about.
4. The first resurrection of the blessed dead, who are priests of God and of Christ.	4. The resurrection of the rest of the dead, after the thousand years are finished.

The antithesis is perfect as possible. The apparent contradiction—arising from the intercalation of the 1000 years between the representations of the Apocalypse which divide events bound together in other Scriptures, or seemingly so bound, or spoken together in one breath, or combined in one scene on the same plane, and tied to the same hour of fulfilment—presented no difficulty either to the faith or the understanding of the early Church. . . .

I come now to speak of the period succeeding the politico-religious triumph of Constantine, the period of THE TEMPORAL SUPREMACY OF CHRISTIANITY in the Roman Empire. The martyr-age had pased away. "As the aspect of outward affairs changed under Constantine, these views lost their hold on men's minds. The Church now prepared for a long-continued period of temporal prosperity, and the State Church of that time forgot the millennial glory of the future." "When Christianity became a worldly power by Constantine, the hope of the future was weakened by the joy over the present success." "Chiliasm disappeared in proportion as Roman Papal Catholicism advanced. The Papacy took to itself, as a robbery, that glory which is an object of hope, and can only be reached by obedience and humility of the cross. When the Church became a harlot she ceased to be a bride who goes to meet her bridegroom ; and thus Chiliasm disappeared. This is the deep truth that lies at the bottom of the Protestant, antipapistic interpretation of the Apocalypse."

A new theory of the Millennium was the result of the fabled Labarum and the batle of Saxa Rubra and the Milvian Bridge. It is that the Millennium is a present fact. Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones, flesh-covered and erect, a standing army, is realized. Baptism is regeneration. Crowned neophytes, arrayed in white robes, with palm branches in their hands, surround the altar, while priests and elders chant the new song. The martyrs become intercessors. All the Old Testament prophecies respecting Israel are claimed for the Empire of the fourth century, and "New Jerusalem" shines beneath the sceptre of an unbaptized imperial Roman catechumen, dazzling in purple and gold. The 1000 years, beginning with the second advent, are ingeniously slipped back, by "recapitulation," over the whole line of the Christian dispensation, and dated from the Birth and Ministry of Christ. Satan is seized, chained, bound, shut up, sealed in the "abyss," which now turns out to be the "non-Christian nations," or the "hearts of the wicked." The Church militant is the Church triumphant, the thrones of judgment are the ecclesiastical benches of the unseen Twelve Apostles ruling in the Church by virtue of their living work. The 1000 years' reign is partly ecclesiastical, in so far as relates to the church establishment ; partly temporal, in so far as relates to the empire ; partly spiritual, in so far as relates to regeneration ; partly ceremonial, in so far as relates to baptism ; partly celestial, in so far as relates to the blessedness of the righteous in heaven. This is the "First Resurrection."

The spiritual view proposed by way of substitute for the primitive Chiliasm, deemed "gross" because of its kingdom "on earth !" Such was the theory of the great Augustine, by which the future Millennium, the hope of the martyrs, was spiritualized into a present politico-religious fact, and whose name did more to fasten it upon the Church for thirten centuries than all other names besides.

Primitive Chiliasm could not flourish under the Christianized purple of Cæsar any more than under the papal tiara and the scarlet. The fatal blow to the doctrine of Polycarp and Irenæus was given, first of all, by a Roman Pope at the close of the fourth century, who condemned the martyr-faith as a "heresy," . . . .

[Dr. West then traced the history of the doctrine through the successive centuries in a manner which displayed profound learning and must have been the result of considerable labor and research. The limits of space at our disposal precludes our publishing this part of Dr. West's able paper.]

As we look back upon three quarters of THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, now passed, and mark the progress of the doctrine of the Pre-Millennial Advent of Christ, by what a galaxy of illustrious names it is adorned, by what piety commended, by what unquestioned orthodoxy and scholarship supported, and how the Church seems to be rallying around it, as in the martyr-age, we are filled with gratitude and amazement. What an All-Wise Providence means to to intimate, it is well to consider.

Amid many difficulties and diversities of interpretation, inseparable from a theme so great, spanning as it does the whole Kingdom of God, and which none but a sciolist would expect the Church to completely solve at the present day, the main doctrine holds on its way, ever achieving new victories in which both "continuist" and "futurist" expositors rejoice.

The progress of history only confirms the Protestant interpretation, without, however, limiting the development of Antichrist to the Papacy or spiritual Babylon to Rome. It is enough to know that Antichrist arises and comes to his end in the very bosom of apostate Christendom ; enough to know that the Infidelity of our times is located under the sixth and seventh vials, according to the continuist expositors, who, in company with the futurists, believe we are approaching the "time of the end."

Pre-Millenarian voices have come, sounding deep and sublime, in his century, from the bosom of the Papacy itself. Pierre Lambert, a scholar of great learning, a French Dominican, renounced the Papal theory while yet in the Papal Church, and published an eloquent defence of Christian Chiliasm.

The great Chalmers said : "Of this I am satisfied, that the next coming of Christ will be a coming not to final judgment, but a coming to usher in the Millennium. I utterly despair of the universal prevalence of Christianity as the result of a missionary process. I look for its conclusive establishment through a widening passage of desolations and judgments, with the demolition of our civil and ecclesiastical structure. Overturn, Overturn, Overturn, is the watchword of our approaching Lord. I desire to cherish a more habitual and practical faith than heretofore in that coming which even the first Christians were called to hope for with all earnestness, even though many centuries were to elapse ere the hope could be realized ; and how much more we, who are so much nearer this great fulfilment than at the time when they believed."

In the same hope stood Dr. Candlish an many others gone to meet the Bridegroom already and accompany Him in His return ; whil Robert Hall lamented to the Rev. Mr. Thorp "that he had not preached the Millenarian views he entertained."

It is simply impossible to catalogue all th names in the present century that cluster roun the doctrine to give it their support. I ca mention only a few of them. Among Presbyterians abroad we find the names of Cha mers, Irving, Candlish, Hewitson, Anderson Begg, the three Bonars, McCheyne, Burns Gilfillan, Hamilton, Cumming, Mackay, Adolp Saphir, Frazer, Jamieson, Faussett, Cochran specimens of many more equally eminent fo their learning, scholarship, orthodoxy and Chri tian zeal. In the United States such names a George Duffield, Robt. J. Breckenridge, Kreb Lillie, Shimeall—all gone to their reward—ar followed in this testimony by living ministers the word, Duffield, of Princeton, Willis Lor Brookes, Craven, Imbrie, Poor, Van Dore Blauvelt, Kellogg, R. D. Morris, Laird, Wilso Parsons, Wyckoff, Congdon, Lee, Whittlese Cooper. Moorehead, Flint, Adams, Pierce, Sa key, Stewart, Foote, Baker, Gillespie, Frenc Reed, Davis, Sample, Marvin, Reynolds, War maker, Wallace, Patterson, Erdman, Matthew Galloway, Bar, Ashurst, Bacon, Mack, Ed Paxon, Pitzer, Dinwiddie, Marquis, and mul tudes more have enrolled on the list of Chiliar

The Church of England abroad is like Josep a fruitful vine whose branches run over the wa Elliott and Maitland, Birks, Bickersteth, Aur and Freemantle. Ryle, Hoare, Rainsford, Wo Molynaux, Kelley, Cox, Wilson, Noel, Bro Smith, Trotter, Stevenson, Shephard, Newt Alford, Ellicott, Brooks, Pym, Dalton, Gresw Burgh, Todd—men of the first culture and sition—are only instances of a multitude m among the Anglican Bishops, Prebendari Canons, Deans, and Rectors who assert the F Millenial Advent of Christ and a literal f resurrection. Noble names in the Episco Church of the United States stand by their si McIlvaine, Henshaw, Niles, the two Tyn Winthrop, Morgan, Johnson, Nicholson, V Bancroft, Perkins, Hastings, Farrer, Boc Ward, Grammer, Feltwell, Dobbs, Smith, N ton, Trenwith.

Among the Congregationalists who hold e same faith are Lorimer, Wild, Adams, Mort, Milton, Goodwin, Kingman, Bancroft, Burt, Andrews, Clarke, Russel, Cunningham.

Among the Baptists are Gordon, Herr, Sa ders, Harris, Evans, Stifler, Barralle, Pet, Tower, Jones, Brown, Beckley, Miller, Wh, Jacobs, Cameron, Titus, Cordo, Stone.

In the Methodist denomination : Parker, bert, Hall, Harvey, Foster, Blackstone, Lum s.

In the Reformed Dutch Church : Thomps n, Demarest, Gorden, R. F. Clarke, Merrit, W. Clark, Ballagh, Bishop, Brown.

All these are unanimous on the two main o sitions of the Pre-Millenarians' doctrine, the Pre-Millennial Advent and the literal st resurrection.

Nor has it been the least noticeable fact that, in is century, eminent laymen like Cunningham, bine, Hugh Miller, the Duke of Manchester, ord, Jones, Habershen, Alexander, and others, e Sir Isaac Newton, Tycho Brahe, and Lord apier, before them, have not disdained to udy or write on the prophecies, and declare emselves convinced of the Pre-Millenarian ctrine.

Nor is it possible to enumerate all the various gencies by which, in the present century, as ilwarks of support, Chiliasm is defended in the arious nations of Christendom; public lectures. itical works—the mere titles of which would fill volume—magazines, reviews, discourses, tracts, ssertations, expositions, and productions on vaous portions of the all-absorbing theme. Never, nce the martyr-age, has Christian Chiliasm atined such distinction. Ere long the early aith will be general again, nor will it need either creed or a council to tell the Church that it is cumenical. Intelligent textual criticism is on s side, resting alone on a grammatical and hisorical basis. The structure of the Apocalypse on its side. The "Recapitulation" theory is oomed. The laws of prophetic interpretation, etter understood, are on its side, as are the ws of symbolism and apocalytic. The compreension of history, in its scope, progress, relaions, and unity, converging to one end, is on its ide.

THE ORDEALS OF THE DOCTRINE.

When we consider but one moment again what earful odds this precious doctrine of the peronal appearing of the Incarnate Redeemer on arth, to unite the heirs and the inheritance in a lorious visible Kingdom, has had to force its way through the centuries, we shall stand amazed, and confess that only because it is an mperishable truth of God has it been able to survive the ordeal which it has passed.

The debasement of the doctrine by intermixtures of Jewish fables and carnal conceits; the reproach that attended it because confessed by the martyrs of Jesus whom the whole power of the empire was invoked to destroy; its offensiveness to the national feelings of Greeks and Romans; the hostility of the Samaritan Magus, and the whole prolific brood of his Gnostic sects for three centuries, with their idealistic and Sadducean creed; the excesses of the Phrygian Montanus; the false principles of the Alexandrian school; the delusive charm of a Church and State theory, so potent and plausible after two centuries and a half of martyrdom; the splendor of Constantine's establishment; the open repudiation of the Apocalypse and Gospel of John; the Eusebian perversion of the Old Testament prophecies; the false theory of Recapitulation, and the force of Augustine's great name; the stumbling-block that the Divine promises of God in Christ to the Church relate only to spiritual things, and to nothing earthly: the miscalculations of time-reckoners; the false panics in history as to the end of the world; the injury of the doctrine by fanatical and revolutionary sects proclaiming war against all human government; the want of a true conception of the structure of the Apocalypse, and of the laws of the prophetic and symbolic utterances; the application of Old Testament predictions concerning Israel to the spiritual Gentile Church; the general indisposition of men to take any interest in the study of the Kingdom, except the selfish one that relates to their own personal salvation; all these are only a part of the encircling and mountain-like obstacles by which the pre-millennial doctrine has been besieged, and against which it has had to contend.

But it still lives, instinct with immortal vigor. Like the olive tree sung by Sophocles, a plant of divine growth, not set by human hands, it still grows stronger by every blast; a plant destructive to its foes, and which none in earlier or later times have been able to uproot or destroy. Yea, more, when we consider what it has borne and suffered, and how it has triumphed over Jewish perversion, Imperial persecution, Papal hatred, and Protestant indifference, and to-day enjoys a resurrection, ascension, and reign more glorious then ever since it went to the dungeon and flame, then do we know that it is itself a true child of the martyrs, whose future is assured, whose final victory is pledged, and the lustre of whose truth shall blaze in the splendor of the righteous when they shall "shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father."

Nor let it be objected to the doctrine of the personal reign of Christ on earth, that it has been espoused by men who ill understood the genius of the Gospel, and that fanatical leaders have at times made it their watchword and cry. Deep in the heart of sin-stricken humanity rests the sense of its oppression and helplessness. The turning of man, maddened by despotic power, regenerate or unregenerate, to the magic virtue of this one and only hope of reform, the Kingdom of Christ on earth, has been a tribute in every age to Him who clothed Himself in human flesh for man's deliverance.

Sounding along the ages, in one form or other, alike from the lips of those who ill understand and well understood the Gospel, "Maranatha" has waked its thrilling echoes; from Daniel in the lions' den and the Hebrew children in the furnace, to the days of Maccabean valor, and the times of Judas the Gaulonite, and Thendas boasting himself to be some one. It has been humanity's hope, as well as the Church's hope, when all other hopes have failed; from martyrs in the Pagan amphitheatre and flame, to martyrs marching in auto-da-fe to Papal scaffolds, fagots, and death; from Ignatius and Polycarp, to Olivia and Ubertins, and on to Latimer cheering Ridley at the stake. In the bosom of the apostasy itself this hope was the hope that broke through the gloom upon eyes that watched for the coming day. It graved the silver tablets of Cyril on Mount Carmel, and sent them to Rome presaging the doom of Antichrist and the rise of a Kingdom to follow. The enchantment of this hope has been felt; the only hope of a ruined world, ill understood indeed by some, but well understood by others, to whom the grace of faith is given to behold in Christ its substance and its sum.

Little has he weighed the relation of that coming Kingdom to the present creation "groaning and travailing in pain," and outstretching its neck for deliverance, who objects to the pre-millennial doctrine because it has been embraced in a distorted form by some who but poorly understood the Gospel. Christ is the "Desire of all nations." If pagan altars and victims and the unconscious prophecy of heathendom are an argument for the truth of the First Advent to atone for sin, much more the appeal in apostate Christendom to the millennial hope, by oppressed humanity driven to despair, is an argument for the truth of the Second Advent to begin the personal reign of Christ on earth.

And equally powerless is the attempt to stigmatize the holders of this hope as aiders and abettors of "heresy." That is a weapon which cuts fearfully in the opposite direction. Never has there existed a persecutor of God's saints on earth, since the dawn of Christianity, who was not an Anti-Chiliast. The apostate Church of Rome, idolatrous corrupter of every truth of God, and red with the blood of God's saints, was built and nurtured on an Anti-Chiliastic creed. The first perversion of this hope was by a heretic, Cerinthus or Montanus. The first assault upon it was by the rationalizing Origen, who became a Universalist. The next was by Dionysius, who denied the Apocalypse of John.

If in days to come a personal Antichrist more God-defying and blaspheming than him who sits in Rome shall rise, one of the marks that will signalize him as the concentration of satanic energy and hate will be that he is a pronounced Anti-Chiliast. And just in proportion as such time shall approach, will this glorious martyr-truth revive, as all history shows, and to suffering saints will it be given again to witness for that same hope under which the first confessors of Jesus, comforted, supported, and strengthened, sank singing to their tombs.

THE SAILOR AND THE CATECHIST.

In a small town in the north of Scotland there lived a venerable-looking man, who was catechist of the parish, and esteemed by all as a most excellent Christian.

A young sailor belonging to the same town, who came home on a visit to his parents, had been converted to God in Aberdeen. It was told around that a great change for the better had come over the young man, as was very manifest in all he said and did.

Shortly after his return the converted sailor and the old catechist met in the house of sorrow, where they, with many others, had come to sympathize with the bereaved. The night was spent in devotional exercises, according to the custom of the country.

During the evening the young sailor was requested to take the Bible and conduct worship. After reading he thought he would speak to the people, and, in the simplicity of his heartfelt gratitude to God, he was moved to tell them what the Lord had done for his soul; and so he told them how God had awakened him, and for Christ's sake had freely pardoned all his sins. As soon as he had finished, the old catechist inquired if he understood him to mean that his sins were forgiven?

"Oh yes," replied the young man, "I know that God for Christ's sake has pardoned all my sins."

"Well, well," said the old man, trembling with emotion and indignation, "I have been more than twenty years following after righteousness, and I would not presume to say that yet."

The youth, not at all discouraged by this intended rebuke at his supposed presumption, replied, "Dear friend, it is quite reasonable and scriptural that I should obtain forgiveness, and not you."

"Why so?" said the old professor.

"You know, my dear sir, when I was a scholar in your school you could manage the whole school easier than you could me. I was thoughtless and wicked. I had no goodness nor righteousness. But," holding out his hands as if they contained the things he spoke of, he said, "I come to God through the righteousness and death of the Lord Jesus Christ: you come through your own twenty years' righteousness. Now, tell me, which will God look at? His own Son's finished work, or your twenty years' righteousness."

When these two parted at the house of mourning the Scripture was fulfilled: "He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away" (Luke 1 : 53).

KINDNESS TO A POOR APPRENTICE.

At Wichern's Institution for poor boys in Germany (similar to Dr. Barnardo's in London), one evening, when a boy, had repeated aloud the pious grace, "Come, Lord Jesus, be our guest, and bless what thou hast provided," a little fellow looked up, and said, "Do tell me why the Lord Jesus never comes. We ask him every day to sit with us, but He never comes." "I shall set him a seat," said the little fellow, and just then there was a knock at the door. A poor frozen apprentice entered, begging a night's lodging. He was made welcome; the chair stood empty for him; every child wanted him to have his plate; and one was lamenting that his bed was too small for the stranger, who was quite touched by such uncommon attentions.

The little one had been thinking hard all the time, "Jesus could not come, and so he sent this poor man in his place; is that it?" "Yes, dear child, that is just it. Every piece of bread and drink of water that we give to the poor, or the sick, or the prisoners, for Jesus' sake, we give to him. 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'" The children sang a hymn of the love of God to their guest before they parted for the night, and neither he nor they were likely to forget this simple Bible comment on Matthew 25.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ANNOUNCEMENT

IN commencing the publication of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES IN AMERICA, it was impossible to form an accurate or even an approximate idea of the extent to which it would enjoy the favor of the Religious Public. The price was therefore fixed at four cents per single copy, that being the lowest sum deemed prudent under the circumstances.

Now, however, after the issue of only ten numbers, the journal has attained a circulation which, in connection with the numbers of commendatory letters daily received, justifies a

REDUCTION IN PRICE.

We have accordingly much pleasure in announcing that the price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES is now reduced to

for single copies. Annual subscription, postage paid, $1.50.

THOUGH but a few weeks have elapsed since the issue of the first number of the American edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we feel constrained thus early to express our grateful thanks for the numerous friendly greetings and kind expressions of appreciation that have reached us from every quarter.

While thankful to all who have aided us, we have at this time especially to acknowledge the aid and sympathy of hundreds of ministers from all parts of the country, and of every denomination.

It has been the occasion of surprise that while we have received hundreds of letters commendatory of the appearance and character of the paper in detail, there has been not one objection, either to particular articles or to the general course of the paper.

We ask a continuance of the sympathy and co-operation of our brethren of every name. We greatly desire that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall reach every family in the United States, and believe that the above reduction in price ought to effect that object.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Yellow-Fever subscription-list for New York has been made up by Mayor Ely, and has just been published. It appears that he received in all $68,253.33, which was forwarded to the infected districts in eighty-nine remittances as the money came in, and in varying proportions according to the needs of the different localities. The amount sent to Memphis was $24,860.39, and to New Orleans $19,323.18. This is a creditable record for New York, and shows that though there is a "rarity of Christian charity under the sun," there are occasions that prove it is not by any means extinct.

The Coinage.—A bill is to be introduced into Congress after the holidays providing for the coinage of silver dollars. It is proposed to make them 480 grains troy, 900 fine, and to impress a stamp upon them like the trade dollar, so unpopular just now, but omitting the word trade and inserting in its place the word one. They are to be legal tender and exchangeable at the Treasury for gold. The Secretary of the Treasury is also empowered by the bill to continue printing the small denominations of the currency of the value of twenty-five, and fifty cents, for the convenience of transmission by post.

The Interests of the Southern States would be materially forwarded by the establishment of factories for the manufacture of cotton goods; and ex-Governor Rufus B. Bullock, of Georgia, in a letter to the Tribune, draws attention to the advantages to be derived by Northern capitalists who might employ their money in this enterprise. He says: "It is just coming to be realized that the cheap abundance of steam-making coal, almost in the very fields where the lint is produced, together with the superior climate and superabundance of that class of people who make the most efficient mill operatives, renders the Central South the most favored section for the successful operation of cotton mills. The mills in Georgia, South Carolina, and Alabama have been uniformly profitable. Georgia exempts from taxation for either State, municipal, or county purposes for ten years all capital invested in cotton manufacturing enterprises, and we will welcome with open arms and fair dealing all who choose to come among us for purposes of business enterprise."

The Mexican Tragedy, in which the ill-fated Maxmilian lost his life, has had fresh light thrown upon it during the last few days. It is now stated on authority which appears to be reliable, that Mr. Seward was anxious to save the life of the Emperor, and even caused steps to be taken to effect that object; but unfortunately the United States minister at the court of Mexico was absent at the critical time, and the representations of Mr. Seward were not pressed with the authority the gravity of the occasion demanded. Somebody must have been to blame, but whoever it may have been it is satisfactory to learn that Mr. Seward's fame is not sullied by any reflection of negligence in that terrible crime.

Mr. Sankey, at the Y. M. C. A., London, related the following anecdote: Shortly before slavery was abolished in America, a number of slaves were sold by auction in one of the Southern States. The sale-room was thronged, and among the slaves for sale was a most beautiful young girl, fair and lovely, with scarce a drop of negro blood in her veins, but her mother had been a slave and so was she. The sale commenced, and one after another the slaves were knocked down. At last this beautiful girl was put up for sale. The bidding was very spirited, and what seemed to give much annoyance to the poor girl was the fact that the one who was bidding the highest was a Northerner, and the Northern States had discountenanced slavery. At last the young girl was knocked down to this bidder. He gave instructions to the auctioneer to take charge of her till the morning and he would fetch her. On the morrow "Mary" was called for. She opened the door, and her purchaser then said: "Yesterday I bought you, but here are your free papers bearing the seal of the Court; you are now free to go where you like." Looking up in his face, the poor girl said: "Will you allow me to go with you?" This young girl has grown up with his family, and become as one of them. In like manner Jesus has paid for us; He has died to set us free. Are we, like this young girl who followed her purchaser, going to follow Jesus? These poor slaves, when forsaken by man and the world, were accustomed to gather in their cabins and sing, "Stealing away to Jesus." Let us also seek to steal away to Jesus.

"One more Unfortunate" met with a terrible death on Christmas eve. She was found frost-bitten on the road near Roger's City, Michigan, and being carried to the hospital it was deemed necessary to amputate both her legs; but she died under the operation. She was a native of Cleveland, but had been living at Alpena, where she had led an immoral life, and she said that the inhabitants had driven her out of the place, in the bitterly cold winter night, insufficiently clad, and overcome with cold and weariness she had laid herself down to die. Verily "the way of the transgressor is hard," and it is never so hard as when self-righteous Pharisees have the making of it. It is to be hoped some exculpation will come from Alpena, or the stigma of gross inhumanity and fiendish cruelty will be perpetually allied to its name for this outrage. I was not thus the Master dealt with "the woma who was a sinner." The existence of this clas of women cannot be too greatly deplored, bu be their sins what they may, they are no excus for cruelty like this. Many of that class woul gladly return to paths of virtue if they were encouraged to do so, and the crying injustice c society is, that the scorn and repudiation of respectable people falls exclusively on the woman while the man who is partaker of her sin escape with impunity.

The Wrong End of the Switch.—A father an daughter at Wellesley, Mass., were mutually recalling incidents of the latter's childhood. " shall never forget," said the young lady, "ho you took me out of church one Sabbath, when was about three years old, and punished me f playing in meeting. I can remember the ti gling of that peach-tree switch to this day." "Very strange, very strange," said the father "I don't recollect the circumstance at all." "Ah, well, papa, you were at the other end the switch!"

The Fulton-Street Prayer-Meeting has bee the source of good to many of God's childre through the country, and letters come in dai bearing witness to the efficacy of believing ar united prayer. From its records we extract t following:

A brother requested thanksgiving to-da Some months since he asked prayer for a po miserable, dissipated man, whose home was t abode of wretchedness and desolation, a whose heart was a cave of hissing serpents stinging, soul-poisoning serpents of appetite a lust. To-day that man's home is a picture Paradise, and his heart the home of Jesus. T speaker relating the incident had follow prayer with effort, and accompanied continue persistent effort with persevering prayer t God's heart of love responded, and the sinne heart of adamant melted and yielded to Christ

A friend in Westchester County, New Yor says: "Some time ago I wrote you requesti prayer for my only child's conversion. Th prayer has been answered, for which I tha the Lord daily." Another returns thanks prayer answered in connection with the temp ance work in Plainfield, N. J.

An interesting acknowledgment of answe prayer was made by a young man. "I sent a l ter to you last March," he said, "asking you pray that my mother and I might be convert I was then under deep conviction of sin. I joice now to be able to tell you that I ha found peace with God through faith in Lord Jesus Christ. But my mother is not ye Christian. Do not forget my mother."

The Chinaman and his Finger.—The Rev. W. Muirhead, Missionary in China, relates the following: A curious case occurred one day in the hospital. A Chinaman came and begged to have his finger cut off. There was nothing whatever the matter with it, so he was asked what he meant. He replied, "I must lose this finger. If I burn it off with a candle it will be far more painful than if you cut it off skilfully with your knife." "But why do you want it cut off?" "Oh! I have been a great sinner, and I must atone for my sins in this way." He afterwards explained what his sins were. It seems he had been connected with a foreigner, at Ningpo, in making a road, which necessitated the removal of a grave. This is an awful desecration in Chinese eyes, and he had been troubled eversince by the sense of his sin and the fear of punishment.

He said the foreigner had been punished severely; for, some time after, he was riding over a small stone bridge, and the stone gave way, so that he and his horse were pitched below, and he was killed. All the natives agreed this was the vengeance of the unseen world on his crime. As for himself, trouble had followed him ever since, and he was now old, and dreaded worse evil after death. He was anxious to become a Buddhist priest, and work off his sin by gaining merit; but this was a necessary condition—that he must first part with his finger.

Mr. Muirhead took the man, and explained to him a better way of obtaining the pardon he sought. After he had spent some time in showing him that Christ had died for our sins, the man replied, "Well, I have heard all that before. I am now not so anxious to become a Buddhist priest. I am quite as willing to become a Christian; only, if I do so, how much will you give me?" He did not see any reason why he should not live by the one religion as much as the other. Buddhism is a livelihood as well as a faith to its priests, why not Christianity also?

Suddenly Called.—A few weeks ago Mr. Sherman, an earnest Christian man, was seated at his desk in Albany Street, Boston, America, engaged at figures, when a chance rifle ball from some distant point entered the window and buried itself in his lungs. He was at once conveyed to the city hospital. On seeing the item in the newspaper that afternoon, a friend hurried to his bedside and found him calm and natural; the ball had not been found, and he was not expecting to live. "I have a peace which passeth understanding," was his testimony, and his calm smiling face bore out the statement. Within three days he died. A little mission chapel which he helped to carry on will sadly miss him, for he was a faithful, godly, prayerful laborer, and one who rejoiced in his Saviour's love. So sudden a death suggests the inquiry to each of us, "Am I equally ready to meet my God?"

Setting Out for Death and Finding Life.—Twenty-five years ago, several dozens of miles from Osaka, in Japan, in a large place called Tango, a death occurred in an important family of ability and wealth. The Japanese divide the years into cycles of twelve, each one called after an animal, "rat, bull, tiger, hare," etc., and it is written over the dead that he was separated from this world in the tiger year. Well, nothing more was thought of it until the tiger year came round again, and then the husband and father sickened and died. The widow, a woman of energy and directing power, carried on the silk business, and prosperity followed her plans until the dreaded and fatal tiger year again came along with January, 1878. "Whose turn is it to die this year?" was the question opened. The old lady, with the hopeless resignation that Buddhism often gives its followers, volunteered to consecrate herself to death, that the younger ones of the family might live on as was fitting.

When this was agreed to, though no doubt with earnest protestations of horror from all the rest, she determined to make a pilgrimage to the centre of idolatry—the province of Ise—visiting celebrated temples by the way, and scattering generous gifts to the gods, that thereby, with a clean heart, she might meet her fate. Attended by a single servant, she stopped in Osaka about three months, and put up at the house of old friends. That night, for the first time, she heard about the Christian religion from a believer. She listened to Christian instruction for a week, and gave a dollar to the church. After another two weeks, she felt she must buy dozens of parts of the Bible and other religious books to take back home as presents. After another week she gave a dollar to the girls' school, and another to the church; and she gave still another towards supporting a coolie whom the Christians had found dying some twenty miles from there, and had put in their hospital. After another week it was arranged that, since she hardly dared go home and face all the questions that would multiply upon her, the old couple with whom she was staying would return with her, and help her to tell the new old story of her conversion to Christ.

Another Steamboat Disaster is reported, with a loss it is feared of thirty-six lives. A telegram from Jamaica, bearing date December 27th, states that two seaman had arrived there belonging to the Emily B. Souder, which left New York for San Domingo December 8th, having on board a crew of twenty-nine and nine passengers. The two men report that the steamer foundered on December 10th, but at present no details are known. The two men saved were picked up from a life raft by a Boston schooner, the Abbot Devereux.

Light the Candles.—The 19th of May, 1780, was remarkably dark in Connecticut. Candles were lighted in many houses, the birds were silent and disappeared, and domestic fowls retired to roost. The people were impressed by the idea that the day of judgment was at hand. This opinion was entertained by the Legislature, at that time sitting at Hartford. The House of Representatives adjourned; the Council proposed to follow the example. Colonel Davenport objected. "The day of judgment," he said, "is either approaching, or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for an adjournment; if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I wish, therefore, that candles may be brought." This is the attitude in which Christ warned His disciples to be found. "Watch, therefore, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

The Burning of Bethesda Church, Dublin, during a great storm on January 6th, 1839, was an eventful incident in the life of its pastor, the late Bishop Gregg. This seeming disaster led, however, to the erection of a larger church for him to preach in, and one, too, which was in a more suitable locality—Trinity Church, Lower Gardiner Street. Here he continued his ministrations until his appointment as Bishop of Cork in 1862. The late Earl of Carlisle, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was one of his most regular and attentive hearers at Trinity Church. Many hallowed associations were connected with Bethesda Church, which was long the scene of the celebrated Rev. B. W. Mathias's ministrations, and under his preaching Bishop Gregg, when a student at Trinity College, Dublin, became converted to a saving knowledge of Christ.

John Ashworth, "Tradesman and Evangelist," was the author of the widely-read "Strange Tales." In an excellent sketch of his life, which appears in a contemporary, we are told—"With our drinking customs he would have nothing to do. He would drink no 'healths,' and 'a twenty-shilling dinner to celebrate the opening of a public building was no place for him;' he walked in the procession with his fellow-townsmen, but left them at the hotel door. The following words from his diary may be commended to the notice of all Christian workers: 'September 22d, 1871.—Feel very tired with the last four days' work, and am thankful that I can rest. I believe if I were to take stimulants to stir me up at these exhausting meetings and journeys it would be fatal to my health, and jeopardize my religious life and peace with God.'"

FORGIVENESS MADE EASY.

A Sermon delivered by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." —EPHESIANS 4 : 32.

A Noble Motive to Forgiveness—The Example of God Himself—I. For Christ's Sake—1. For the Sake of the Great Atonement—2. Because of the Representative Character of Christ—3. For the Deep Love the Father bears Him—4. God Forgives Sin that His Son may be Glorified—II. What it is that God does for Christ's Sake—He Forgives Sin—1. He has done it Certainly—2. He does it Continuously—3. He does it Freely—4. He does it Fully—5. He does it Eternally—6. He does it Divinely—III. Points of Practice—Forgiving One Another a Co-operative Service—A Man may be Judged by his Words—In all Quarrels he who Provokes to Wrath is a Partner in the Guilt—Do not be Ready to take Offence—Do not Publish Offences—Nor Avenge them.

THE heathen moralists, when they wished to teach virtue, could not point to the example of their gods, for, according to their mythologists, the gods were a compound of every imaginable, and, I had almost said, unimaginable vice. Many of the classic deities surpassed the worst of men in their crimes: they were as much greater in iniquity as they were supposed to be superior in power. It is an ill day for a people when their gods are worse than themselves.

The blessed purity of our holy faith is conspicuous, not only in its precepts, but in the character of the God whom it reveals. There is no excellency which we can propose but we can see it brightly shining in the Lord our God: there is no line of conduct in which a believer should excel but we can point to Christ Jesus our Lord and Master as the pattern of it. In the highest places of the Christian faith you have the highest virtue, and unto God our Father and the Lord Jesus be the highest praise.

We can urge you to the tenderest spirit of forgiveness by pointing to God who for Christ's sake has forgiven you. What nobler motive can you require for forgiving one another? With such high examples, brethren, what manner of people ought we to be? We have sometimes heard of men who were better than their religion, but that is quite impossible with us: we can never, in spirit or in act, rise to the sublime elevation of our divine religion. We should constantly be rising above ourselves, and above the most gracious of our fellow-Christians, and yet above us we shall still behold our God and Saviour. We may go from strength to strength in thoughts of goodness and duties of piety, but Jesus is higher still, and evermore we must be looking up to Him as we climb the sacred hill of grace.

At this time we wish to speak a little concerning the duties of love and forgiveness; and here we note at once that the apostle sets before us the example of God Himself. Upon that bright example we shall spend most of our time, but I hope not quite so much as to forget the practical part, which is so much needed in these days by certain unforgiving spirits, who nevertheless assume the Christian name. The theme of God's forgiving love is so fascinating that we may linger awhile, and a long while too, upon that bright example of forgiveness which God has set before us, but from it all I hope we shall be gathering grace by which to forgive others even to seventy times seven.

We shall take the text word by word, and so we shall obtain the clearest divisions.

I. The first word to think about is

"FOR CHRIST'S SAKE."

We use these words very often; but probably we have never thought of their force, and even at this time we cannot bring forth the whole of their meaning. Let us touch thereon with thoughtfulness, praying the good Spirit to instruct us. "For Christ's sake;" all the good things which God has bestowed upon us have come to us "for Christ's sake," but especially the forgiveness of our sins has come "for Christ's sake." This is the plain assertion of the text. What does it mean?

1. It means, surely, first, for the sake of the great atonement which Christ has offered. The great God can, as a just Lawgiver and King, readily pass by our offences because of the expiation for sin which Christ has offered. If sin were merely a personal affront toward God, we have abundant evidence that He would be ready enough to pass it by without exacting vengeance; but it is a great deal more than that.

Those who view it as a mere personal affront against God are but very shallow thinkers. Sin is an attack upon the moral government of God; it undermines the foundations of society, and were it permitted to have its way it would reduce every thing to anarchy, and even destroy the governing power and the Ruler Himself.

It is His very love as well as His holiness and His justice which, if I may use such a term, compels Him to severity of judgment, so thats in cannot and must not be blotted out till atonement has been presented. There must first of all be a sacrifice for sin, which, mark you, the great Father, to show his love, himself supplies; for it is His own Son who is given to die, and so the Father Himself supplies the ransom through His Son, that Son being also one with Himself by bonds of essential unity, mysterious but most intense. If God demands the penalty in justice, he Himself supplies it in love. 'Tis a wondrous mystery, this mystery of the way of salvation by an atoning sacrifice; but this much is clear, that now God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us, because satisfaction has been made to the injured honor of the divine government, and justice is satisfied.

I want you to consider for a moment how readily God may now blot out sin since Christ hath died. The blotting out of sin seems hard till we see the cross, and then it appears easy enough. I have looked at sin till it seemed to blind me with its horror, and I said in myself, "This vile spot can never be washed out; no fuller's soap can change its hue; sooner might the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots. O sin, thou deep, eternal evil, what can remove thee?" And then I have seen the Son of God dying on the cross, and read the anguish of His soul, and heard the cries which showed the torment of His spirit when God His Father had forsaken Him, and it has seemed to me as if the blotting out of sin were the easiest thing under heaven.

When I have seen Jesus die I have not been able to understand how any sin could be difficult to remove. Let a man stand on Calvary and look on Him whom He hath pierced, and believe and accept the atonement made, and it becomes the simplest thing possible that his debt should be discharged now that it is paid, that his freedom should be given now that the ransom is found, and that he should be no longer under condemnation, since the guilt that condemned him has been carried away by his great Substitute and Lord. It is then because of what Jesus Christ has suffered in our stead that God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us.

2. The second rendering of the text would be this, that God has forgiven us because of the representative character of Christ. It should never be forgotten that we originally fell by a representative. Adam stood for us, and he was our federal head. We did not fall personally at the first, but in our representative. Had he kept the conditions of the covenant we had stood through him, but, inasmuch as he fell, we fell in him. I pray you cavil not at the arrangement, because there lay the hope of our race. The angels probably fell individually, one by one, and hence they fell irretrievably,—there was no restoring them: but as we fell in one Adam, there remained the possibility of our rising in another Adam; and therefore in the fulness of time God sent forth His Son Jesus Christ, born of a woman, made under the law to become the second Adam. He undertook to remove our burdens and to fulfil the conditions of our restoration.

3. Now go a little further. When we read "for Christ's sake" it surely means for the deep love which the Father bears Him. My brethren, can you guess a little of the love which the Father hath toward the Only-begotten? if thou canst ask forgiveness for the sake of Jesus, God will do any thing for Jesus, and He will do any thing for Thee for His dear sake.

4. So we read our text once more in the light of a truth which grows out of the love of God; namely, that God does forgive sin for the sake of glorifying Christ. Christ took the shame that he might magnify His Father, and now His Father delights to magnify Him by blotting out the sin. If you can prove that any gift to you would reflect glory upon Christ, you may depend upon it you will have it. If there is any thing under heaven that would make Christ more illustrious the Father would not spare it for a moment. If thou seest that for thee to have thy sin forgiven would raise the fame of the Saviour, go and plead that argument with God, and thou shalt surely prevail. Will it not make Christ glad if He saves such a sinner as thou art? Then go with this argument in thy mouth, "Father, glorify Thy Son by exalting Him as a glorious Saviour in saving me."

WHAT HAS BEEN DONE FOR US.

II. Now, secondly, we pass on to observe what it is which we are told in the text has been done for us, and to us, for Christ's sake. "God for Christ's sake HATH FORGIVEN YOU."

1. First notice, that He has done this certainly. The apostle does not say he hopes so, but he says, "God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." Are you in the number of the forgiven, my dear hearer? Hast thou believed in the Lord Jesus Christ? Then, as sure as you have believed, God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. Have you put your trust in the atoning sacrifice? Then God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. You have not begun to be a Christian, I hope, with the idea that one day, at some future period, you may obtain forgiveness. No. "God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." Pardon is not a prize to be run for, but a blessing received at the first step of the race. If you have believed in Jesus your sin has all gone—all gone; all your sin has been erased from the records of the past, never to be mentioned against you forever. The moment a sinner looks to Christ, the burden of his sin rolls from off his shoulders never to return.

If Christ hath washed thee (and He has if thou hast believed in Him), then thou art clean every whit, and before the Lord thou standest delivered from every trace of guilt. Pardon is not a matter of hope, but a matter of fact. Expectation looks for many a blessing, but pardon is a realized favor which faith holds in her hand even now. If Christ took thy load, thy load cannot remain on thine own back: if Christ paid thy debts, then they do not stand in God's books against thee. How can they? It stands to reason that if thy Substitute has taken thy sin and put it away, thy sin lies no more on thee. God for Christ's sake hath forgiven thee. Get hold of that grand truth, and hold it, though all the devils in hell roar at thee. Grasp it as with a hand of steel; grip it as for life: "God for Christ's sake hath forgiven me,"—may each one of us be able to say that. We shall not feel the divine sweetness and force of the text unless we can make a personal matter of it by the Holy Ghost.

2. Then notice that God has forgiven us continuously. He not only forgave us at the first all our sins, but He continues daily to forgive, for the act of forgiveness is a continuous one. I have sometimes heard it said that we were so forgiven when we first believed that there is no need to ask for further forgiveness; to which I reply, We were so completely forgiven when we first believed that we ought continually to ask for the perpetuity of that one far-reaching act, that the Lord may continue to exert towards us that fulness of forgiving grace which absolved us perfectly at the first, that we may continue to walk before Him with a sense of that complete forgiveness, clear and unquestioned.

I know I was forgiven when first I believed in Christ; and I am equally sure of it now: the one absolution continues to ring in my ears like joy-bells which never cease. Pardon once given continues to be given. When through doubt and anxiety I was not sure of my pardon, yet it was still true; for he that believeth on Him is not condemned, even though he may write bitter things against himself. Beloved friend, catch hold of that, and do not let it go. Divine pardon is a continuous act.

3. And this forgiveness on God's part was most free. We did nothing to obtain it by merit, and we brought nothing wherewith to purchase it. He forgave us for Christ's sake, not for aught that we had done. True, we did repent, and did believe; but repentance and faith He gave us, so that He did not forgive us for the sake of them, but purely of His own dear love, because He delighted in mercy, and is never more like Himself than when He passeth by transgression, iniquity, and sin.

4. Remember, also, that he forgave us fully. It was not here and there a sin that He blotted out, but the whole horrible list and catalogue of our offences He destroyed at once. All our transgressions are swept away, carried off as by a flood, and so completely removed from us that no guilty trace of them remains. They are all gone!

5. And let it be remembered that this forgiveness which God has given us for Christ's sake is an eternal forgiveness. He will never rake up our past offences and a second time impute them. He will not find us on an evil day, and say, "I have had great patience with you, but now will I deal with you after your sins." Far otherwise; he that believeth in Jesus hath everlasting life, and shall never come into condemnation. Irreversible is the pardon of heaven. "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." He never repents what He has given, or forgiven. 'Tis done, 'tis done forever: Jehovah absolves and the sentence stands fast forever. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Jesus Christ." "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth?" Blessed be God for eternal pardon!

6. And since I could not find a word to finish with but this one, I will use it: He hath divinely pardoned us. There is such a truth, reality, and emphasis in the pardon of God as you can never find in the pardon of man; for though a man should forgive all you have done against him, i you have treated him very badly, yet it is mor than you could expect that he should quite forget it, but the Lord says, "Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more forever." If man has played you false, although you have forgiven him, you are not likely to trust him again It is an old proverb, "Never ride a broken-knee' horse," and it is not a bad proverb either.

But see how the Lord deals with His peopl When Peter was set on his legs again he was broken-knee'd horse enough, and yet see ho gloriously the Lord rode that charger on th day of Pentecost. Did He not go forth co quering and to conquer? The Lord lets bygon be bygones so completely that He trusts pa doned souls with His secrets, for "the secret the Lord is with them that fear Him;" and H intrusts some of us with His choicest treasure for Paul said, "He hath put me in trust wi the Gospel, though I was a blasphemer." commits to our keeping that priceless cask which incloses the best hope of men, namel the Gospel of Jesus. "We have this treasury earthen vessels." This shows how perfect our forgiveness,—nay, I must put it, how divi is the forgiveness which we have received.

Let us rejoice in that grand promise whi comes to us by the mouth of Jeremiah of ol "In those days, and in that time, saith t Lord, the iniquity of Israel shall be sought f and there shall be none; and the sins of Juda and they shall not be found: for I will pardon them whom I reserve." Here is annihilation—the only annihilation I know of—the absolute annihilation of sin through the pardon which the Lord gives to His people. Let us sing it as though it were a choice hymn—"The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none."

III. Now, if you have drank into the spirit of our subject you will be strengthened to bear what I have to say to you upon

A POINT OF PRACTICE.

"FORGIVING ONE ANOTHER, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." Let me say, at the commencement, that I do not know of any one here present who has fallen out with anybody else, and therefore I shall make no personal allusions. If I did know of quarrels and bickerings it is very likely that I should say about the same, but I do not happen to know of any, and if, therefore, my remarks should come home, I would earnestly beg each one so affected to believe that what I say is intended for him, and to receive it as a pointed, personal message from God.

"Forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." Now observe how the apostle puts it. Does he say "forgiving another"? No, that is not the text, if you look at it. It is "forgiving one another." One another! Ah! then that means that if you have to forgive to-day, it is very likely that you will yourself need to be forgiven to-morrow, for it is "forgiving one another." It is turn and turn about, a mutual operation, a co-operative service. In fact, it is a joint-stock business of mutual forgiveness, and members of Christian churches should take large shares in this concern. "Forgiving one another." You forgive me, and I forgive you, and we forgive them, and they forgive us, and so a circle of unlimited forbearance and love goes round the world.

There is something wrong about me that needs to be forgiven by my brother, but there is also something wrong about my brother which needs to be forgiven by me, and this is what the apostle means—that we are all of us mutually to be exercising the sacred art and mystery of forgiving one another. If we always did this we should not endure those who have a special faculty for spying out faults. There are some who, whatever church they are in, always bring an ill report of it. I have heard this sort of thing from many—"There is no love among Christians at all." I will tell you the character of the gentleman who makes that observation; he is both unloving and unlovely, and so he is out of the track of the pilgrims of love.

Another cries, "There is no sincerity in the world now." That man is a hypocrite: be you quite sure of that. Judge a bird by its song and a man by his utterance. The censorious measure our corn, but they use their own bushels. You may know very well what a man is by what he says of others. It is a gauge of character which very seldom will deceive you, to judge other men by their own judgment of their fellows. Their speech betrays their heart. Show me your tongue, sir! Now I know whether you are sick or well. He that speaketh with an ill tongue of his neighbor hath an ill heart; rest assured of that. Let us begin our Christian career with the full assurance that we shall have a great deal to forgive in other people, but that there will be a great deal more to be forgiven in ourselves, and let us set our account upon having to exercise gentleness, and needing its exercise from others, "Forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

Note again. When we forgive, it is a poor and humble business compared with God's forgiving us, because we are only forgiving one another, that is, forgiving fellow-servants; whereas when God forgives us it is the Judge of all the earth forgiving, not His fellows, but His rebel subjects, guilty of treason against His majesty. For God to forgive is something great; for us to forgive, though some think it great, should be regarded as a very small matter.

Then reflect upon the matter to be forgiven. Our Lord in His parable tells us that the fellow-servant owed a few pence, but the servant himself was debtor to his master many talents. What we owe to God is infinite, but what our fellow-creature owes to us is a very small sum. What did he do which has so much offended you? "He said a very shameful thing about me." It was very bad of him, no doubt. "Then he played me a very nasty trick, and acted very ungraciously; in fact, he behaved scandalously, and if you hear the story you will be quite indignant." Well, I am indignant. He is a bad fellow, there is no doubt about it; and so are you. So were you certainly when you first came to God; bad as he is to you, you have been much worse to the Lord. I will warrant that his blacks towards you are whites compared with your blacks in the presence of God.

"Oh! but you would not believe how basely he acted." No, and I dare say I should hardly believe it if I heard how base you have been to the Lord; at any rate, it should make our eyes fill with tears to think how we have grieved our God and vexed His Spirit. Some of us have had so much manifest forgiveness, so much outward sin forgiven, that for us to forgive ought to be as natural as to open our hands. After such forgiveness as the Lord has bestowed on some of us, we should be wicked servants indeed if we were to take our brother by the throat and say, "Pay me what thou owest." We should deserve to be given over to the tormentors by our angry Master if we did not count it joy to pass by a brother's fault.

If any one here who is a Christian finds a difficulty in forgiveness, I am going to give him three words which will help him wonderfully. I would put them into the good man's mouth. I gave them to you just now, and prayed you to get the sweetness of them; here they are again! "For Christ's sake." Cannot you forgive an offender on that ground? Ah! the girl has acted very shamefully, and you, her father, have said some strong things, but I beg you to forgive her for Christ's sake. Cannot you do it with that motive? It is true your son has behaved very wrongly, and nothing hurts a father's heart more than the wicked conduct of a son. You did in a fit of anger say a very stern thing, and deny him your house forever. I entreat you to eat your words up for Christ's sake. Sometimes when I have been pleading a case like that, the person I have been persuading has kindly said, "I will do it for you, sir." I have said, "I will thank you if you will do it at all, but I would rather you would have said you would do it for my Master, for what a blessed Master He has been to you! Do it for His sake." I may be speaking very plainly home to some of you. I hope I am. If there be any of you who have got into a bad state of heart and have said you never will forgive a rebellious son, do not say so again till you have looked at the matter, for Christ's sake. Not for the boy's sake, not for your neighbor's sake who has offended you, not for any other reason do I urge you to mercy, but for Christ's sake. Come, you two brothers, who have fallen out, love each other for Christ's sake; come, you two sisters, come you two friends who have been alienated, get together directly, and end all your ill-feeling for Christ's sake. You must not keep a drop of malice in your soul, for Christ's sake. O charming word! how it melts us, and as it melts it seems to leave no trace of anger behind it: for Christ's sake our love suffers long and never fails.

I do not know how to put this next word I am going to say. It is a paradox. You must forgive or you cannot be saved; at the same time you must not do it from compulsion; you must do it freely. There is a way of carrying this into practice, though I cannot explain it in words. You must forgive, not because you are forced to, but because you heartily do it. Remember, it is of no use for you to put your money into that offering box as you go out unless you remember first to forgive your brother. God will not accept the gifts, prayers, or praises of an unrelenting heart. Though you leave all your substance to His cause, He will not accept a penny of it if you die in an unforgiving temper. There is no grace where there is no willingness to overlook faults. John saith, "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" The very prayer that teaches you to ask for mercy bids you say "forgive us, as we forgive our debtors." Unless you have forgiven others you read your own death-warrant when you repeat the Lord's Prayer.

A friend wrote me a short while ago a letter of serious

who had been very angry with him, and had spoken very sharply while excited to passion. I felt bound to hear the other side of the story, and I was obliged to say, "Now, you two brothers are both wrong. You, my brother, lost your temper; but you, my other brother, irritated him, so that I do not wonder he did lose his temper. And when you saw he had lost his temper or do something to quiet him? No, but you remained to increase the wrath, and then wrote to expose him." I blame the wood for burning, but what shall I say of the bellows? It was wrong to blaze, but was it right to fan the flame? Very often when a man is angry he may not be the only one to blame. Therefore, brothers and sisters, if we are to forgive each other, do not let us provoke each other to offend.

In the next place, do not make offences. Oftentimes a man has been offended at another for no reason at all. One person has said of another as he passed him in the street, "He will not even nod to me. He is too proud to own me, because I am a poor man." Now, that beloved friend who was thus blamed could not see much further than his hand, for he was shortsighted. Another has been censured for not hearing, though he was deaf; and another for not shaking hands when his arm was crippled. Do not imagine offences when they are not intended.

Next, do not take offences where they are intended. It is a splendid thing if you will not be offended. Nothing makes a man feel so small as when you accept what he intended for an insult as if it were a compliment, and thank him for it. Can you master yourself to that point? Remember, when you have conquered yourself you have conquered the world. You have overcome everybody when you have so fully overcome your own spirit that you remain content with that which naturally would excite your wrath.

Then, if you must be offended, dear brother, do not exaggerate an offence. Some good women, I was about to say, and men also, when they come as tale-bearers with a charge, make a great many flourishes and additions. They go a long way round, and they bring innumerable beliefs, and suggestions, and hints, and hearsays into the business, until a midge's egg becomes as huge as ever was laid by an ostrich. I begin coolly to strip off the feathers and the paint, and I say, "Now, I do not see what that point had to do with it, or what that remark has in it: all I can see when I come to look at the bare fact is so-and-so, and that was not much, was it?" "Oh! but there was more intended." Do not believe that, dear brother, dear sister. If there must be something wrong, let it be as little as you can. If you have a telescope, look through the large hole and minify instead of magnifying, or, better still, do not look at it at all.

A blind eye is often the best eye a man can have, and a deaf ear is better by far than one which hears too much. "Also take no heed," says Solomon, "unto all words that are spoken, lest thou hear thy servant curse thee." Something you have done may irritate a servant, and he may make remarks which are unbecoming and impertinent. Don't hear what he is muttering. Keep out of hearing. He will be sorry to-morrow, and if he thinks you did not hear him he will continue in your service and be faithful to you. What would you do if your master picked you up for every word, and if he caught up every sentence that you uttered? How would you live at all if he reckoned sharply with you? No, dear friends, as you have to forgive one another, do not take offence, and when offence is given do not exaggerate it, and, if you can, do not even observe it.

Then, again, do not publish offences. There has been something very offensive said. What then? Do not repeat it. Do not go first to one, and then to another, and say, "Now this is quite private, and mind you keep it a secret; So-and-so has spoken shamefully." Better that you should let your heart break than go up and down with a firebrand in this fashion. If a brother has done wrong why should you do wrong? You will be doing wrong if you publish his fault. Remember how the curse came upon Noah's son for exposing his father; and how much better it is for us all when there is any thing wrong to go backward and cover it, without even looking at it ourselves, if we can help it. Cover it up: cover it up. Charity covereth a multitude of sins. Not only one, two, three sins will charity cover, but she carries a cloak which covereth a whole host of faults.

Above all, my brethren, and with this I close, never in any way, directly or indirectly, avenge yourselves. For any fault that is ever done to you, the Master says unto you—resist not evil. In all things bend, bow, yield, submit. "If you tread on a worm it will turn," says somebody. And is a worm your example? Christ shall be mine. It is a shocking thing when a Christian man forgets his Lord to find an excuse for himself among the poor creatures under his feet. But if it must be so, what does a worm do when it turns? When you have trodden on a worm, does it bite? Does the worm hurt any one? Ah no! It has turned, but it has turned in its agony and writhed before you, that is all. You may do that, if you must. Brother, the most splendid vengeance you can ever have is to do good to them that do you evil, and to speak well of them that speak ill of you. They will be ashamed to look at you; they will never hurt you again if they see that you cannot be provoked except it be to greater love and larger kindness.

This ought to be the mark of Christians; not "I will have the law of you," or "I will avenge myself," but "I will bear and forbear even to the end." "Vengeance is mine. I will repay it, saith the Lord." Do not take that into your hand which God says belongs to Him, but as He for Christ's sake has forgiven you, so also forgive all those who do you wrong. "How long am I to do that?" says one. "I would not mind doing it three or four times." There was one of old who would go the length of six or seven, but Jesus Christ said "unto seventy times seven." That is a very considerable number. You may count whether you have yet reached that amount, and if you have you will now be glad to begin again, still forgiving, even as God for Christ's sake has forgiven you. God help us to be patient to the end.

Though I have not just now been preaching Christ Jesus as the object of the sinner's trust, yet remember that He must also be the object of our imitation. This is the kind of doctrine which Christ Himself preached, and therefore, since He preached continually this love to our neighbor, and forgiveness of our enemies, we ought both to preach and to practise it. Go ye and believe in Him, and be imitators of Him, remembering that He forgave His murderers upon the cross whereon he wrought out our redemption. May His Spirit rest upon you evermore. Amen.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

WHILE Mr. Hilliard was alternately softening and hardening his heart towards his son, and planning what he would do in respect to him after his return, Christian was on his way home, impatiently looking for the day when he should once more set foot on British soil.

"It is incomprehensible to me how any one can deliberately chose a seafaring life," he said one day to Cairns. "Now, I suppose you really like it, and would rather be on sea than land."

"Well; yes, sir, I think I would: we sailors get to look on the salt water as a sort of home, and a grand big one it is. I don't know but what we are better off than them who live in some of those little houses in towns. Sir, you haven't such a thing as a map with you, have you?"

"A map? What sort of one?"

"One of them round 'uns that shows both sides of the earth; I'd like to have a look at old England, and see how she lies to America."

"Let me see," mused Christian, "I ought to have one somewhere. I have an indistinct recollection of seeing it among my things. I'll have a look, Cairns."

"Thank'ee, sir; don't trouble about it now, any time'll do."

"No time like the present; if I don't look now I shall forget it."

He went down into the cabin and opened his chest, turning out all the contents pell-mell on the floor.

"There's confusion!" he exclaimed; "I want Maud here to put my things straight for me: women always manage that sort of thing better than we men. I don't know how it is, but I cannot keep my places tidy."

Folding one thing here and another there, in a hopeless indefinite sort of way, he came across a letter sealed and addressed to himself.

"A letter for me, and not even opened!" he thought, in some surprise. "Where in the world did it come from?"

Instantaneously there flashed across his mind the recollection of that last night in England, and of the rencontre with Milby after midnight.

"What a shame!" he exclaimed aloud; "I promised the poor fellow to read it, and here it is unopened now. What must he think of me!"

He tore it open, and glanced hastily down the page, and as he read a sudden change came over his face. Turning to the door, he shut and locked it, and then sitting down by the table, rested his elbows upon it, and read the letter from beginning to end.

It ran as follows:

"I beg your pardon for writing to you, sir, but when I heard you were going out in the Eglantine I felt I must tell you. I know it is as much as my place is worth to do it, and if Mr. Grant knew, he would send me off without any character, or with even worse—a bad one. It is betraying his private business and violating his confidence, and yet I must tell you, for you have been truly good and kind to me. When I had no friend in the world, you came forward and got me this place, and always when you see me you have a cheering word, and often you put your hand in your pocket to give me what your kindness prompts. I shall never forget all you have done for a poor, friendless old man, and now that it is in my power to tell you what you ought to know, I feel that I must do it.

"This morning I was standing near Mr. Hilliard's office, when you met Captain Thorpe and stopped to speak to him. From what was said I gathered that you were going to Quebec in that wretched Eglantine, and that she was to sail immediately. I followed you down to the docks and tried to catch you alone, but could not do it, and I was forced to go back to my work without speaking to you. Then I determined to write and wait at your door till you came home, and give you the letter. I heard you say you were not going to your father's house. What will you say when I tell you? Will you think I am telling a tale made up to answer some end of my own? I cannot help it if you do.

"Some months ago, nearly a year now, Mr. Grant surveyed the Eglantine. She had come to grief in her last voyage, and was brought into the dry docks for repairs. He made a careful survey, and wrote the result to Mr. Hilliard, your father, giving me the letter to put in the copying-press. When I took it out I glanced down to see if a fair copy were taken; it was very fair, more so than usual. I remember noticing it. This is what he wrote, or the substance of it: 'I have made a thorough and careful examination of the Eglantine, and find her in a very bad condition, rotten almost to the core. The butts for mainstays and maintop stays are rotten, endangering the mainmast; the mizzenmast is unsafe; the planks, in many places, so rotten as to come to pieces with a touch.' I cannot remember all the ship terms used; I don't understand them, but I remember Mr. Grant's sum up: 'In her present state the Eglantine is certainly not fit for sea; indeed I doubt if any repairs will make her seaworthy; that is to say, for a long voyage. As a coaster she will be safe enough, if thoroughly repaired.'

"There was a long list of necessary repairs, and a full account of the ship's present condition; but, as I said before, I cannot remember them. Mr. Grant never knew I saw the letter—that is to say, read it. It was my place to put letters in the copying-press, but not to read them. When the vessel was repaired he went over it again, and sent a further report to Mr. Hilliard, confirming what he had previously said: She was safe as a coaster, but certainly not fit for a long voyage.

"At first I wondered that Mr. Hilliard dared send her out after that verdict, but then I remembered that he was a rich shipowner, and Grant a poor man with an elastic conscience and a large family, and the mystery was explained. You will forgive me writing thus, Mr. Christian; my conscience would not let me be silent. I rely upon your generosity not to betray me; if you do, I shall lose my place."

Christian Hilliard's first indignant impulse was to tear the letter in shreds; but as he read, the truth of the plain, straightforward statement forced itself upon him, and he sat overwhelmed with bitter shame!—shame, in the knowledge that his father had voluntarily, and for the sake of gain, sent out the unfortunate Eglantine to risk an almost certain destruction.

His eyes were opened now. The mystery of the sailors' distrust of his father's word; his father's refusal to show Grant's letter; all was clear now, and what a frightful crime stood revealed! How his soul loathed it, and here he was in the doomed ship, the son and the representative of the criminal. How would he fee towards these men if the Eglantine came to grief

A thousand thoughts rushed through his brain as he sat and meditated. Regret at his careles neglect of the warning, while there was time to have prevented the voyage, among the number But Christian was not the man to waste his energies in useless regrets; he felt he must do wha he could to remedy the fatal mistake, and t counteract the evil that might result from hi father's cupidity. But what could he do now i mid Atlantic? He must, he felt, think it out and much as it pained him to do so, must consult with Captain Thorpe.

At last, weary and sick at heart, he went o deck. There was a hush upon the waters, and deep calm, for there had been no wind for day In the quiet stillness of the night the Eglanti floated lazily over the smooth surface, leaving her wake a path of shining phosphor-light.

"That's a pretty enough sight," said the ca tain, pausing by Christian's side as he lean over the rail; "but I'd rather see the foam ome good-sized waves just now. We've h enough of this lazy weather."

"Do you think this calm will last?" ask Christian, his quiet voice betraying nothing the inward storm of bitter shame and grief.

"Not long now, sir; the barometer has fallen low, and I expect a change soon. The wind is rising a little now, I fancy."

As he spoke the murmur of the wind was heard among the rigging, and the sails flapped noisily.

"Yes, it's coming sure enough; I thought all this calm wasn't for nothing. We shall have a gale now, Mr. Christian."

"That means a storm, I suppose."

"Well, as likely as not we shall have some pretty roughish weather. The sea always reminds me of a cat: she keeps her claws well hidden till the last minute, and then gives a smart scratch. It's a treacherous sort of thing, is the sea."

"Thorpe, in case of a storm what would you do with the cargo?" asked Christian, abruptly.

"All depends, sir; the cargo's pretty heavy, but it won't hurt in an ordinary gale."

"That is to say if the vessel is sound," replied Christian, quietly.

"Of course, sir."

"And if it is not?"

"But the Eglantine is," replied Captain Thorpe, emphatically.

"No, she is not!" said Christian, in sharp, bitter tones, wrung from him by the terrible anguish of his heart. "Don't you know when a vessel is seaworthy?"

"No, that I do not, without examining her; neither does any other man. I have never examined the Eglantine, but Grant has, and he says she's sound enough."

"There has been some fatal mistake," answered Christian, striving to calm the ceaseless whirl of thought; "the Eglantine is not seaworthy."

Captain Thorpe stared at him in speechless amazement.

"What do you mean, Mr. Christian?" he exclaimed at last.

"It has only just come to my knowledge," went on Christian, cut to the very heart by the necessity for telling this man anything that might throw suspicion upon his father's name. But there was no help for it; the lives of the crew must be saved if possible, even at the expense of his father's honor. The rising wind, and now rapidly gathering clouds, warned him that there was no time to be lost, and that any precautions that could be taken should not be delayed a moment.

"A letter was given me, before I left England, and I slipped it in my pocket and forgot it. Now I have come across it and have read it," he said, mechanically. "It tells me that the Eglantine is not fit for a long voyage, that no repairs could make her so."

"Who's the letter from?" asked Captain Thorpe, unbelievingly.

"One who knows," answered Christian, with a gesture of mingled pain and impatience.

"But who could know save Grant and Mr. Hilliard?" persisted the captain, still incredulous.

"I cannot tell you who my informant is; it is enough that I know his statement to be correct," said Christian, wearily. "I was forced to tell you in order that all necessary precautions might be taken. Have no thought for the cargo; I authorize you to throw every shred overboard the moment there appears the least necessity. Do not wait till the last moment, but if the gale rises pretty fast, do it at once. I not only authorize, but, in my father's name, command it."

What his father might say Christian cared not; he was resolved that no consideration of profit or loss should stand in the way of these men's lives and his own. The cargo should be sacrificed, and Mr. Hilliard might blame him if he pleased; the guilt, the enormity of the crime were too glaring to allow any consideration for him to have weight in such a crisis. So much he might do, to contribute to the safety of the vessel; and by all that was right and just he resolved it should be done. Meanwhile the wind continued rising, and the sky became darker every minute.

THE DEDICATION.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 12th.—Ezra 6. Golden Text, Hagg. 2:9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE joy of the children of Israel when the foundation of the second temple was laid was not of long duration. Satan is always busy when the work of God prospers, and he was not long in finding adversaries of God's people whom he stirred up against them. Their first essay was to do away the difference which existed between them and the children of God. This is generally the enemy's first endeavor, and oh, how often is it successful! They said, "Let us build with you: for we seek your God, as ye do." But history tells us, "They feared the Lord, and served their own gods" (2 Kings 17: 33). Thus the fathers of Israel said unto them, "Ye have nothing to do with us to build an house unto our God." "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph. 5:2). "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" (2 Cor. 6:14).

Then persecution began, as it always will when God's people are separate enough from the world to become a living reproof to the worldly. "Then the people of the land weakened the hands of the people of Judah, and troubled them in building, and hired counsellors against them, to frustrate their purpose." The lawyers seem to have hit upon a stratagem which proved successful for the time. They wrote to the king to examine the past records of Judah, that he might see how dangerous it was to rebuild "the rebellious and the bad city" (Ezra. 4: 12). The king's answer was in accordance with their wishes, and the enemies of God's people "went up in haste to Jerusalem unto the Jews, and made them to cease by force and power. Then ceased the work of the house of God which is at Jerusalem."

But the triumph of their enemies was but short; God had fixed the limit of their captivity, and none could hinder their return to their own land, and God had said, "I will build them as at the first" (Jer. 33: 7). The prophets Haggai and Zechariah saw things in the light of God, and they feared not to prophesy on behalf of God and of His temple. God said to Haggai, "This people say, The time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built." Oh, how many in this day say the same, and they lay the blame of their own indifference upon God, and say, "Such a one will be converted in God's good time, or such and such a church will be revived in God's good time"—as though it were the plan of God to keep men in their sins, and to keep a church in a state of spiritual death. Haggai speaks but openly and says, "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses, and this house lie waste?" (Hagg. 1: 2, 4).

And while Haggai thus stirred up the people Zechariah encouraged their leaders, "This is the word of the Lord unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts;" and again, "The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall also finish it; and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you" (see Zech. 4: 6–9). Then rose up Zerubbabel and Joshua, "and began to build the house of God which is at Jerusalem; and with them were the prophets of God helping them." The enemies were not silent, they came and required to know their authority for what they were doing. "But the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease."

Again their enemies wrote to the king. But the only answer which His people gave to their enemies was as follows: "We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was builded these many years ago, which a great king of Israel builded and set up," etc.; and they gave as their authority the decree of Cyrus. So their enemies demanded of the king to search for this decree of Cyrus which they had named. And Darius the king commanded that search should be made, and the document was found, commanding that the house of God should be built at Jerusalem, and all the gold and silver vessels restored that they might be placed in the house of God.

"Let the work of this house of God alone," was the heathen king's commandment to these quasi-worshippers, who in their own half-heartedness were at enmity with such as sought to honor God. "Let the governor of the Jews and the elders of the Jews build this house of God in His place. Moreover, I make a decree what ye shall do to the elders of these Jews for the building of this house of God: that of the king's goods, even of the tribute beyond the river, forthwith expences be given unto these men, that they be not hindered. And that which they have need of, ... let it be given them day by day without fail: that they may offer sacrifices of sweet savors unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king, and of his sons."

We have nothing to do with the probability of a thing which God has said it is as sure as His own existence. It is absolute loss of time to look at ourselves or our circumstances; a walk of faith in and obedience to God must be a walk of triumph over ourselves and our circumstances, and one of power over others, because we can be little enough to let God do every thing. When we regard either the favor or the blame of other men, the probability of such and such a circumstance, the weakness or strength which we think to be in ourselves, our eye is off God, and we are not in complete dependence upon Him. One look off is like Peter's looking on the waves: we can only walk upon the water while we are looking unto Jesus.

The king was perhaps in ignorance of how God made use of him to answer prayer, to fulfil His promises, and also to frustrate to the very full the designs of the enemies of His people. He said, "Also I have made a decree, that whosoever shall alter this word, let timber be pulled down from his house, and being set up, let him be hanged thereon; and let his house be made a dunghill for this. . . . . . And the God that hath caused His name to dwell there destroy all things and people that shall put to their hand to alter and to destroy this house of God which is at Jerusalem. I Darius have made a decree; let it be done with speed." (This was not the Darius of Daniel's time.) And so they who had so hindered the work became the greatest helpers in it, and they who had trusted God for the simple permission to build in peace had also a full supply of all they needed, for God giveth liberally to all men (James 1:5). Thus every hindrance being done away, the house of God was finished.

"And the children of Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the rest of the children of the captivity, kept the dedication of this house of God with joy." But their first action must be to bring a sin-offering, in which every tribe must be represented, and so twelve he goats were sacrificed. The elders of every tribe took their places around the victims, and laid their hands in confession of their sin upon them. And when we are conscious of any sin, there must be a personal and individual confession, and faith in the blood of Christ once offered, which alone can cleanse us from all unrighteousness. There is so often among believers a lack of solidity, because they are afraid to go to the bottom of any evil by confessing it.

"And they set the priests in their divisions and the Levites in their courses." Compare Num. 8:6, 7. We, too, have the privilege of a royal priesthood towards God and men; the service of the altar and the bearing of the names of our brethren upon our hearts; this is our service of gift, and oh, how little is it understood! We hardly take even the place of Levites, who are given to God's Church as a gift for Him, we live as though all were for us.

And there they kept the passover, and it seems to have been a real time of reconsecration to God.

EVIL OF INTEMPERANCE.

Selfishness—What Gratification is there in Drinking?—Wagner's Music—Beauty of Nature—The Scotch Laird and Sandy—Brewers' Vested Interests—Sale of a Negress—Shallow Arguments of Objectors—Barley Bread—Two Wines in the Bible—Pins Saving Lives—Clean Linen a means of Grace.

THE cause of Temperance in which we are engaged in the field of mighty moral conflict is a good cause. It needs, I know, some self-denial and some moral courage. There are a great many persons who say, "Well, but you know, I do not see why I should be called upon to give up that which is a gratification to me, because other people are foolish enough to make a bad use of it; I do not see that I should be called upon to give up that which is lawful to me, simply because other people cannot govern themselves, or will not govern themselves. 'Everybody for himself;' that is my motto. I can take care of myself." Now, that is not a Christian spirit; it is the pure spirit of selfishness; and this is opposed directly to every thing that is benevolent; selfishness is altogether opposed to the spirit of the Gospel; and when a man wraps himself up in the cloak of his selfishness he can be of no benefit in any good enterprise.

Gratification! But what comes after? Did you ever lie in your bed in the morning, tossing from side to side, with aching head and throbbing pulse, and a hot fevered tongue? Did you ever lie there in the morning and try to think what you did over night, and how you got into your bed, and then ground your teeth and said, "What a fool I was?" "What a fool I made of myself last night, and now I am suffering like this—what a fool I am?" Is that enjoyment—enjoyment that doesn't last twenty-four hours—worth a man's seeking? I tell you, if the reaction came first, and the fun afterwards, there would be no drinking. If delirium tremens came first, and the pleasant excitement came last—no, not for all the prospective enjoyment a man can have in this world would he go through what he has to endure when the reaction comes.

Enjoyment! I am one of those who believe in enjoyment. People talk about ascetic teetotallers, eh! Why, we are the jolliest set of fellows alive. I believe if we do not laugh heartier, our laugh has more of mirth in it than that of the drinker. They laugh at nothing, but when we laugh we want something to laugh at. When a company of drinking young men sit around the table, one says, "I say, Jemmy, look here (making a grimace)—ha, ha, ha." And they all laugh, but for the life of them they don't know what they are laughing at. Enjoyment! Young men! we have wonderful capacities for enjoyment, and wonderful sources of enjoyment; but I have come to this conclusion, that there is no enjoyment worth having that you can't thank God for; and if you can get drunk and thank God for it the next morning, then I have nothing more to say to you. But we have sources of enjoyment all around us, and about us, and beneath us, and above us everywhere.

I remember a lady asking me if I would like to hear a sonata, and if so, she would introduce me to Herr Wagner. She did, and he said he would play for me as long as I chose to sit and listen, and he gave those wonderful, weird, wailing discords of Chopin, resolved into those wonderful harmonies. And all I could say was, like Oliver Twist, "More." And he gave me more. For nearly two hours he played, and then he stood up, and twisting his fingers through his hair, he said, "You fill me full of music, you are such a grand listener; I will give you a sonata of Beethoven's." When I went out I said to the lady, "I thank God for such a capacity for enjoyment."

Go to the Alps and see the wonderful range of mountains that clusters about Chamouni and Mont Blanc. How deeply, darkly beautiful is the sky above you. How clear the atmosphere. Ah! Is that distant thunder? No, it is the ice cracking miles away in yon glacier. Listen! It is the soft sound of falling water sweetly breaking the hush and stillness of nature in repose. How grand, and sublime, and awful. Your eyes fill with tears. Your nerves quiver. Your heart thrills, and your whole soul seems to be absorbed by the wonderful grandeur, sublimity, and beauty, and you feel as if you must kneel down and thank God that you were created a man in His own image. Oh! there is gratification all around us and about us, worthy of a God to give, worthy of a man to receive. And this is above all the gratification you can get from drink. Why, if there was no gratification there would be no danger. It is the gratification to the man of nervous susceptibility, and the effect produced upon the brain and nervous system, that is the very source of his danger. In whatever phase it may present itself to you it is always harmful—whether you are very jolly and outrageously merry, or dull and stupid, it makes but very little difference. We are told very funny stories about the drunkard, but that at which we laugh is only one phase of a terrible fact.

THE LAIRD AND HIS MAN SANDY.

When I was in Glasgow I heard a man tell a story that made me laugh till my sides ached, and keep my mouth open so that I could not shut it. I am one of those who think that as man is the only animal that can laugh, he should enjoy his privilege, and I mean to. I cannot tell you this story as it was told to me, but I can give you the idea. He said a laird and his man Sandy went to pay rent to the squire, and they got drunk on whisky. However, they managed to get on their horses, which proceeded to jog home. On their way they had to pass a stream. The laird's horse jerking away, drew the laird over the pommel of the saddle, then over his neck, and finally sent him with a splash into the water. "Sandy, Sandy," he called, "something has fallen off." "Na, na, laird, nothing has fallen off." "Sandy, I heard a splash."

Sandy got off his horse and said, "It's yourself, laird, that's got into the water." "It canna be me, Sandy, for I'm here." Sandy got his master on his horse—the wrong side before. "Now, Sandy, give me the bridle." "Wait, laird, till I find the bridle; there's nae place for the bridle here." "Sandy, I must have the bridle." "Hae, laird, here's the horse's head off, and I canna find the place where it was, and there's nothing left but a long piece of his mane." "Well, Sandy, gie me the mane. He's going the wrong way, but it canna be helped!"

Now we laugh at this, but it's just one phase of a terrible fact. It's just as disgraceful, it's just as degrading, just as debasing to be silly drunk as it is to be mad drunk. Now I will give a fact I have in my own possession.

The very fact of intoxication is debasing and degrading to the man, whether he gets enjoyment for it or whether it brings upon him the horrors of delirium tremens. Then, if there is no good in drink, why should we not wage war against it? You are the men to do that to the end—yes, to the end.

BREWERS' VESTED INTERESTS.

People say sometimes, "Do you ever think you will succeed?" We succeed? Thank the dear Lord, it is not our work; ours is the labor, in His hands are the results. We have nothing to do with them. "Am I right?". That is the great question, and then go steadily on and work for it. When I passed by Allsop's Brewery the other day in the train, it seemed to be an interminable mass of warehouses and stacks of chimneys. I said to myself, "Is it not very much like knocking your head against a stone wall to undertake to talk against all this invested capital, all the public-house interest, the brewery interest, and the distilling interest of Great Britain?" Well, it would seem so. Before I left America, a gentleman said to me, "Are you going to talk in England?" "Perhaps I shall. I am going for rest; but I suppose they will ask me to do something. But I do not mean they shall work me as they have done this week."

"What are you going to do?" he said. "What can you do? Look at the vested interests, look at the millions of property invested in this business, and then look at the social life of the people—the old-fashioned, time-honored observances of the house." I was in 1846 and 1847 in Virginia, in the "palmy days," as they called them, of slavery. I saw a woman sold—I had seen men, women, and children sold before; but nothing roused me as that did. The woman was perhaps thirty years of age, and very well formed. She stood on a hogshead. Her bare arms were folded over her bare breast, and they were handling her as you would handle the flanks of a horse, asking her to put out her arm that they might feel the muscles, and one fellow lifted her lip to see her teeth. I said right straight in the street, and William Reid was with me, "That is the most abominable sight that was ever seen in a Christian country."

One said, "Stop, stop talking like that, or you won't talk on any other subject." When we got together he said, "What are you going to do? What is all this agitation in the North? What do you expect to accomplish? Why you talk about the English freeing their slaves, and so they did—bought them for so many millions; but here our slaves are born in our houses, they are part of our families. It is a family relationship. It is a patriarchial institution. It is woven into the very domestic life of the people of the South. You can't tear it out. Just look at it. Here are servants I have had since they were babies—grown up. I raised them and treat them well. You can't break it. Those are the manners of the people, and are you ready to pay five hundred million dollars?" the estimated value of the slaves at the time. "Where are you going to get it? It's no use your agitating. As long as the United States endure so long will slavery be its peculiar institution, and I believe the corner-stone of our institutions. So you may as well hold your tongue." But we didn't hold our tongues. It is our privilege to protest against the wrong, if the wrong sits on the throne. It doesn't make any difference. Well, we fought the battle in Kansas, and Nebraska, and California, and won it. They determined to enlarge the boundaries of slavery, and we fought that, as you all know. There came on the war.

Five hundred million dollars! God took it out of men's hands altogether. The cry of the oppressed entered into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth, and at a sacrifice of half a million lives, and millions of treasure, in blood, and fire, and smoke, and tears, slavery was extinguished for ever!

And now, I say, what are millions in His sigh when He wills? And I would say this, I believ He wills that every wrong shall cease, for He ha told us to pray, "Thy will be done on earth as i is in heaven," and there is a promise involved i that command. We never are bidden to pra for that which is not to be, and His will is t come. His will is to be done, and all wrong i to be trampled under foot of the right. He will when we will. Woe be to the man who stand in defence of wrong against God's will. On hi the responsibility must rest, and it is an awf one. We seek to remove that which produc untold misery. We want the young men i their manly strength and vigor to help us. W want the respectability, the intelligence, t piety of the country to help us, and give us standing. We want the ladies to help us their soft and winning influence to bring men this point.

SHALLOW ARGUMENTS OF OPPONENTS.

Oh, I am sorry to find so many good wom against us. Since I have been here I have r ceived some letters that make me think that the fools in the world are not dead yet. I nev saw such ridiculous arguments in favor of m erate drinking as I have had in writing with the last two or three weeks. They write ve well in regard to every thing else save this. O says, "Now, Mr. Gough, fight drunkenness, t don't be so rabid as to attack the drink, for it a good thing." Drink is a good thing; a then comes the argument that so many Christ women bring against us—Scriptural argumen am not able to meet them, because I do not know whether the Saviour drank intoxicating wine or non-intoxicating wine.

I know that He made wine by a miracle, and a gentleman told me that because he made it by a miracle he felt that he could drink it because it was a sanctified article of diet. He was honest n his convictions, and I said to him, "Well, why don't you eat barley bread? The Saviour manufactured barley bread by a miracle, and that s a sanctified article of diet, as much as wine." He replied, "Well, but you see I do not like barley bread." "Ah! now we have got it! That is just it. Well ,you won't eat barley bread because you don't like it. Now, I ask you to put away the wine that you may bear the infirmity of a weaker brother, and so fulfil the law of Christ by example as well as by precept." I say, again, I cannot tell you any thing about the wines of Scripture. But we are not fighting the wines of Scripture. You have got them in London. We have the wines of commerce, and the beers of commerce, but not of Scripture. I do not understand Hebrew or Greek, therefore I am not able to meet you.

TWO WINES IN THE BIBLE.

I got once into a little bit of a trap, and I earned a lesson never to advocate a question beyond my knowledge of it. It was at a lunch. A gentleman asked me to lunch with him, and I had refused. But the temperance men said, 'No, no, don't do that. We never get an invitation from that house that ought to be refused. Go, for the sake of the cause." So I went for the sake of the cause; and there was wine on the table, and they began upon me (I was the only teetotaller), and good-humoredly they badgered me out of my wits. At last I said 'There are two kinds of wine in the Bible." "How do you know?" "I know very well." "How do you know?" "Well, I do know." "But how do you know? There must be a reason. We don't deny it. But how do you know?" "Well, I don't know." "Then why did you say you did?" And then the thought came into my mind. "Yes, I do know. I know that the wine that is being drunk now in the kingdom of heaven cannot be the wine of the wrath of God." But we will give you all that you claim, and then all I ask is that I may be allowed to maintain the lawfulness of my principle.

Now, we want you all to help us in this movement. Just as far as you can, but do a little. That is just what we want. If you can do ever so little, do it in His name.

THE HEROIC MINER AND HIS SON.

The Perils of a Miner's Life—The Mine Flooded—Goffin's Courage—A Heroic Boy—The Terrified Miners Rescued—The Emperor's Reward

IN the little village of Aus, near Liege, there lived a miner by the name of Hubert Goffin. Out of his six children there was but one who had a taste for mining, and that was his third child, Matthew, and but twelve years of age.

His father took great pride in teaching him to extricate the ore from the rock, seeing that he liked it, and worked with wonderful spirit and interest always.

The life of miners, away down 500 feet below the surface of the ground, is a perilous one. From the time they step into the bucket-like basket which sinks them into a pit, a pall of danger enshrouds them, and all that sustains them is hope and faith. The suffocating vapors, the explosive gases, and the masses of earth overhead they seem to give no thought to, but work on as much at their ease as if they were digging in their own garden, with wife and children within sight and sound.

One day in the month of February, Hubert Goffin descended the shaft with his son and over 200 men under his command. It was about ten o'clock in the morning. All were at work, and none more interested and happy than young Matthew, who whistled and sang to the motion of his pick.

Suddenly all were startled by the bursting of water through an old cutting. The gush was immense; it rushed and flowed in upon them in every direction so speedily that the shaft was inundated before any thought could be given for commands or preparation.

The courageous Goffin did all in his power to encourage and pacify his men; but a panic was inevitable, and many in their hurry to ascend ran and stumbled over one another, falling and rolling into the stream and perishing.

Goffin took his young son in his arms, and exclaimed, "Come, my brave men, let us to work. We'll soon work a passage to the light; we have food and lights enough for at least three days. Nothing but faith and courage is needed."

All for a time set to work diligently; but after two days and nights' hard labor, and no sign of a reward, the men lost strength and courage.

Poor Goffin was overwhelmed. His young son, seeing this, took heart anew, and turning to the men said: "If you would all work as you ought, and not stop to cry and scold, something might be done. As long as there's life there's hope. Come, father! don't let us give up until our strength gives out."

His example stimulated them all to action again, and for a while they worked steadily. Some were constructing a dyke to oppose the torrent, others sounding with their compasses the neighboring mines, while many were spending their strength on rocks that resisted every blow. Is it any wonder, then, that hope a second time died out, and terror and confusion reigned?

But our little hero was still undismayed, and although there was no reason—for they had heard not a sound—to hope for any help from the surface, yet something said to Matthew, "Keep up, young lad, deliverance is at hand." He feared death, but he did not feel its approach; and again when the men threw down their implements with insults and threats he silenced them with his boldness and courage.

As he took his father's hand affectionately, with the whispering words, "Courage, father, all is going well," an indistinct sound pierced the rock. Oh! joy, it grows upon them—it approaches. At last they hear stroke upon stroke, and in shouting receive an answering shout. "Saved! saved!" they shriek in their excitement; ere the words have fallen from their lips the great barrier which separates day from night gives way with a thundering noise, and light streams in upon them. "Saved! saved!" was echoed and re-echoed, while tears of joy were shed, and prayers and thanksgiving were offered up.

Goffin and his son were the last to leave the mine.

The Emperor Napoleon presented to Goffin the Cross of Honor, and placed his son at the Lyceum of Liège. The lad died three years afterwards, and his father lost his life by the explosion of a mine on June 11th, 1821.

THE GRAND NATIONAL PARK.

By an Act of Congress, passed by a unanimous vote of both Houses, and approved March 1st, 1872, there was "withdrawn from sale and set apart for a perpetual public pleasure-ground" an area of 2,290,000 acres, or nearly one half the size of Massachusetts. It is located in the north-west corner of Wyoming Territory, and embraces the country about the head-waters of the Madison and Gallatin rivers, the Shoshone Fork of the Snake River, and also a part of the upper valley of the Yellowstone River, and is about sixty-five by forty-five miles in extent.

It is a volcanic district and therefore contains no metals or minerals of sufficient value to pay for their transportation out of so rugged a country, and its high altitude and latitude make it worthless for agricultural purposes. It has an elevation above the sea of from 6000 to 13,000 feet, and lies between forty-four and forty-five degrees north latitude. Nevertheless at no distant day this region is destined to become the most famous, as it is now the most marvellous, of all known countries.

Among the characteristic features of this remarkable region are, first, the Geyser basins. There are three of these basins, containing more geysers than are known in the world besides—one situated on the west side of the main range, on the Shoshone Fork of the Snake River, and the other two on the Fire Hole Fork of the Madison. These geysers spout columns of clear boiling-hot water, varying with the different sizes of their orifices from a few inches to twenty feet in diameter, and ranging in height from fifteen to two hundred and seventy-five feet; the eruptions being accompanied by a constant shaking of the ground, by a terrible noise as of subterranean thunder, and by the evolution of immense masses of steam, which tower aloft hundreds of feet above the water.

These indescribably beautiful displays occur with some geysers at set periods, as in the case of one of the largest called Old Faithful, which spouts with unfailing regularity every sixty-five minutes, and lasts from four to six minutes. With most of the geysers, however, the eruptions occur at irregular intervals, varying from three or four hours to several days, and sometimes even weeks, the eruptions lasting from fifteen or twenty minutes to two or three hours, and occasionally as long as nine hours.

Second. The solfataras, fumaroles, and salses, from out which there boils and spouts, with much roaring of steam and shaking of ground, mud thick as hasty-pudding or thin as mush; steam charged with sulphuretted hydrogen, and various other substances commonly emitted from volcanic craters. All about these vents are deposited beautiful incrustations of sulphur and silica, of a light buff color, or delicate, feathery, frost-like crystals of bright yellow sulphur, with alum and other volcanic products.

Third. The Yellowstone Lake, 7780 feet above the sea, covering nearly 300 square miles, adorned with islands, and surrounded with some of the grandest mountains in North America. This lake is well worthy a place among the most remarkable lakes in the world; its waters, in some places 300 feet deep, swarm with trout; its shores, sometimes grassy but more generally timbered, abound with game; and wonderful groups of hot springs and mud geysers are scattered all along its banks. In one place a hot spring flows out of a rock in the lake, and one standing on it may catch trout from the cool water of the lake, and turn around and cook them in the boiling spring without moving from his tracks, or taking them from the hook.

Fourth. The falls and Grand Canon of the Yellowstone River. There are two falls, only a short half mile apart, the upper fall 120 feet high, the lower fall 397 feet high, leaping into a chasm twenty-seven miles long, whose sides, ranging in height from 1500 to 2500 feet, are fantastic and picturesque in form above description, and wonderful for the gorgeous magnificence and brilliancy of their coloring. All along the length of the canon these mighty cliffs are dyed through and through with every variety of color; red, yellow, brown, orange, pink, green, black, gray, and white in constant succession fascinate and bewilder every beholder.

Fifth. The Mammoth Hot Springs on Gardner's River, whose steaming waters, apparently clear as crystal, yet carry in solution quantities of calcite, which deposits in forms of great delicacy and beauty, boiling up on the steep sides of the mountains terrace above terrace of curved pools of glistening stone, mostly white, but often colored yellow, green, orange, pink, and brown, looking just like marble bath-tubs adorned with rare mosaics.

Besides these there are cascades and cataracts, gorges and canons, sombre forests and pleasant meadows, shady dells and sunny glades, numerous lakes hidden in the woods and among the mountains, hundreds of mountains whose bases are above the level of the loftiest peaks of the Alleghanies, and from whose tops may be viewed the most magnificent panoramas of Rocky Mountain scenery; and countless other charms will soon make this a favorite resort of all the lovers of the sublime and beautiful.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Anglo-Afghan Difficulty appears to be tending to a peaceful issue. The son of the Ameer who was left in command at Cabul after his father's departure has paid a visit to the British head-quarters at Jellalabad. Although this visit cannot be considered as a conclusion of the war, it implies that the section of Afghan leaders is in the ascendant who counsel submission and treating for peace with England. It is said that the Ameer has fled in company with the Russian embassy formerly at his court. If this be so, it would appear that he regards Russia as a protector, and suggests grave difficulties in the way of a settlement of the difficulty. Russia's interference in the settlement is likely to be resented by England, and if the two nations quarrel the Ameer will probably be ground to powder between them.

English Operatives, one would think, must be considering seriously their condition and prospects. Both have reached a condition demanding thoughtful attention. It is difficult to imagine any thing more gloomy than they are at the present moment. Every department of trade and manufacture is under a cloud. The iron trade is depressed and large numbers of men are out of employ; in the coal mines other gloom, besides the natural, weighs on the miner's spirits, for it is reckoned that by the middle of January 80,000 persons will be discharged; the agricultural laborers are "on strike" in some districts, and in others are working at reduced pay; and as to the cotton trade the Daily News of December 28th says: "Instead of Christmas turning the tide of events, or reviving the cotton trade at Blackburn, the markets have gradually dwindled, and this week there has been less employment than ever. Six mills are at a standstill through bankruptcy, and others are definitely closed for three weeks."

Such a state of things might be borne patiently, if not cheerfully, if the hope could be held out to the sufferers that their privations were only of a temporary character; but unfortunately the indications are in the direction of increased depression rather than the revival of trade. The foreign markets where English goods are in demand are continually diminishing in number, and England with all her wealth cannot afford to live on herself. The crisis calls for the immediate attention of all classes, from laborers to statesmen, and he who discovers a remedy will deserve well of his country.

With the enormus tracts of unoccupied land in this country and in Canada, it seems marvellous that so many thousands of agricultural laborers should be content to work like slaves for $3 a week, on which some of them have to support a family of young children.

The Regicidal Mania seems still to be an epidemic in Europe. A plot to murder the Emperor of Austria is reported to have been discovered by the police only just in time to prevent the perpretration of the crime. The Czar of Russia shuts himself up in his palace and lives in continual dread of assassination. He has abundant reason for his fears, for Russia is honeycombed with secret societies whose design is to rid the country of the despotic irresponsible government under whose oppression the nation groans. A costly army of police, stringent laws rigorously enforced, and wholesale expatriations to Siberia are the measures adopted to keep down the aspirations of the people. They are successful in repressing open rebellion, as tying down of the safety-valve of an engine is a successful device for preventing the exudation of steam; but in both cases there is considerable risk in the experiment. It is impossible for the best and wisest rulers to avoid the risk of assassination in this world where fanatics abound; but in Russia and Austria a few measures giving relief to the people, and establishing the throne in righteousness and justice would be the best protection the monarchs could have. As it is, the heads that wear crowns in Europe just now lie very uneasily indeed.

An English Bishop has delivered his opinion on the Afghan war; an opinion which, whatever the English Government may think or say, is widely indorsed by thinking men on this side the Atlantic. Dr. Fraser, the Bishop of Manchester, is the boldest and most outspoken occupant of the English episcopal bench, and on political and social questions his opinion is usually right.

On this subject he says: "It may or may not be desirable to rectify our north-western frontier in India—military authorities are divided on the point; but can any Englishman in his conscience think that the rectification of an unscientific frontier or the desire of avenging an insult, if insult was offered, of which we have no evidence, is a sufficient reason in the sight of God and mankind for plunging it into the unspeakable horrors and incalculable consequences of war? I, at least, as a minister of Him who came to preach good-will among men, cannot think so, and I desire thus to liberate my conscience in the matter."

A Humane Tradesman.—A few days ago in Manchester, England, a woman, whose dress by no means betokened extreme poverty, was seen to steal a piece of cat's meat, of offal unfit for human food, from a stall. The stall-keeper followed her out of curiosity, saw her enter her house, and found her husband and children greedily devouring the garbage, all raw and loathsome as it was. They were relieved for the time by the kindness of the tradesman whom the unfortunate woman had robbed. This is an example of the distress that exists at present among the working classes in many places in England. In Salford it is said that "famine has taken possession, and the sights in the poorer quarters, women and children with their pinched faces, and their poor rags, are enough to make the heart bleed. It is no exaggeration to say that we have seen swine better housed." Three or four families are huddled together in one cottage, without a particle of food in the house, or an idea whence their next meal is to come from —or when.

Mrs. M. Baxter writes from Goeppinigen, Wurtemberg: "God continued to bless our meetings among the poor women in Stuttgart to the last. Many of them are most anxious over husbands who are total unbelievers; for unbelief is exceedingly prevalent amongst the men, and is, indeed, taught in many of the public schools. But, on the other hand, there is a schoolmasters' prayer union among the evangelical preceptors, which is a blessed bond for those who believe.

"We have had several Catholics, and have reason to believe that the light of God's truth has broken upon some of them. The gratitude of these dear people has been most touching. We had no collection or box for offerings, but they requested to be allowed to give something towards the expenses of the room, and we gave them an opportunity one evening, when some of the very poor gave as much as a shilling."

A "John Pounds Memorial Building," in honor of the founder of the ragged-schools, who was born at Portsmouth, England, was opened in that town recently in the form of a coffee tavern by Lord Shaftesbury, who said that it was impossible for any thoughtful man to doubt that the drink traffic was sapping the life-blood of the country, and that much of the present commercial depression might be fairly attributed to it. His Lordship earnestly counselled the Committee of Management to make the institution self-supporting, which he considered as a sine qua non for its success, and impressed upon the meeting that there was no one too humble to help forward the cause of temperance and religion. The spirit of the times was becoming more and more Democratic, and organic constitutional changes were imminent, but with the cultivation of high principles and moral control on the part of the people he was not afraid of a still further extension of political power.

The Earl of Shaftesbury has given utterance to his opinion on the English war now being waged against the Ameer of Afghanistan and on the way in which England governs India. He says: "There is but one way of governing India, and that way is in the exercise of justice all round. The observance of justice by an absolute Power would be a grand spectacle even to Western nations, but to Eastern nations (so little used are they to that sort of thing) it would appear to be a mission directly from heaven."

If England decided to govern India as his lordship suggests she would have to make very extensive changes in her system. But as a Christian nation she ought to see what could be done in that way. But then it might not be so profitable just at first—and profit is, after all, the main thing with many English politicians.

Making a Saint is the work just now to which the Jesuits in Rome are devoting their energies. Great pressure is being brought to bear on the Pope to canonize his predecessor, Pope Pius IX. Leo XIII. is no great admirer of Pius, and knows better than any one else what were the faults of his policy. He has rather snubbed the Jesuits lately, and has given them to understand that he will not yield to their pressure, and the celestial process will have to be put aside until he has settled some of the terrestrial difficulties which Pius created for him in Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and Russia.

What is a Wooden Leg?—The question seems simple enough, but "our kin beyond the sea" are in difficulty about it. During the past few weeks or months a very considerable quantity of "red tape" has been used up for disentangling the difficulty, as it presented itself to the Local Government Auditor in dealing with the accounts of the Greenwich Union. The guardians of the poor had spent $5 in providing a wooden leg for an inmate of their workhouse; and, strange to say, the auditor refused to pass the item, on the ground that a wooden leg was "furniture," and not, as described in the accounts, a "surgical appliance"! The auditor must surely have some sort of "wooden understanding" himself, to have raised such a question! If not a surgical appliance, then why not pass it as "furniture"? for if it were a kitchen table or a three-legged stool that wanted re-legging, would it not have been allowed? Then, why make a bother about rehabilitating a fellow-man in that very essential limb? The upshot of the affair is, that the said "leg" is to be charged on the "Metropolitan Common Poor Fund!" So that this one leg is the gift of the whole metropolis to its present owner! "All's well that ends well," even though it be such an extremity as a wooden leg.

Chance or Providence?—We noticed this question recently, in connexion with the hair-breadth escape of a minister from being crushed to death. It now appears that a similarly casual circumstance led to King Humbert's escape from the attempt that was made on his life. Signor Cairoli, who saved his Majesty's life by seizing the assassin at imminent risk to himself, had made a mistake in getting into the carriage, and taken his seat opposite the king, leaving the young prince to sit opposite the queen. He saw his mistake at once, and wished to change places with the prince, but King Humbert said the matter of ceremony was of no consequence, and bade him remain where he was. Cairoli, through this seeming accident, was at hand to save the king's life.

Mr. J. W. C. Fegan's Boys' Home, High Street, Deptford, London, is now maintaining and educating 130 boys for the battle of life. Some are being thoroughly taught such useful trades as printing, carpentry, shoemaking, and tailoring, with education at night; others are under the careful instruction of our schoolmaster. The Word of God is read and explained, and many boys have been led to Jesus. Many street wanderers crave for shelter in these Homes from rain and frost, who have no better bed at night than an empty van or packing-case.

The late Mr. GEORGE SMITH, the Eminent Assyriologist.

MR. GEORGE SMITH, THE EMINENT ASSYRIOLOGIST.

In surveying the records of human achievement and success, it is observable how often the inspiration of genius passes by the ranks of the wealthy, and descends upon some one in the humbler walks of life. We find those who, from their intellectual culture and wealth and ability, might be expected to take the lead, surpassed by some native genius from amongst the less favored sons of toil. The subject of the present sketch is an instance of this.

On the 16th of March, 1840, Mr. George Smith was born in Chelsea, London; and as his parents were in humble circumstances, his early education was only such as their limited means could afford. At the age of fifteen he ended his school career, and entered on a life of industrial activity, as apprentice to the well-known firm of Bradbury & Evans, to learn the art of bank-note engraving and printing. He there served the full term of apprenticeship with honor and credit.

His amiable disposition, cheerful temper, and studious habits attracted attention, and made him a general favorite with his fellow-employés. His eager appetite for knowledge was apparent before half the term of his apprenticeship had expired; for, during the time allowed for dinner, he would frequently be seen gazing upon the sculptures, and studying the inscriptions in the Assyrian collection in the British Museum. Though, no doubt, much impressed with the gigantic human-headed winged bulls and lions, and other Assyrian sculptures, the inscriptions appear to have excited his deepest interest, and to the study of these he devoted himself for some time.

Previous to this he employed his leisure time in the perusal of works relating to Eastern travels and Biblical lands. At first, when attempting the study of Assyriology, he made so little progress that he abandoned it for a time. But in 1865, while following the discoveries of Sir Henry Rawlinson, and Hincks, and Norris, and others, it became apparent to his penetrating genius that the fragmentary and unarranged condition of the Assyrian annals relating to Tiglath-pileser the Second formed a great hindrance to the comparative study of the Biblical and monumental chronologies and also of Assyriology.

He wrote to Sir Henry Rawlinson, who had charge of the Assyrian Antiquities in our national Museum, and obtained permission to examine the paper impressions of the inscriptions containing the annals of Tiglath-pileser, which had been brought from the mound of Nimroud. Although, as Assyriologists inform us, it was a very difficult undertaking, yet Mr. Smith made considerable progress in the arrangement of these broken tablets. And, moreover, he discovered a valuable inscription, giving the exact date of the payment of tribute by Jehu to Shalmaneser the Second. These discoveries he wrote and published in the Athenæum and other scientific journals.

In 1866 Mr. Smith altogether gave up the profession of bank-note engraving and printing which he had learned, and, through the kindness of Sir Henry Rawlinson, was engaged by the Trustees of the British Museum to assist that great scholar in the preparation of the third volume of the "Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia," and in the arrangements of the tablets in the Assyrian collection in the Museum. In this year also he discovered and published an Assyrian tablet, containing the record of a solar eclipse in the month Sivan, B.C. 763. The date of this eclipse being thus fixed, formed an important point around which Assyriologists grouped their chronological systems. He also discovered the date of an invasion of Babylonia by the Elamite power, B. C. 2280. These discoveries threw a flood of light upon Assyrian history and upon the political relations of the period.

About 1867 Mr. Smith discovered a very curious inscription relating to the sacred feasts of the Assyrians, which showed that they religiously observed the days of the quarters of the moon—the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th; thus shedding light upon the observance of the Sabbath of their brother-Semites, the Hebrews.

In 1870 the famous volume of "Assyrian Texts" was published, upon which Mr. Smith had been engaged, together with Sir Henry Rawlinson, ever since 1867. It was published as their joint production. In this year also he commenced his official life in the British Museum in London, having, through the kind exertions of Sir Henry Rawlinson and Dr. S. Birch, received from the Trustees of that establishment the appointment of senior assistant of the lower section in the department of Egyptian and Oriental Antiquities.

In 1871 he published another book, which is considered to be one of his greatest works, "The Annals of Assurbanipal," the Greek Sardanapalus. The work occupied several years, and is published in a tri-literal form: first, it gives the Assyrian character, then underneath it the equivalent in English letters, and again, underneath the latter, the translation in English. This appears to have been the result of great labor and difficulty. An Assyrian scholar describes it "as having done more than any other work to place the decipherment of the texts on a firm and accurate footing." In the same year he published a very able work, "Phonetic Value of the Characters of the Cuneiform Syllabary," and also "The Early History of Babylonia," from the inscriptions on the early Babylonian bricks.

In 1872 he made another remarkable discovery. While occupied in examining the mythological portion of the tablets from the ruined libraries and palaces of the Assyrian monarchs, he found, on the eleventh of the series, a legend of the Flood that was current in Babylonia.

This he translated and read at the meeting of the Society of Biblical Archæology, on December 3d. before a large and learned audience, at whch Mr. Gladstone, who was then Prime Minister, was present, and who, in a warm speech, eulogized the discoverer and spoke highly of his work. Sir Henry Rawlinson, who presided, also placed the highest Assyriological crown on Mr. Smith's brow, by publicly declaring that he was the first Assyrian scholar of his day. The next day there appeared in the columns of the London Times and Daily Telegraph nearly the whole of the paper read by Mr. Smith, and it became a great topic of interest at the time.

Soon afterwards the Daily Tegleraph undertook to defray the expense of a journey by Mr, Smith to the mounds of Assyria, in order to make what discoveries he could amongst them. The Trustees of the British Museum and the Lords of the Treasury having accepted the proposal of the Daily Telegraph, our Assyriologist set out for the East. On his way he visited and described the first treasures gathered from the plains of Assyria by the French Consul, M. Botta, from Korsabad, and which are contained in the collection of antiquities in the Louvre at Paris. The Daily Telegraph, from time to time during the year 1873, contained interesting letters from Mr. Smith, giving accounts of his adventures, explorations, and discoveries, and of his return with his antiquities, wnich the proprietors of that newspaper generously presented to the British nation, to form a portion of the great Assyrian collection in our National Museum.

In 1874 the firman granted by the Turkish Government being unexpired, Mr. Smith went on a second expedition to the East to continue excavations for the Trustees of the British Museum. The details of this interesting journey are given in his learned work, "Assyrian Discoveries," and the ancient tablets and other objects which he acquired in this expedition are now exhibited in the British Museum.

In 1875 he wrote his learned "Eponessian Canon," which Messrs. Bagster published, and also occupied himself in piecing and translating the famous Babylonish fragments relating to the Creation, the Fall, the Tower of Babel, etc. The result of these labors he embodied in his work called the "Chaldean Legends of Genesis." In this year he also published his "History of Assyria;" it was written for the Christian Knowledge Society, and is published in their series of "Monumental Histories."

In March, 1876, Mr. Smith went on his third and last journey for exploration to the plains of Assyria. He was accompanied by a Finnish Assyriological student. The outbreak of the plague in the district he intended to visit delayed his visit to that locality, but, with his wonted enthusiasm, he seized the opportunity of exploring the banks of the river Euphrates, from Balis northward. At Yerabolus he obtained fresh evidence of the abundant archæological and historical treasures which exist unknown in the plains of the East; for he discovered the site and ruins of the ancient Hittite capital, Carchemish. This is supposed to be as remarkable as the discovery of Nineveh itself.

After visiting several other sites of importance he went to Bagdad, where he purchased some 3000 tablets, which had been taken by the wandering Arabs from the ancient Babylonish library near Hillah. But, meanwhile, his Finnish companion had died of the hardships of the journey and the unhealthy climate; and Mr. Smith himself was taken ill from fatigue and the heat, at a small village named Tkisji, sixty miles from Aleppo. Here, in a rude hut, away from friends and home, and without prope food, at the end of his life's journey, lay England's great Assyriological scholar and discoverer. Providentially, there were present i those last hours a fellow-countryman and a English lady, to cheer him and accompany hin to Aleppo, where, soothed by their Christia ministrations, he breathed his last on Augus 19th, and his spirit returned to God who gave it That Bible, the truths of which he had endeav ored to confirm and fortify by Assyriology an Eastern explorations, was his stay when a proaching the valley of the shadow of death.

The news of his death was telegraphed to En land, and received with profound regret. N tices of his life and labors appeared in vario journals, and Queen Victoria generously gav his wife a pension of 120*l.* ($600) a year. It is sa to think that otherwise his wife and six you children are left unprovided for. His histo of Babylonia and Annals of Sennacherib are b ing prepared for publication.

THE MISSION OF A CITY.

y city comes to be known for certain cteristics: Babylon for pride, Sparta for ary prowess, Dresden for pictures, Rome pontifical rule, Venice for architecture in s. Glasgow for shipbuilding, Edinburgh for ng, and London for being the mightiest opolis of the world. Our American cities, urse, are younger, and therefore their char- istics are not so easily defined; but I think ve struck the right word in designation of rapped up and interlocked with the welfare the very existence of this nation stands the of Washington, on the Potomac—planted by way of compromise. At the dining- of Alexander Hamilton it was decided that e South would agree that the National Gov- nent should assume the State debts, then the h would agree to have the capital on the Potomac instead of on the Delaware. So the capital went from Annapolis to Philadelphia, and from Philadelphia to Trenton, and from Trenton to New York, and then passed from New York to the Potomac, where it will stay until within a century it shall be planted on the banks of the Mississippi, or the Missouri, just as soon as the nation shall find out from the law of national growth that it is better to have the hub of a wheel at the centre rather than at the rim of the tire.

"Well," you say, "what's all that to me?" You have just as much to do with the city of Washington as your heart has to do with your body. Washington is the heart of the nation. If it send out good blood, good national health. If it send out bad blood, bad national sickness. It is to me one of the most fascinating cities in the world, and I believe I shall show you before I get through that it has come to a higher condition of morality than it has ever before reached.

It is a city of palaces. He who has seen the Treasury buildings, and the National Post Office, and the Capitol, and the departments of State, has seen the grandest triumphs of masonry, architecture, painting, and sculpture. I put the eight panels of the bronze door of the Capitol against the door of the Church of the Madeleine at Paris. You talk so much about the works of the old masters. Go to Washington and see the works of the new masters: Leutz's "Westward Ho," Brumidi's frescoes, Greenough's Washington, Crawford's statue of Freedom. I put the white marble mountain of magnificence in which our Congress assembles against the Tuileries and the Parliament Houses of London. It is a city laid out more grandly than any city in the land. Mr. Ellicott by astronomical observations running the great boulevards from north to south, and from east to west. Every inch of its Pennsylvania Avenue historical with the footsteps of Webster, and Clay, and Jackson, and Calhoun, and Washington. Hundreds of thousands of people along those streets vociferating at the inaugurations. Streets along which Charles Sumner moved out toward Mount Auburn, and Abraham Lincoln toward Springfield, the bells of the nation tolling at the obsequies, and the organs of the continent throbbing with the Dead March. City of huzza and requiem. City of patriotism and debauchery. City of national sacrifice and back pay. City of Senatorial dignity and corrupt lobby. City of Emancipation Proclamation and Credit Mobilier. City of the best men and the worst. City of Washington.

Now I have watched that city when Congress was in session, and when Congress was away. The morals of the city are fifty per cent better when Congress is away. Then, at that time, piety becomes more dominant. It is one of the woes of this country that so many national legislators leave their families at home. These distinguished men coming to Washington show the need of domestic supervisal. A man entirely absent from elevated female society is naturally a bear. Men are better at home than they are away from home. It is said that some members of Congress, faithful to their religious duties during vacation, during term time give the vacation to their religion. There are iniquities in Washington, however, not associated with office—iniquities that stay all the year round. Plenty of drinking establishments, plenty of hells of infamy, and the police in their attempts to keep order do not get as much encouragement as they ought from the courts and churches. On Christmas Day ten men in contest on Pennsylvania Avenue; one of them shot dead, others bruised and mangled; the culprits brought before the District Attorney and let go. The sins rampant in New York and Brooklyn rampant in Washington. Two thousand dramshops and grocery stores and apothecary shops where they sell strong drink—two thousand in Washington. Twelve thousand nine hundred and eighty-three arrests during last year. Over four thousand people in that city who can neither read nor write. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars of stolen property captured by the police last year. All this suggestive to every intelligent mind. Washington wants more police. The beat of each policeman in Washington and Georgetown is on an average ten miles. Only nine mounted police in that vast city, which has rushed up in population and more than doubled in nine years—rushing up from 61,000 to 131,000.

But oh! what

since the day when the most flourishing liquor establishments were under the National Capitol, and Congressmen and Senators went there to get inspiration before they made their speeches, and went there to get recuperation afterward. Thanks to Henry Wilson and a few men like him for the overthrow of that abomination. During the war there were one hundred gambling-houses in the city of Washington; there were over five hundred professional gamblers there. One gambling-house boasted that in one year it had cleared over half a million of dollars. During one session of Congress the keeper of a gambling-house went to the Sergeant-at-Arms at the Capitol and presented an order for the greater part of the salary of many of the members, who had lost so heavily at the faro-table that they had thus to mortgage their salaries.

If now, when there are about twenty gambling-houses remaining in the city of Washington, you should go, you would find in those places clerks of departments, bookkeepers, confidential and private secretaries; and if you should go to some of the more expensive establishments, near Pennsylvania Avenue and Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets, you would find in those gambling-houses members of Congress, officers of the army, gentlemen distinguished all the land over. It seems to me that the reporters of Washington are not as wide-awake as our reporters, or they would give to the different States of the Union the names of the places where some of their great representatives in Congress are accustomed to spend their evenings.

But what a vast improvement in the morals of that city! Duelling abolished. No more clubbing of Senators for opposite opinion. Mr. Covode, of Pennsylvania, no more brandishes a weapon over the head of Barksdale, of Mississippi. Grow and Heitt no more take each other by the throat. Griswold no more pounds Lyon, Lyon snatching the tongs and striking back until the two members in a scuffle roll on the floor of the great American Congress. Oh! there has been a vast improvement.

Is it not a matter of great congratulation that there are to-day more thoroughly Christian men at the heads of departments of State in Washington than at any time since the foundation of the Government; and that the queen of American society, by her simplicity of wardrobe in the White House, has put condemnation upon that extravagance of wardrobe which wellnigh shipwrecked some other administrations, and by the banishment of the wine-cup from state dinners has shown to people in this country in high position that people may be jolly and yet be sober? Whatever may be your opinion in regard to the politics of the Presidential mansion—and I know there is a great difference of opinion among you—I have to tell you that there has never been a purer White House, less rum and tobacco, more Methodist hymn-books, or a higher style of personal morality, than to-day.

I came back from my observations of the city of Washington impressed with two or three things.

I. And first, while I would not have the question of a man's being a Christian or not a Christian brought into the political contest, I do demand that every man sent to Washington, or to any other place of authority, be a man of good morals. Will you send a blasphemer, as you have sometimes? Blasphemy is an indictable offence against the State. Will you send to Washington a man to make laws who breaks laws? Will you send an atheist? How can he swear to support the Constitution of the United States when there is no solemnity in an oath if there be no God? Will you send a man who indulges in games of chance, whether the amount be $500 or five cents? No. Gambling is denounced by the statute of every State. Will you send a libertine? Then you insult every family in the United States.

Before you send a man to your City Hall, or your State Legislature, or to your national council, go through him with a lighted candle, and find if he swear, if he lie, if he cheat, if he dishonor the family relation, if he keep bad company. If he do, let him stay at home. Scratch his name off your ticket with the blackest ink, and put on a blot after. How dare you send such a man to a Congress where John Quincy Adams died, or to a Senate Chamber where Theodore Frelinghuysen sat, his face illumined with charity and heaven? No religious test, but a moral test is demanded for every ballot-box in the city, State, and national elections.

Years ago some men were sent to Congress—and I am sorry to say there are some of them left—who were walking charnel-houses. Nothing but a gravedigger's spade could free the world from their corruption. Some of them died of delirium tremens, and in a brothel. After they had been dead a little while, some member, for the purpose of giving a stone-cutter a lucrative job, moved that a large sum of city, State, or national funds be appropriated for building a monument. Now, I have no objections to such to such a man if you put on it the right kind of epitaph and uncover it in the right way. Let the uncovering of that monument be when an August thunder-storm is approaching. Let the blocks of marble of that monument be cut in the shape of the ivory "chips" in which the deceased patriot used to gamble. On the four corners of the pedestal of the monument, cut in marble, let there be wine-cup, flask, decanter, demijohn. Then gather around for the dedication of this monument the fragments of families whom he despoiled, and let them come, and on each block of marble let them drop a bitter tear; and then when the blackest fold of that August thunder-storm has wrapped the top of the monument in darkness, and when some man high in church or State, recreant to the truth, stands there delivering the eulogium, let the black cloud open and a bolt strike into dust the monumental infamy with a thunder which shall make all our American capitals quake with the reverberation. "The name of the wicked shall rot."

II. Again: I came back from Washington with the impression that

WE NEED A GREAT NATIONAL RELIGION.

I do not mean a religion controlled by State officials, but I mean a religion dictated by a nation gospelized. I meah a religion mighty enough to control the morals of a nation. Old politicians will not be reformed. The undertakers must hurry up the funerals in these cases of political mortification. They will never be any better, those men. But gospelize the voters and then you will have gospelized officers of government. The pivot on which this nation turns is the ballot-box. Set that pivot on the Rock of Ages. There is only one Being who can save this nation, and that is God. We talk a great deal about putting the name of God more thoroughly into the Constitution of the United States. Ah, my friends! it is not God in the Constitution that we want; it is God in the hearts of the people. That test is going to come, if not in our time, then in the time of our children.

There has been a good deal of discussion of late as to whether the battle of Lookout Mountain was really fought above the clouds. General Grant says no. General Hooker says yes. We will not go into that discussion; but I tell you that every battle in this country for ninety-eight years has been fought above the clouds, God and angels on our side. First came the war of the American revolution. That was the birth-throe that ushered this nation into life. Then came the war of 1812. That was the infantile disease through which every child must go. Then came the war of 1861. That was the great typhoid which was to revolutionize the national system; and when, last Wednesday, this nation resumed specie payments, that was the settlement of the doctor's bill! Now let the nation march on in its grand career.

Lord God of Joshua, bring down the walls of opposition to this nation, at the blast of the Gospel trumpet. Lord God of Daniel, move around about us amid the leonine despotisms that growl for our destruction. Lord God of our fathers, make us worthy descendants of a brave ancestry. Lord God of our children, bring forth from the cradles of the rising generation a race to do better than we, when our hand and voice are still. Then let all the rivers of this land flowing into the gulf, or into the Atlantic and Pacific seas, be rivers of salvation, and all the mountains Olivets of truth and Pisgahs of prospect, and the mists rising from the lakes will be the incense of holy praise, and our cities will be so thoroughly evangelized that boys and girls, according to the teaching of my text, will be found playing in the streets thereof.

WHERE ARE THEY?

I learn once more, from my observation in the city of Washington, that worldly greatness is a very transitory and unsatisfactory thing. Great men, I noticed in Washington, are great only a little while. The majority of those men whom you saw there ten or fifteen years ago are either in the grave or in political disgrace. How rapidly the wheel turns! Call the roll of Jefferson's Cabinet. Dead. Call the roll of Madison's Cabinet. Dead. Call the roll of Monroe's Cabinet. Dead. Call the roll of Pierce's Cabinet. Dead. Of Abraham Lincoln's Cabinet, if I remember right, all dead but one, and he as good as dead. Call the roll of Grant's Cabinet. One or more of them worse than dead. The Congressional burying-ground in the city of Washington has one hundred and sixty cenotaphs planted in honor of members who died while in office; but they are only suggestive of a vaster congress departed.

What is political honor in this country? As far as I can judge, it is the privilege of being away from home amid temptations that have slain the mightiest, bored to death by office-seekers, assaulted of meanest acrimony, and kicked into obscurity, with your health gone when your time is out.

One of the Senators of the United States dying in Flatbush Hospital, idiotic from his dissipations. One member of Congress I saw, years ago, seated drunk on the curbstone in Philadelphia, his wife trying to coax him home. A Congressman from New York, years ago, on a cold day, picked out of the Potomac, into which he had dropped through his intoxication, the only time when he ever came so near losing his life by too much cold water. Delaware had a Senator whose chief characteristic was he was always drunk. Illinois had a Senator celebrated in the same direction. Oh! my friends—and I say this especially to the young men in my audience—there are so many temptations coming around all political honors, that before you seek them you had better see whether your morals are incorruptible.

I also point out to you the fact that American politics are most unfair to the most faithful and self-sacrificing men. I will never forgive American politics for the fact that it slew Horace Greeley. This country never saw a better patriot. His whole life given to reform, making a magnificent record for his country, all his deeds of self-sacrifice and his brilliant, intellectual achievements forgotten in one hour. There came a time when he felt that he, better than any other man in the Presidential chair, could adjust the difficulties between the sections, and while he was talking about the North and the South "clasping hands across the bloody chasm," American politics pushed him into it. When American politics did that, it committed the greatest outrage of the century, and proved itself guilty of patricide in the fact that it murdered a father, and of regicide in the fact that it sle king. O young men! look not for the hon of this world; look only for the honors t come from God. They never intoxicate. T never destroy. Crowns, thrones, sceptres, minions—will you have them?

ST. PAUL, in his Epistle to Titus, says 13): "For the grace of God, that bring vation, hath appeared to all men, teach training) us, that denying ungodline worldly lusts, we shall live soberly, righ and godly in this present world, looking waiting with joy) for that blessed hope rious appearing of the great God, and o our Jesus Christ."

We have here set forth the attitude and hope of the Church, in expectation of coming. First, the grace of God, that source and foundation of the work of tion, has already appeared or been ma in the incarnation and atoning sacrifice c for the sins of mankind. This grace manifestations are to teach, train, or d us that we deny ungodliness and world and should live soberly, justly, and god present world: soberly, comprising fait to ourselves; justly, in our dealings with en ; and godly, embracing our duties to is passage from the Epistle to Titus may garded as an epitome of the exhortations, ines, duties, and hopes, that abound in the Scriptures, in connection with the coming r blessed Lord. There is not a doctrine of tianity upon which the light of this great does not shine, and render more impor- and luminous by its radiance. There is not ty pertaining to the Christian life that is uickened and rendered more imperative by wer. There is not a virtue that it does not nto the highest exercise ; not a motive in human heart that it does not purify and gthen ; not a hope for the future that it not kindle with a new and celestial fire.

may begin with the duty of repentance, which the coming kingdom of heaven was ded at the time of the First Advent, and along in their natural or logical order the us duties and obligations that are pressed the followers of Christ, up to that pre- d in Rev. 3 : 11 : "Behold I come quickly ; that fast that thou hast, that no man take crown," and we shall find them enforced rendered if possible more sacred and bind- by the truth that bursts upon us from so pages of the New Testament, that "The cometh."

REPENTANCE.

Acts 3 : 19–21 we find the call, "Repent ye, efore, and be converted, that your sins may lotted out, when the times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord ; and hall send Jesus Christ, which before was ched unto you ; whom the heavens must ve until the times of the restitution of all gs, which God hath spoken by the mouth His holy prophets since the world began." e word translated "when" in the 19th e should, according to eminent commenta- Dr. Lange, Dean Alford, Dr. J. It can have no other meaning. call, therefore, of the Apostle upon the to repent, and have their sins blotted out, "in order that the times of refreshing may e from the presence of the Lord." He ed forward to the happy period, at the close the present dispensation, when the Lord ld again appear, and he desired to have it ened by the repentance of the people.

t the ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ the vens had received Him, and He would re- n there until the times of restitution of all gs—times wherein all things will be restored, which all God's holy prophets had spoken the world began. When those times be- "Jesus Christ, which before was preached o you," or rather "the Messiah Jesus, who before appointed unto you," will be sent n heaven, and in view of this blessed truth, to hasten the coming of the Lord, the sum- s goes forth to the Jews, and with more hasis now to all mankind, as we "see the approaching," to repent, and be converted have their sins blotted out."

e pass next to consider the inward Christian ues that are enveloped in the atmosphere light and quickening power of the day of the d. In Philippians 1 : 9, 10, St. Paul says : nd this I pray, that your love may abound more and more in knowledge and in all judg- t, that ye may approve things that are ex- ent, that ye may be sincere and without nce till the day of Christ," or, more cor- ly, "against the day of Christ." Love having n planted in the heart of the believer, and erity and purity being elements of the new these are to be cultivated and made to abound more and more, for the day of the Lord, when a character thus formed will be made manifest.

The eye, ever directed to the end "the coming of the Lord," annunciates this love, thus progressive to the final day of Christ.

PATIENCE.

Next, this doctrine calls for the exercise of patience and endurance. "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient ; establish your hearts ; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh" (James 5 : 7, 8). Long-suffering patience is a virtue that enters so largely into the Christian life and character ; that is so vitally connected with all the other virtues, love, faith, steadfastness, and hope ; and is so intimately associated with present and final success in every department of Christian service—that it needs to be constantly nourished and strengthened. Especially should it be maintained and exercised to the highest degree in reference to the coming of the Lord.

And, let me ask, what is there better calculated to promote in a Christian soul patient endurance than the thought that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." With our eyes steadily fixed upon the fact ; with an intense love of His appearing ; with an abiding faith in the exceeding great and precious promises that cluster around this doctrine ; and with those promises already taking root and germinating in our spiritual nature, we shall find it easy to practise Christian patience, and to look to the Lord to establish our "hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all His saints."

It is not necessary that we should know the precise day or hour of His coming. It is not essential that we should be infallible in discerning the signs of the times of His near approach ; though it is our privilege and duty to study these signs, and gather from them all the light we can upon the period of His probable appearance. But it is essential that we should be patient, and that we should listen to every injunction, and obey every command that our Lord has given in connection with the event in His history, that, in His estimation, at least, towers above all others.

It is essential that we keep our eyes open to what is transpiring around us, as possibly prophetic of stupendous changes near at hand in the divine administration of the Kingdom of Christ on the earth. By doing thus, we shall meet all the solemn obligations that the Second Coming imposes upon us ; and if we die before the heavens are lighted up with the splendors of His appearing, we shall reap all the benefits, in the first resurrection, that will accrue to those who are alive, and remain to hear the shout, the voice of the Archangel, and the trump of God.

This truth is used as

A MOTIVE TO SOBRIETY.

St. Paul says (1 Thess. 5 : 1, 2, 6) : "Of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. . . . Therefore let us not sleep, as do others ; but let us watch and be sober." As to the precise time of Christ's coming, there was no need that the Apostle should discuss that, for it could not be determined, though we are required to notice the signs of the time. The great fact ever to be kept in view is that the day of the Lord will come suddenly, unexpectedly, as a thief in the night. It is possible for Him to come at any hour, hence the children of the light should watch and be sober.

Sobriety is frequently joined with watchfulness, as in 1 Peter 4 : 7 : "But the end of all things is at hand ; be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer." Upon this passage Calvin remarks : "The end he speaks of is not merely that of each several individual, but the entire renovation of the world : as if he had said that Christ will shortly come, and put an end to all things. It is not strange, therefore, if we are overwhelmed by worldly cares, and held in slumber, or if the sight of present things dazzles our eyes ; because we do all commonly promise ourselves an eternity in this world ; never, at least, does the end come into mind. Whereas did the trump of God sound in our ears it would keenly smite all our senses, nor suffer them to be thus torpid.

"It might be objected, however, that a long series of ages has elapsed since Peter wrote this, and still the end is not yet seen. I answer that to us the time seems long for this reason, that we measure its length by the spaces of the present life, but that, could we have respect to the perpetuity of the life to come, many generations would be for us as it were a moment (2 Peter 3 : 8). Moreover it must be held as a first principle, that ever since the appearing of Christ there is nothing left to the faithful but with wakeful minds to be always intent on His Second Advent."

HOLINESS.

In view of our appearing with Christ in glory, we are required to mortify or put to death the lusts of the flesh. "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth ; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry" (Col. 3 : 3–5). More literally and freely rendered : For ye died to this world, and your life, the resurrection and eternal life, is hidden, is at present concealed, with Christ in God—with Christ who is in the bosom of the Father. When Christ, who is our life, the essence and impersonation of our life, is manifested, then shall ye also with Him be manifested in glory. Though we now appear to be dead, yet then our true and real life will bloom out in its wondrous spiritual elements, its heavenly beauty, and its likeness to Christ.

Animated by this sublime hope, favored by heaven with such a glorious destiny, the Apostle exhorts the believer to put to death the members which are upon the earth, which are earthly and sensual, and such as belong to the old nature ; and preparatory to meeting Christ and sharing the splendors and honors of His second coming, to put on, as God-elect, kindness, meekness, long-suffering, and love, which is the bond of perfection. We are required to cultivate and practise the virtues that Christ manifested in His earthly career, that we may share in the glories of His heavenly appearing.

The Apostle John inculcates this purity in language most sublime and thrilling. His words have for years rung through my soul with an eloquence and power that I cannot express. "Every man that hath this hope in him (the hope of seeing Christ and of being like Him at His appearing) purifieth himself, even as He, that is Christ, is pure" (1 John 3 : 23). We are now at this moment the sons or children of God, just as truly as we ever shall be, although the full blessedness and glory of our sonship is still concealed. This moral likeness to Christ must begin here ; and we know of nothing better calculated to produce it than keeping the eye steadily fixed upon our coming Lord, and the heart warm with the love of His appearing.

ENDURANCE.

This doctrine is presented by the Apostle Peter as the great support under trials and persecution. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you ; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings ; that, when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy" (1 Peter 4 : 12, 13).

In the opening chapter of this epistle the Apostle indulges in the same strain of warm sympathy and exulting hope, directing the thoughts of his suffering fellow Christians to the appearing of the Lord, as the event of transcendant interest and inconceivable splendor which, "in the last time," at the close of the present dispensation, is to burst upon the Church, bringing unspeakable joy and rapture.

So penetrating and absorbing was the power of this event, that he was led, as he desired his brethren to be led, to rejoice in being made partakers of Christ's sufferings. It mattered not how great or long continued those sufferings were, he would have them cheerfully endured. He would have them welcome them and rejoice in them as the greatest advantages they could possibly receive, as far more to them than all the treasures and honors and pleasures of earth. And for this reason, "That when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy." The joy now in partaking of His suffering is the germ of an exultant and boundless joy that will be experienced at the moment of His appearing.

Peter, sharing with the other apostles in the expectation that Christ's second advent was near at hand, thus speaks of this salvation upon which his heart is fixed, as ready to be revealed, or fully disclosed in the last time, the period that will begin with Christ's return. In the words of Luther, "The inheritance to which you are ordained has been acquired long since, and prepared from the beginning of the world, but lies as yet concealed, covered, and sealed; but in a short time it will be opened in a moment and disclosed so that we may see it." In this fact, that great treasures are reserved for believers, soon to be revealed, they should greatly rejoice.

The possessor of this faith will be praised for his fidelity, for his power of endurance for Christ's sake, and for his faithfulness unto death. He will receive the honor promised by Christ to His faithful servants, as expressed in John 12 : 26 : "If any man serve Me, him will My Father honor." He will share in the glory which the Father hath given to His Son, and which He will communicate to all that are His. "To them who, by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life" (Romans 2 : 7). The preciousness of this faith, and the splendor of its fruits, will also appear in the praise and honor and glory it will bring to the blessed Trinity: praise to the Father for so loving the world as to give His only-begotten Son to die for it; honor to the Lord Jesus Christ for His great redemption; and glory to the Holy Ghost for the completion of the work of grace in the hearts of believers.

BROTHERLY LOVE.

In Paul's first epistle to the Thessalonians we have this great event placed before believers, as a motive to increase in brotherly love, and as a reason for their entire sanctification. In the first chapter the apostle commends the Thessalonians for their strong faith and their readiness to "turn from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven" (1 : 10). He thus presents in these two particulars the life-aim of converts to Christianity—the service of God, and waiting for the return of His Son from heaven.

In the third chapter, twelfth and thirteenth verses, the apostle writes: "And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you; to the end he may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints."

The aim and end of increasing and abounding in brotherly love, and in affectionate interest in all mankind, is, as here set forth, the establishment of our hearts in holiness, that when we pass under the scrutinizing gaze of God, at the coming of our Lord, we may be found unblamable in holiness before Him. The tendency of love is to promote holiness and give to the heart a steadfastness in obeying the will of God, for "love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13 : 10). Thus we see how brotherly love, like every other Christian virtue, points to the second coming, and is stimulated by it and made tributary to that "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. 12 : 14).

Who is there that rightly apprehends the doctrine we are considering and is alive to its importance; whose heart is open to the exhortations and appeals that the Holy Ghost makes to us, in view of our Lord's declaration, "Behold, I come quickly," who will not offer for himself the prayer that the God of peace, the Author and Source of peace, may sanctify him wholly; and that his spirit and soul, the seat of animal life, with its powers and interests; and body, that is the whole being, "may be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ"?

Our doctrine is a powerful incentive to fidelity in the outward activities of the Christian life. It is thus presented in several of the parables of our Lord. In the 25th chapter of Matthew we have the parables of the ten virgins and of the talents distributed by the Lord to His servants. The first represents those who are waiting for the Lord, and the second those who are working for Him. The disappointment of the foolish virgins is a warning against the absence or decay of the inward spiritual life while the forms of religion are observed. The talents refer to the capacities and gifts given to us, with the means and opportunities afforded for increase and usefulness in the Kingdom of God. The rewards held out are to stimulate us to diligence and fidelity in laboring for the Master, and the doom of the wicked and slothful servant is a warning against sluggishness and the neglect of the outward work committed to us.

The Lord Jesus Christ has gone into a far country. Previous to His departure, or ascension, He delivered to His servants, His Apostles, whom He particularly addressed, and to all His followers, His goods. He made over to them the interests of His Kingdom, and furnished them with the means for carrying forward the good work which He had begun. "Unto one He gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several (or his own) ability," according to his capacity to use the gifts, spiritual or material, given to him. Every one has his endowments and gifts and a sacred mission to fulfil, during the Lord's absence.

The fact that gives sacredness to our work, and is calculated to stimulate us to the greatest fidelity in the use of our power, acquisitions, time, wealth, influences, and opportunities, is the certainty that our Lord will return and reckon with us. As expressed in the parable, "After a long time the Lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them. And so he that had received five talents brought other five talents, saying, Lord, Thou deliveredst unto me five talents: behold, I have gained beside them five talents more. His Lord said unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (Matt. 25 : 19–21).

This we must regard as the judgment of the Pre-Millennial Advent when the saints will be judged and rewarded according to their works. The parable recorded in Luke 19 : 12, 13, is similar in many points to this: "He said therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. And he called His ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come."

"This parable of the Pounds," says Lange, "places visibly before our eyes not only the life calling of the apostles, but also that of all believers. From the fact that here ten servants appear who all receive the same, the diversity recedes before the unity. As bondservants for their Lord they are called to wait for His return, and that not in inactive rest, but in jealous activity. They have not to contend with carnal weapons against His enemies, but in the midst of all opposition quietly to proceed with their labors. In the humble position of witnesses to the faith, they must seek with word and d

The success of their endeavors is differe modified according to the diversity of time, ents, and energies; but the reward is suite the different deserts. In every case it is in portion to that which is demanded and acc plished.

We pass next to consider a duty, in con
tion with our Lord's coming, which He Him presents to His Church in various forms, ca lated to awaken attention in language indica the deepest earnestness and solicitude; an appeals that should sweep over Christen

The elements of Christian watchfulness wakefulness, alertness, activity, and cir of Christ's coming, the suddenness of His

The Apostle Paul, after obeying himself every injunction of his Lord relating to His second coming, and after unfolding this truth with a clearness and power that Divine inspiration alone could give him, associated it with THE SHOUT OF VICTORY with which he greets the hour of his departure from earth, and sends forth a promise to cheer all those who "love His appearing." While solemnly exhorting the beloved Timothy to fidelity in his ministerial work, he says : "For I am now ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith : henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day : and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing" (2 Tim. 4 : 6–8).

"That day," the day of the personal coming of the Lord, is still the theme upmost in his mind. It sheds its lustre over the last hours of his earthly career. It pours its brightness upon the valley of the shadow of death. It fills him with the spirit of exultation and triumph. It holds for him a crown of righteousness, not indeed merited, but his, as a full partaker of the righteousness which is by faith in Christ. He has fought the good fight, and obtained the victory, and the prize is laid up for him. It is there already, to be publicly given to him by the Lord, the righteous Judge, at that day.

"And not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing." To all who look forward with affectionate longing to His coming, who anticipate the event with delight, a crown of righteousness will be given in the presence of saints and angels by the glorious Lord Himself. This state of mind presupposes obedience to all the injunctions and exhortations from Christ and His apostles that we have considered ; and through these the attainment of the highest degree of spiritual life. And on the other hand, to love His appearing is fitted more than any thing else to promote Christian activity, brotherly love, and holy living, "to the end He may stablish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints" (1 Thess. 3 : 13). Hear, in conclusion, the words of the King of kings, who is already on his way with the heavenly hosts : "Behold, I come quickly ; hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. Him that overcometh, or conquereth, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall nevermore go out ; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God." When upon the earth his citizenship was in heaven. But then it was latent, now it is manifested, and He is known as an inhabitant of the city of the Living God, and is free to enter it according to the promise in Rev. 22 : 12–14 :

"Behold, I come quickly ; and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be. Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." "And I will write upon him my new name ;" that wonderful, mysterious name, that at present is uncommunicable. It is referred to in that most sublime vision of the coming King in the 19th chapter of Revelations, "and He had a name written, that no man knew but Himself." It was none of the names or titles by which He was known on earth. He calls it "My new name," a name, doubtless, indicative of His final triumph and complete union with His saints, who henceforth are to share with Him the glories of His Kingdom.

Twice in the closing chapter of the Bible does Christ say, "Behold, I come quickly." The third time He says, "Surely I come quickly." Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

THE MISSION OF NEHEMIAH.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 19th.—Neh. 1 : 4–11 ; 2 : 1–8. Golden Text, 2 : 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR lesson for to-day brings before us a man who knew what the burden of the Lord meant. Nehemiah was one of the captive Israelites in Babylon ; his position was good, and his circumstances easy as cup-bearer to the King of Babylon. But it happened that some of the Jews which had escaped came to the palace, and told Nehemiah concerning Jerusalem. "The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province are in great affliction and reproach : the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire." Had Nehemiah been a man who lived only for himself, he might have said, "I have enough to do with my own duties ; I am sorry for my brethren, but it is not my affair." Had he been an enthusiast and full of self, he might have taken upon himself to go to the king and plead the cause of his people.

But he did neither. "And it came to pass, when I heard these words, that I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven." Here was his resource. The cause of Jerusalem was God's cause, and God's cause was Nehemiah's.

Nehemiah reminded God of His character—the God "that keepeth covenant and mercy." And he confessed "the sins of the children of Israel, which we have sinned against Thee : both I and my father's house have sinned." So he, who had perhaps sinned the least, specified himself and his father's house particularly in his confession. Was it an exaggeration ? No, for the conscience becomes even more delicate with those who live in the presence of God. This man of God seeks in no way to palliate the sins of his people, and he recognizes the righteousness of God in His chastening as the fulfilment of His word ; but he uses this very fact as his argument with God in pleading for His mercy.

And lastly he claims their right by covenant. "Now these are Thy servants and Thy people, whom Thou hast redeemed by Thy great power, and by Thy strong hand," and he requests an immediate interference on their behalf : "O Lord, I beseech Thee, let now Thine ear be attentive to the prayer of Thy servant, and to the prayer of Thy servants, who desire to fear Thy name : and prosper, I pray Thee, Thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man." "Now," "this day"—this was something definite. It was no vague prayer to discharge an uncomfortable sense of duty : the matter lay on the man's heart ; his life, his joys and sorrows were all bound up with God and God's city, Jerusalem.

So prepared in the presence of God, Nehemiah goes into the presence of the king. Something in his manner struck his royal master. "Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence." Nehemiah had made no plan that a sad exterior should attract the king's attention ; he had committed all to God without himself making any plan as to how he was to bring the matter before the king. God was equal to the occasion—this he knew. "Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick ? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart." For a moment he quailed, the opening was made, but a false step just now, and the cause so dear to him would be lost. "Then I was very sore afraid, and said unto the king, Let the king live forever : why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire ?"

It was a moment of crisis. He had said no more and no less than the truth, and he had already counted upon God for the result. And how he must have adored God for His faithfulness when the king said unto him, "For what dost thou make request ?" Had he specified in his prayer the very words he would have wished the king to speak, they would have been probably these very words. But we see no sign of elation, nothing to make us think he could now quit his position of dependence upon God. On the contrary, he says, "So I prayed to the God of heaven." A man who leads a prayer-life becomes so accustomed to God's guidance in every detail of his life that his very thoughts become prayer, and the very atmosphere which his soul breathes is that of prayer. His life is lived between him and God ; it is a partnership in every thing. "So I prayed to the God of heaven. And I said unto the king," etc.

Some men make plans or act, and then afterwards ask God's blessing ; so did not Nehemiah. And his request to man, made under the cover of prayer to God, was a bold one : "If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favor in thy sight, that thou wouldest send me unto Judah, unto the city of my fathers' sepulchres, that I may build it." A man of prayer is a man who is also ready for action where God has opened his way. And the king asked him, "For how long shall thy journey be ? and when wilt thou return ? So it pleased the king to send me, and I set him a time." But had Nehemiah no thought of the expense of such an undertaking ? Yes, and, emboldened by God, he goes on to urge his request still further in detail. "Moreover I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judah ; and a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king's forest, that he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the palace which appertained to the house."

How came it that on the spur of the moment Nehemiah could think of all these needful details, just when he was sore afraid ? Every thing had been thought over and prayed over alone with God first, so that He who had all in His hand was present, reminding His servant of what was needful and reassuring him, so that he feared not to ask what God put into his heart to ask. And so he testified, "And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me." He says nothing of the king's liberality, but traces every thing straight up to its source, in the God that heareth prayer.

But is this man of God to have an uninterrupted career of success ? Even Christ, the Captain of our salvation, was made "perfect through sufferings" (Heb. 2 : 10). And we also, if need be, are "in heaviness through manifold temptations," etc. (1 Pet. 1 : 6, 7). And Nehemiah had his trials. The governors beyond the river who dwelt in the land of Judah were grieved exceedingly that "there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel." So that at the outset Nehemiah saw that he had nothing to hope for from them. The people were under subjection to them ; how could he arouse them to a trust in God and to a true spirit of patriotism ? He came to Jerusalem, and the project burned in his heart, but he told no man ; he made a survey of the city, but he did it by night, and the secret of his mission was as yet between him and God,—"neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem." Oh ! if every worker for God would make sure of his work thus in the stillness of God's presence before he speaks of it abroad, how much truer and surer it would be ! There would be fewer mistakes made, fewer occasions for the enemy to speak reproachfully.

Thus prepared alone in silence with his God, he came from His presence to that of the people, and said unto them, "Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire : come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we be no more a reproach. Then I told them of the hand of my God which was good upon me ; as also the king's words that he had spoken unto me." Thus in the first place he aroused them to see their responsibility, and then showed them how possible it was, and how God had made the way plain for them. And a profound impression was produced, for they said, "Let us rise up and build. So they strengthened their hands for this good work."

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ANNOUNCEMENT.

In commencing the publication of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times in America, it was impossible to form an accurate or even an approximate idea of the extent to which it would enjoy the favor of the Religious Public. The price was therefore fixed at four cents per single copy, that being the lowest sum deemed prudent under the circumstances.

Now, however, after the issue of only a few numbers, the journal has attained a circulation which, in connection with the numbers of commendatory letters daily received, justifies a

REDUCTION IN PRICE.

We have accordingly much pleasure in announcing that the price of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now reduced to

for single copies. Annual subscription, postage paid, $1.50. Remittances should be by check or post-office order or registered letter, and be made payable to Joseph Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, New York.

Though but a few weeks have elapsed since the issue of the first number of the American edition of The Christian Herald, we feel constrained thus early to express our grateful thanks for the numerous friendly greetings and kind expressions of appreciation that have reached us from every quarter.

While thankful to all who have aided us, we have at this time especially to acknowledge the aid and sympathy of hundreds of ministers from all parts of the country, and of every denomination.

It has been the occasion of surprise that while we have received hundreds of letters commendatory of the appearance and character of the paper in detail, there has been not one objection, either to particular articles or to the general course of the paper.

We ask a continuance of the sympathy and co-operation of our brethren of every name. We greatly desire that The Christian Herald shall reach every family in the United States, and believe that the above reduction in price ought to effect that object.

The Christian Herald is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Resumption day, notwithstanding the numerous predictions to the contrary, passed off without excitement. In New York, as in other centres of commerce through the country, no great desire was manifested to obtain hard money in exchange for greenbacks. It had been said that so great a crowd would besiege the Treasury doors on Thursday, January 2d, 1879, that the first place in the line would be worth $50,000, and it was expected by some persons that the demand for gold would far exceed the supply held by the Government. The fact was that there was really no demand for gold worth mentioning, and numbers of people at the bank counters declined to receive the glittering coins, and asked for paper. So easily has the task that appeared so stupendous a few years ago, notably in September, 1870, when one day gold stood at 165, been completed, and with so little effect on the habits of the people. The stars and stripes were run up over the banks and financial houses on Broadway and Wall Street, in honor of the day when "Uncle Sam" declared himself ready to fulfil his engagements, but, as in the case of more puny dealers in promises to pay, the fact of that readiness removed the desire of creditors to present their claims.

It is believed by sound thinkers that the resumption of specie payments will bring a new life into all classes of business, and that in a short time a general trade revival will take the place of the present dearth and stagnation.

Yellow-Fever Conference.—The convention of homœopathic doctors at New Orleans investigating the yellow-fever has adopted a report which says: "Yellow-fever is a specific disease caused by a morbific germ, which requires for its generation and diffusion a combination of factors, among which are the aggregation of human beings in a foul atmosphere; high temperature, long-continued calm weather, humidity, pestilential exhalations from the earth, and a deficiency of ozone in the air. Yellow-fever is both imported and indigenous, and the most perfect quarantine against the former variety will not protect us in the least from the ravages of the latter." The report also recommends the burning of garbage in the streets of Southern cities and the use of ozone as a disinfectant, and says that it will probably not be long before the people of New Orleans will burn their dead bodies rather than bury them.

A noble gift has just been made to the Trustees of Princeton College by Messrs. R. L. & A. Stuart, formerly the leading sugar-refiners of New York, who a few years ago retired from business. The gift consists of the property known as the Potter estate which adjoins the College, and comprises a fine Italian villa built of brown stone, with all the modern improvements, suitable for the residence of the President of the College; and thirty acres of ground which may be used as a botanical garden, or as building sites for the professors' houses, or may possibly serve for both purposes. The Messrs. Stuarts are greatly adding to the value of the gift by putting the house and its surroundings in perfect order at their own expense.

The intense cold which prevailed through the country on January 3d has caused several fatalities. The mercury began sinking on Thursday morning, January 2d, at six o'clock, when it stood in New York at thirty degrees above zero, and continued falling until Friday evening, when it registered four degrees below zero; that being fourteen degrees lower than it stood any time last winter, and the lowest point it has reached since January 10th, 1875. At Pittsburg the fall was even more sudden, being thirty-seven degrees in 24 hours; and at Richmond, Va., it fell forty degrees in the same period. Trains were delayed by the snow on some routes, and on others had to be abandoned. At Elizabeth, N. J., a brakeman was frozen to death; at Mill Hollow, Pa., another man died from the effects of the cold; and several other cases are reported, besides those who, being in delicate health, may have had their deaths accelerated by so sudden a change in temperature. Any wealthy Christian who has been studying the Epistle of James lately, and is desirous of showing the results of study, may find opportunity in the abodes of the poor just now. Charity in the form of fuel would be a seasonable form in many homes at this bitter time.

Bishop Simpson, in his recent Yale lecture, thus describes his own entrance into the ministry: "My mother was a widow; I was her only son, and the only child remaining at home. It seemed impossible to leave her. I feared it might almost break her heart to propose it. But as I saw the church would probably call me, and as I had promised God to follow His openings, I one day, with great embarrassment, introduced the subject to my mother. After I had told her my mental struggles, and what I believed God required, I paused. I shall never forget how she turned to me with a smile on her countenance, and her eyes suffused with tears, as she said: 'My son, I have been looking for this hour ever since you were born.' She then told me how she and my dying father, who left me an infant, consecrated me to God, and prayed that if it were His will I might become a minister. And yet that mother had never dropped a word or intimation in my hearing that she ever desired me to be a preacher. That conversation settled my mind. What a blessing is a sainted mother! I can even now feel her hand upon my head, and I can hear the intonations of her voice in prayer. I entered the pulpit immediately. Through divine mercy some souls were awakened and converted; and, by the grace of God, I have continued to this day."

Healing by prayer is chronicled in a Massachusetts daily paper in the following paragraph:

"The miraculous cure of Mrs. Charles A. Bemis, of Holliston, by prayer, after thirty years of suffering from chronic diseases, is reported. During her illness she was unable to perform her household duties without aid, and at no time was she free from pain, while frequently she was confined to her bed, and under the care of doctors for periods of three or four months. She was unable to attend the church near by except as she was carried, and she had been to but two prayer-meetings in years. Hearing of Dr. Charles Cullis, of Boston, however, she visited him last month, to obtain what relief she could. After an introduction, the doctor repeated passages of Scripture relative to faith in God, all present knelt in prayer, the doctor having dipped his finger in oil and placed it on the patient's forehead. At the conclusion of these exercises Mrs. Bemis says she felt like a new woman, all pain having left her, and she has been perfectly well ever since, being able to walk to church, and even longer distances, without fatigue."

Work while it is called To-day.—The Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, at his recent lecture related the following incident, which is worthy the attention of many Christians in our churches. Mr. Cook said:

"There is a story now in circulation in New York City concerning the younger Tyng, to the effect that his habit of making all the members of his church work, is occasionally distasteful to individuals among them. Not long ago a rich gentleman called upon Dr. Tyng in his study and told this valiant servant of reform that he wished to pay his church dues and to have a good pew, but that he did not care to be put down on any committee, and that he was especially averse to having his wife and daughters sent into the slums to visit the poor and degraded. 'Yes,' said Dr. Tyng, 'I see what you want, but you have come to the wrong place. Just around the corner is what you are looking for. There is the Church of the Heavenly Rest.'"

In this world of sin and misery, of men perishing daily for lack of knowledge; unsaved men near at hand, and in distant lands; who is there surveying a harvest-field so wide in which so few laborers are at work, can think of rest until the Lord of the harvest summons him to his reward

Contagious diseases are more easily checked at their first appearance than in their later manifestations, and we therefore join with the daily journals in drawing public attention to the sudden outbreak of scarlet-fever in New York. Fifty deaths occurred from that cause alone in the city last week, and 644 cases were reported during the month of December last, against 296 in the previous December, and 199 in December of 1875. One preventive measure recommended by physicians is to have all rooms thoroughly ventilated by opening windows and doors at some time every day. The disease is intensified by people sitting during these cold days in close rooms. It is also stated that one of the most common modes of spreading contagion is by persons bearing bundles of soiled linen travelling in the cars. This practice is prohibited by law, and it is to be hoped the law in such cases will be rigorously enforced.

The thin end of the wedge is an old enemy of which it becomes us to be on our guard. We alluded recently to Sunday concerts in New York theatres, and expressed a fear as to whereunto it might lead. A report from Chicago adds force to our expression, for it states that there are now but two theatres in Chicago in which regular performances do not take place on Sunday. The custom began by first introducing Sunday concerts. Then followed Sunday-evening performances by travelling combinations sent out from New York, and now the regular home companies have taken it up. It will be sad indeed if the Parisian Sunday is introduced generally into American society. Christians of all denominations should band together in one strong army to resist the first attempts in the direction of the desecration of the Lord's day.

P's and Q's.—Certain English critics, prominent among whom was the London Times, took Mr. Gladstone severely to task because in his article on "Kin Beyond the Sea," in the North American Review, the word Queen was initialled with a small q, and the word President with a large P. It now appears that Mr. Gladstone should not be held responsible for this "tremendous blunder." Mr. Rice, the editor of the North American Review, has written to The Times that "a careless proof-reader is entirely responsible for this piece of purely typographical impropriety." Mr. Gladstone, he says, "had nothing whatever to do with it." Mr. Rice begs to assure The Times, if it "will pardon so obvious a jest," that he has taken measures to insure hereafter on the part of proof-readers "a more careful attention to their p's and their q's."

A confession of crime has been made at Norwich, Conn., so shameless and heartless as to give the criminal the unenviable notoriety of being the nearest approach yet known to the idea of consummate depravity. If the law should spare his life, such a man should be exhibited as a warning to every one how vile human nature is capable of becoming, and to what depths of infamy it is possible for a man to sink, who has not the restraining grace of God in his heart.

The confession was made on Friday, January 3d, in what is popularly known as the "Cobb murder case." The question involved is, How one Charles Cobb came to his death, and if, as was suspected, he died by poison, who were the guilty administrators? The evidence referred to was given by Wesley W. Bishop, a married man, and one suspected of participation in the crime under investigation. He deposed to having had a guilty love for Mrs. Cobb, and with having conspired with her to murder her husband. He acknowledged to having supplied her with poison for the purpose, in large quantities at intervals from December 31st, 1877, to June 4th, two days before the victim died. During that period repeated attempts, he says, were made to "finish the man," but failed.

Bishop stated Mrs. Cobb had told him "the first arsenic she gave her husband she put in his coffee; it had no apparent effect; she said she would give him more; every two or three days she gave it to him, and sometimes three times daily. She once said to me, 'Charles must be poison proof, but I think I can get enough down him by and by to get an effect.'" He said, "I bought more arsenic for her about the first of May; I think Charles Cobb took the whole of that; toward the last of May she told me she was getting out of arsenic, and I bought her some more; I got strychnine twice, and then I got more arsenic; on the night of June 4th I got strychnine, and Charles H. Cobb, Jr., died on the 6th, at noon." The naïve confession reveals a crime which, if it appeared on the pages of fiction, would be denounced as a gross exaggeration, and which would, if told anywhere, be incredible from its very heartlessness, were it told by any other lips than those of the perpetrator himself.

"Exhibitions not entertaining," was the phrase wherewith the Justice of a New York police court characterized certain cases brought before him the other morning. Our readers will think a stronger expression might have been used when they are told that the cases alluded to were of over fifty women, representing almost every class of society in the city, charged with drunkenness and disorderly conduct. Truly this reveals a state of things calling for earnest and untiring work in the cause of temperance.

The Fruits of Bible-Burning.—Many years ago, in Clinton County, N. Y., a French Roman Catholic priest from Canada instigated a mob and burned a quantity of Bibles and Testaments in the French language, which had been sent into that county to supply the destitute among this class of our population. At the anniversary of the Clinton County Bible Society, held in Plattsburgh on September 24th, the agent of that Society reported that he had recently visited the place where the Bible had been burned, and found, on either side of the Catholic Church, French families, who requested him to rank them as Protestants, as they no longer had anything to do with the Catholic Church. The church itself has no longer a priest, nor even occasional services.

A Converted Romanist thus related his experience at the Bowery meeting, New York: "I was brought up a strict Catholic, and found it easy work to pray to the Virgin Mary and the saints in my times of trouble Every thing seemed to be going smoothly until, one day, I heard two men, entire strangers to me, talking about the death of an acquaintance. Their remarks led me to think very seriously about the eternal world, and to ask myself the question, 'Where am I to spend eternity?' The question became an all-absorbing one, and I could not get rid of it. In God's great mercy the light of His truth dawned upon me, and I saw the one only way of peace through simple faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Then I saw the uselessness of the superstitious mummeries of the Romish Church, that I had thought so much of before, and united with a church where Christ is preached as an all-sufficient Saviour, who can so fully meet all our need that no appeal has to be made to any other for help."

Thankful for small mercies may be the maxim of a Methodist brother who was lately solicited by a collector for subscriptions to the missionary work. He said:

"I have not made a cent this year." "I know it," was the reply, "but I came to ask, knowing that you had not broke, while many who were much better off than you or I have gone under." "That is so!" said the brother, and he cheerfully made a subscription.

Equality at the Lord's Supper.—It is related of the Duke of Wellington, that once when he remained to take the sacrament at his parish church a very poor old man went up the opposite aisle, and, reaching the communion table, knelt down close by the side of the duke. Some one came and touched him, whispering to him to move aside till the duke had partaken. But the great hero saw the motion, and, taking the old man's hand in his, said reverently, but distinctly, "Do not move; we are all equal here."

CHRIST'S MANIFESTATION TO MARY MAGDALENE.

A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to My Father: but go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God."—John 20: 17.

I. Encouraging Fact that the Risen Saviour first Appeared to Mary—The Greatest Sinners may have the Greatest Honor—II. Reasons for the Prohibition, "Touch Me not"—Active Work for Mary to do—III. Lessons from this Incident—1. The higher Christ's Dignity, the lower His Condescension, even to increasingly Unfaithful Disciples—2. The Sweetest Promises are for the most erring—3. The fuller Christ's Communications the more our Need of Faith—4. Our Union with Christ.

THIS was the first appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ after His resurrection. In sundry places and at divers times during the ensuing forty days He appeared to the different disciples, showed Himself openly to them when they were assembled for worship, and at other times; but this was the first occasion of His being seen by any of His followers.

The whole occurrence is very full of comfort, and we, who are poor weary pilgrims through this wilderness, need some words of comfort every now and then to cheer us on our way. May the Holy Spirit sweetly assist us in addressing you now on the things of Christ, and may your hearts burn within you by the way!

I. First, IT IS PECULIARLY ENCOURAGING TO REMEMBER THAT THE FIRST PERSON TO WHOM JESUS CHRIST APPEARED AFTER HIS RESURRECTION WAS MARY MAGDALENE. Romanists will have it that Jesus Christ first of all appeared to the Virgin Mary, His mother, and they have invented some curious stories in order to give her this peculiar honor. Now this shows that in their opinion there was a peculiar honor conferred upon the person who first beheld the risen Saviour.

But Mary Magdalene was the first of the disciples who had the honor of seeing the Saviour after His resurrection, for the guards, who may have seen Him when they fled away, were not His disciples. It was a woman, then, that first saw the risen Saviour. It was a woman that was first in the transgression, and a woman must be the first to behold Jesus Christ when He rose from the dead.

If there be some degree of opprobrium connected with womanhood, because Eve first of all touched the fruit, there is a far greater degree of glory now connected with it, because Mary Magdalene first of all beheld the Saviour at the tomb. Not only was it a woman, but

IT WAS A SINNER.

A woman out of whom had been cast seven devils. She had been a sinner once, and then she became a demoniac, and afterwards became a saint. How strange it was that Jesus should appear to her! What, give the most honor to her who had the most of sin! Sweet thought! Then if "I the chief of sinners am," if I have an interest in the blood of Christ, there is no reason why I should not climb to the greatest heights of fellowship, and enjoy the best of the good things which the Lord has prepared for them that love Him.

When Jesus takes a sinner to Himself, His pardon is so complete—so totally does He overlook all previous sin—that that chief of sinners, although he may not be as great a saint as the very chief of the apostles, who formerly did most grievously rebel, may yet be the most highly favored of the servants of the Lord, and may have revelations made to him above measure. Mary Magdalene should comfort you who, after years of sin, have lately found a Saviour. Oh think not that those years that you have spent in folly, though they must ever make you weep, will be the means of robbing you of fellowship with Christ! Oh no; He will restore to you the hours that the locusts have eaten, and He will not take away from you the pleasure of enjoying the bliss of God on earth, and certainly He will not diminish your glorious happiness when you shall stand before the throne.

Methinks, however, that Mary was selected to see Christ first because she loved Jesus most. John loved Jesus much, but Mary loved Him better; John went away when he saw an empty sepulchre, but Mary stood without and wept. Love, you know, is a keen-eyed thing. They say love is blind. In one sense it is true; but there never were such good eyes as those which love can carry in its head. Love will look after Jesus, and discover Him where none else can. If I set the unloving heart to read a chapter, it finds no Jesus there; but if I set a Christian to read that same portion of Scripture, he finds in it the name of Jesus from beginning to end. If I set a critical scholar to read a Psalm, he sees no Messiah there; but if I set an enthusiastic lover of the Saviour to read it, he sees Him, if not in every verse, still here and there he sees glimpses of His glory.

IF YOU WANT TO SEE JESUS, and have sweet revelations of His glory, you must love Him; methinks you must add to that —you must seek Him diligently, seek Him in the darkness and the twilight, seek Him when the sun is risen, seek Him at the tomb before the stone is rolled away; you must seek Him when you behold that the stone is gone; you must seek Him in the hollow tomb; you must seek Him in the garden; you must seek Him in life; you must seek Him in death; and then, the more diligent you are in seeking, the more probability there is that Christ will manifest Himself to you, and you shall rejoice on finding Him.

Mary was one of those who went forth bearing precious seed; she went forth weeping, but she returned to the disciples rejoicing, bringing her sheaves with her, for she had a good message for them. She had sown in tears when she went to seek her Lord, but she wept with joy when she found Him in the garden. Happy was that woman who found Jesus and believed; truly she might rejoice in Him, for she was highly favored among women. You see, then, that there is much sweetness, more than I can tell you, in the thought that Mary Magdalene was the first person who was chosen to see the Lord Jesus Christ.

II. We will notice, secondly, SOME REASONS FOR THE PROHIBITION GIVEN IN THE TEXT.

Why was it that Jesus said,
"TOUCH ME NOT"?
And why was it that He gave this apparently strange reason.—"For I am not yet ascended to my Father?" There seems to me to be very great comfort in this. I know it has comforted me, if I understand it aright. When Mary Magdalene saw her Master, and had called Him Rabboni, her next impulse was to cast herself adoringly before Him, and embrace Him. But Jesus Christ said, "No; embrace Me not"—for that is the fuller meaning of the word—"I have got something for you to do. I cannot allow you to stop to do that. I must send you to My disciples with a message; therefore, cling not to Me. The strengthening of My disciples is preferable even to the embracing of your Lord. Cling not to Me: for I am not yet ascended."

It strikes me that Mary was half afraid that her Master would go directly; and she thought, "That is Him—I know His voice. But He will go; I know He will vanish; the Spirit of God will take Him away." She thought just as Obadiah did of Elijah, to whom he said, "Now thou sayest, Go, tell the king, Behold, Elijah is here, and it shall come to pass as soon as I am gone from thee that the Spirit of the Lord shall carry thee whither I know not."

So Mary thought, "Oh, He will be gone!" And she thought, "But I will hold Him fast. This may be my only opportunity." But He said, "I am not going; I shall be here a little time longer; there will be time enough for touching Me. The first thing I want you to do is to go to my disciples, and tell them that I am about to ascend to heaven."

If you ask, "Why should Jesus tell her that?" let me suppose some of you have said, "I will have an hour of contemplation; I will cast myself upon my knees; I will open the Word of God; I will seek the Spirit to rest upon me; and I will hope that I shall be able to see Jesus, and to embrace Him with the arms of faith."

Then at that very time perhaps you are called to attend a prayer-meeting, or to visit the sick, or to see some inquirer, or to do something for the Lord's cause, and you say, "There, now! I expected to have had that evening for contemplation! Oh! I wish I had not so much to do with Church matters; I see that it robs me of my quiet hours. I love those sweet seasons of retirement when I can touch the Saviour, and embrace Him to my heart. Why is it that I am to go out and feed the flock, and not find more time for fellowship and communion as long and frequently as I desire?"

Oh! when you think that, then imagine you hear your Master saying, "Embrace Me not, for
THERE IS TIME IN HEAVEN FOR THAT.
Go thou to My brethren, and tell them some sweet words of consolation; for while it is sweet for you to embrace Me, it is sweeter to Me for thee to go and embrace My poor brother, and show him the way to the kingdom." God forbid that we should not give enough time to the high joy of contemplation; it is a sweet thing. But sometimes work is as necessary as worship, or, rather, work is worship in its best form. Sometimes it is a better service to go to see the sick than to be at home on your knees.

Sometimes it is a more devout serving of God to be busy for the Church, even in what seem to be temporal matters, than to be seated at home, like Mary of old, at the feet of the Saviour, listening to His words, and doing nothing. I believe Martha is sometimes better than Mary. If Mary had always sat at the Saviour's feet, she would have deserved no commendation. It was well for Mary that she sat there then, for it was a proper occasion; but if she had sat there always, and left Martha to attend to the serving, then it would have been an abuse of her privilege. There are times when the Master must say, "Embrace Me not, but go to My brethren, and tell them that I ascend to My Father, and your Father; to My God and your God."

III. And now, having just noticed these incidents on the surface of our text, which I think after all are full of comfort—if not to you, they certainly have been to me—I will now endeavor to draw some lessons from this subject.

1. Jesus says, "Go and tell My brethren." Now, it is a remarkable fact that the higher Jesus Christ gets in glory, the more sweet are His expressions of love. You know when He was on earth He said, "Henceforth, I call you not servants, but friends." But He never called them "brethren" until after He had risen from the dead. "Friends" He called them when He was a suffering man; and I dare say some of them thought, "If He should rise from the dead He will be ashamed of us poor fishermen; He called us friends when He was in His poverty; will He not return to that word 'servants' when He rises in majesty from the tomb?" No; when we should have expected Christ to relax His love, when He had risen in dignity, it was just the reverse. The higher His dignity, the lower His condescension. "Go and tell My brethren."

And there is another thing about that sweet word "brethren." The disciples were never in a more sinful condition than they were at this very time; or rather they had never so grossly sinned as just before the Saviour's resurrection. Before the Saviour died, they were with Him every day; they were, all of them, in a measure, faithful, never forsook their Master, never denied Him that I hear of, till He came to die. And yet all the time they were true and faithful, He never called them any thing better than friends; He never called them "brethren."

You would have thought that when they ran away from Him, that when three of them slept in the garden during His agony, when all forsook Him and fled, and when Peter especially denied Him, the Saviour would have said, "No, I called you friends when you were faithful; I will now see whether I can stretch a point, even to call you servants." But we see the blacker their sin, the stronger His love. The more defiled they were, the more sweetly did He talk to them. He said to them in deeds, though not in words, "Henceforth I call you not friends, for a friend is no relation necessarily to his friend; but I call you brethren, for My Father is your Father."

Now carry those
away with you, for sweet they are if the Spirit leads you into them—that the higher the Saviour gets, the more free is He in the expression of His love, and that other thought, that the further the disciples ran away from their Master, the more lovingly did He call them back again. Marvellous and strange, but nevertheless true. Who cannot derive comfort from such a thought as this? Ye feeble followers of Jesus, if ye have sometimes thought that He loved His people when He was on earth, but that now, when He reigns exalted on high, He has forgotten such of them as you —oh! be assured, inasmuch as He has reached the summit of His glory, He doth now manifest the summit of His love. The more He is exalted the more doth He manifest Himself.

2. And I know again, you are saying that yo have so greatly sinned that you cannot expec Him to love you. Do again appropriate thi thought, that the sweetest promises in the Bib are for the very people that deserve them the leas There are promises for those who follow clos to their Saviour, and very sweet ones too; bu some of the tenderest promises in the Word God are for those who have wandered away th most. Take for instance that sweet word, "H will not quench the smoking flax nor break th bruised reed." A Christian is nothing bett than a smoking flax. It is very likely throu simple neglect that the believer does not bu brightly; and if he is a bruised reed the bruise the effect of some great backsliding.

There is sweet comfort in the promise, "I will not quench the smoking flax nor break t bruised reed." Blessed Jesus, when we shou have thought that our sins would cause Thee speak harshly, we find that Thou hast the soft words for those who have most erred; and th our sins that would seem to make Thee an seem to make Thee only to invite us back ag with sweeter words than to those who have erred so much as ourselves.

3. Now note here again—every time J Christ says any thing to His brethren, it is al something that requires faith on their part. W did He not say "Go and tell My brethren I risen?" Because they did not want any f for that. He was risen; that was a fact they could discover by their eyesight and s of them by their touch. "No," He said, "I will only make large drafts upon My peop faith. Go and tell them that I am abou ascend. Do not tell them I am risen; t will be nothing for their faith to lay hold o that. Tell them that I ascend; that is so thing for them to believe."

Now do you know this, Christian—the more thou hast of the manifest presence of Christ the more faith do you require. Have you not often asked to have a promise brought home to your heart by the special influences of the Spirit? Now recollect the more promises you have the more faith you will require. The words of Christ demand faith at our hands. A manifestation from Christ is as truly a demand upon our faith as when He hides His face from us. When He hides His face He requires us to believe, even when He says nothing; but when He speaks He requires us to believe something that He says.

The more manifestations, the more your need of faith. "I ascend unto My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God." Oh Luther was right when he said that all lay in the pronouns—"My Father and your Father." It is as if Christ said of the Father,

"He is 'My Father' by eternal generation. I was begotten of My Father from before all worlds. He is 'our Father' by regeneration. He hath begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of His Son from the dead. He is 'my Father,' as I am the Head of the Church,—man and God, Christ—I call Him Father in my Christhood, and I stand as your representative and say it; and inasmuch as you are all gathered up in Me, He is your Father too—My Father and your Father."

How sweet the word Father! He is your Father, because He has the deepest love to protect you; and if you doubt whether His power is equal to His love, hear what Jesus says,—"I am going to my God and to your God." And inasmuch as God is omnipotent, and the Father is love, you have all the love you want, and all the power equal to that love. It seems sweet to hear Christ calling His Father God. As He was a man, the Father was His God; as He was Christ, He calls the Father God over Him,—"My Father is greater than I," speaking as a man; God being greater than a Mediator. "As man, I worship Him as you worship Him; as man I look up to Him as My Father the same as you do. He is My Father, as He is your Father."

4. This leads us to make only one other remark—How beautifully the Saviour refers to the believer's union with Himself. The whole Bible, when it is rightly understood, points to union with Christ; and this sweet verse is just full of it. Christ and His people have united interests. When Christ calls God His Father, we may call God "our Father," too. In His property we have

A JOINT INTEREST;

He is heir of all things, and we are joint-heirs with Him. In relationship Christ and His people are united. His brethren are our brethren; His Father is our Father.

Even in service, as Christ was man, as He was the servant of God for our sakes, so the Master whom He served is the Master whom we serve, and we together take the same service upon ourselves, believing that we together shall have the same kingdom conferred upon us, and shall reign with Him,—"Tell My brethren that I ascend to My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God."

An old divine calls Mary Magdalene apostolorum apostola, that is, the greatest apostle of the apostles; for she was sent to be the apostle to the apostles. An apostle is one sent, and Mary Magdalene was sent to those whom afterwards Christ sent to the ends of the earth. So may a poor humble woman be an apostle to one who shall afterwards be a great divine. Let us hear what this great apostle says to us.

Once more, she does not tell us that Jesus Christ is about to ascend; she tells us that He has ascended; and whenever we draw around the table of our Lord, let us derive sweet influence from the fact that Jesus Christ has ascended. He has ascended—hence He has ascended as a Conqueror, leading captivity captive. Now he has ascended—it is as a Forerunner for us, entering within the veil. He has ascended—then He has ascended as one to make preparation,—"I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go away, I will come again to receive you to Myself."

He has gone as an Intercessor. There He sits and there he stands, forever interceding before the throne of God for us, His children, His friends, His brethren. Oh! that we may now put our unfeigned and constant trust in Him who died, putting equal trust in Him that rose again, making this our glory, both in His dying and in His rising, that He hath ascended up on high, and sitteth at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us!

Oh! that those who are dead in sin may be quickened by God, that they may know something of the preciousness of having a Father in heaven, the same Father that Jesus Christ had! Sinner, I pray the Lord to make thee believe in Jesus Christ; and if thou hast sinned with Mary Magdalene, may He help thee to believe with her, that thou mayest share in her sweet manifestations, and have a sweet message some day to tell the rest of the brethren!

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

A PROFESSOR TAUGHT BY A COBBLER.

SOME TIME since there resided in Paris a gentleman, highly distinguished in the literary world, whom we shall call Mons. T——. At the time to which this narrative refers he was professor of history in the University of Paris, and a journalist of wide-spread celebrity. Like many other reflecting unbelievers, he sat in the midst of so many cross-lights of the intellect, that he could see nothing distinctly in the spiritual world.

He was paying a visit at the château of a lady near Lyons, where he frequently met Pastor Fisch. One day, as he was walking in the grounds of the château, he met the pastor, who was reading the Scriptures. Stopping in his walk he remarked to the pastor: "I have had great admiration of your conduct as a Christian, and have long wished to know what are the principles that seem to produce such an effect on your life. I have greatly desired to become religious, as I heartily believe in the truth of Christianity, and have tried various systems of religion, with the result of becoming confirmed in a philosophic neutrality from which nothing can move me. Yet, if you have any book which states the doctrines you profess, and the principles by which you live, I should be glad to read it."

"I have," replied the pastor, "an admirable treatise written by one of the early converts to the Christian faith. It is the letter of the Apostle Paul to Christians at Rome."

"Nonsense!" said the professor; "I beg your pardon for the expression, but I have read it many times, and found it an unintelligible jargon."

"Well," said the pastor, "this is the only systematic, as well as authoritative, exposition of our faith; and if you really desire to understand it, I beg you read the Epistle again carefully."

A few days after they again met, and in answer to Pastor Fisch's inquiry if he had read Paul's Epistle to the Romans once more, Mons. T—— said: "I have, but to me it is perfect nonsense. I read the first chapter—it was unintelligible; the second was worse; and when I reached the third I threw away the book in disgust, as incomprehensible and full of contradictions. I once thought it might do very well for old women and peasants, but now I know that it is impossible for them to understand it; for I, who have been all my life engaged in intellectual pursuits, and who have been elevated to a professor's chair in the first university of Europe, can make nothing of it."

To this the pastor replied: "Human learning as well as human ignorance is opposed to a real spiritual understanding of the Scriptures—the former more positively than the latter—and in any case the Spirit of God must enlighten the understanding before any man can receive the word of life; this is what the Scriptures themselves teach, and I sometimes find that, under this teaching, the illiterate understand the Bible better than I do. I will give you positive proof of this if you will go with me to the workshop of the poorest and most unlettered of my flock—a poor cobbler in Lyons."

"A good joke, truly!" said the self-confident professor; "I shall be glad to see one of these wonderful ignoramuses, who understand the Epistle to the Romans. You may be sure I shall put him to the test most thoroughly." And accordingly the Christian pastor and the sceptic scholar set out on a visit to the poor cobbler's abode.

On introducing the scholar to the stall and its occupant, Pastor Fisch left them to confer together.

"Well, my friend," said Mons. T——, when they were left alone, "Pastor Fisch tells me you profess to know something of the Scriptures. We are alone here, and I will tell no one of what may pass, so just confess that you do not understand that book, for it stands to reason that if I, an educated man and a teacher in the university, can make nothing of it, still less can you, whom I perceive to be an illiterate man."

"Ah! sir, but I have something that you have not, with all your learning," said the cobbler. "And what is that, pray?" "The Holy Spirit," said the Christian solemnly; "and if you are ever brought to ask for light from Him, you too will understand the Scriptures."

He then told, in his own simple way, the story of God's dealings with his soul: how He had showed him that he was a ruined and helpless sinner; and how when he saw this he was led to see in Jesus a perfect Saviour, just such as he needed; and how, in looking to Jesus, he found all his sins washed away, received a new nature, and became a temple of the Holy Ghost, who taught him the things of God out of the Scriptures.

The great scholar remained all that morning in earnest conversation with his humble instructor. On entering the dining-room at the château at a late hour, he exclaimed to Pastor Fisch, with an emotion which he could not conceal, "I have had a lesson in theology to-day such as I never had before."

In truth the Lord had enlightened his understanding in the poor cobbler's stall, and from that hour the Scriptures became his study and delight. A complete change was effected in his mind and heart. The Spirit revealed to him Jesus, the Son of God, the Saviour of sinners, and he was a new man.

Sitting at the feet of Jesus, he ever after placed himself on the lowest form, willingly learning of the spiritual, whether among the high or the low. He became fellow-laborer with Pastor Fisch in the church at Paris, and was ever found unweariedly among the poor, the sick, and the dying, teaching the faith which he once scorned. Although he was regarded with contemptuous pity in circles where he was once distinguished and honored, he esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than all that he relinquished for Him.

A REFORMED RUM-DRINKER AND HIS FIVE PENNIES.

I AM ashamed to tell you I was an awful drunkard once. I'll tell you what turned me round. I was terribly dry one morning, and I wanted some rum. I handed my youngest boy, only six years old, some coppers and a jug, and told him to go and get me some rum. Willie didn't want to go; but I scolded him, and he started a few steps, and then stopped and said,

"Father, I wish you would give me a cent to buy a stick of candy."

I told him go along, and not bother me about a stick of candy. The little fellow began to cry, and stammered out,

"Father, you never gave me any money to buy candy. Tommy Jones (he was the rum-seller's boy) has candy every day, and he says I can't have any because my father is a drunkard."

I felt as though lightning had struck me. "Good heavens!" said I, "has it come to this? Have I been paying my money to support the rum-seller and his family in luxury, while my own little boy could not have a single cent for candy? Yes, I am a drunkard. But old Jones's children won't sneer at Willie or me any more."

I called my boy back, and took the jug and the money. Here are the pennies—five of them. I will keep them as long as I live, and when I die leave them as a secret legacy to my children. I have got six children and a good wife besides. Thank God I am saved, and my home is happy. I will do what I can to save others. That jug don't go to Jones's now, and my boy is as smart as his!

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

THE darkness of the horizon, the rising wind, and the heavy seas which began to dash against the Eglantine, were to Christian Hilliard's mind so many warnings to sacrifice every thing on board rather than risk a life. He was resolved that here, as in that perilous voyage of the Apostle Paul (Acts 27), the very tacklings of the ship should be thrown overboard, if that would reduce the danger.

Captain Thorpe had seen many storms, and not knowing what Christian now knew of the unsafe condition of the ship, was disposed to laugh at his wish as the result of a landsman's fears, and besides he feared Mr. Hilliard's anger when he should return and have to tell him that he had sacrificed his property, so he said:

"What! throw the whole cargo overboard for a bit of a gale! Excuse me, but you must be off your head, Mr. Christian! What would your father say if I were to go back and tell him I had pitched every thing overboard without real necessity?"

"There is real necessity! If the vessel sprang a leak in a storm, would she stand a better chance with or without a heavy cargo?"

"Without it, of course. But who says the Eglantine will spring a leak?"

"I say there is every fear of it. Why will you not believe me?" answered Christian, sharply. Little used as he was to opposition, coming at such a time, it irritated him almost beyond endurance. "I will exonerate you from all blame."

"Mr. Christian," said the captain, slowly, "if what you say is true, there has been a great and shameful wickedness committed."

They stood looking at each other in silence: the one with the darkness of a gathering suspicion on his face, and the gleam of a righteous anger in his eyes; the other overshadowed by the dull, heavy stupor of an unutterable grief and shame.

"I know it!" came the low answer, forced by an effort from the reluctant lips. "But what I say is true."

"And the Eglantine is unseaworrthy?"

"She is."

The captain burst into a fit of rage, bringing his clinched fist with a heavy blow on the rail. "And I persuaded the poor fellows to come to their death!" he exclaimed, fiercely. "I'd rather have chopped off my right hand than do such wicked work. What am I to say to them, sir?"

"Is there need to tell them what I have told you? They will obey your orders without knowing the why and wherefore. Would it be wise to tell them all?"

The captain pondered. "No, it would not be wise," he said. "It would dishearten them, and take away perhaps their only chance. Let them work on, hoping for the best. Tell me all you know, Mr. Christian; it may guide me somewhat."

He spoke gently, from his heart pitying the proud head bowed with a weight of dishonor far worse than death. At the same time, a suspicion that a hoax had been played upon Christian would force itself upon him; but as he listened to some extracts from the letter it faded away, leaving him convinced of the truth of the statement.

"Why didn't the writer of that letter, whoever he may be, give warning before? Why did he wait till the very last moment, and then tell you in that way? There has been foul work, Mr. Christian."

"Not on his part; he is honest enough. I fancy he knew nothing of the Eglantine's destination till he chanced to hear I was going with her. At any rate, it is too late now; we can only do our best for the men. I can trust you to lose sight of every thing but their safety, Captain Thorpe."

"I will do all I can, sir: no mortal man can say more than that."

"I have only one comfort," said Christian, with a ring of passionate feeling in his voice; "if they die, I am here to die with them."

"That's poor comfort," said the captain, grimly. "Most men would have felt it more comforting if they had stayed on shore. You are one of the right sort, Mr. Christian."

He turned away to give some orders to the men, and Cairns, who had been standing near, came and took his place.

"We are not going to have such a quiet voyage home as we had coming, Mr. Christian. Look at them clouds, and hark at the wind, sir! that means mischief. It'll be something more than a gale."

"What makes you think so?" asked Christian, with forced composure.

Cairns shook his head. "I know the signs, sir; this long calm hasn't been for nothing. I'm blessed if I can understand the winds! they're for all the world as if they had life in 'em, and knew what they were up to. Here they've been keeping quiet all this time, just to come down upon us with a swoop at last! Aggravating things they are!"

The sea was rising rapidly, and overhead the black clouds gathered in heavy piles. As midnight drew near the wind grew louder and more boisterous, coming in fitful gusts; and the sullen thunder muttered in the distance.

Coming up from the cabin, Christian found the crew busily engaged in lightening the vessel of her heavy cargo, and murmuring among themselves at the task.

"The skipper's clean gone off his head!" grumbled one of the men. "The cargo ain't nothing like so heavy as what we brought out, and yet he goes and flings it overboard!"

"You hold your tongue," said Cairns; "the skipper knows what he's about. You don't know any thing about these latitudes, and we do; this ain't a gale such as you get in the Channel, I can tell you."

The wind had increased in fury, and the waves were running mountains high, breaking into white foaming crests on every side. The heavens were of pitchy darkness, save when a vivid lightning flash darted through the masses of black cloud, illuminating for one moment the wild confusion above and below.

"I have done all I can, sir," said Captain Thorpe. "The men are lightening the ship, and all we can do now is to wait for results. She may weather it yet."

The morning dawned cold and gray, but still the storm raged fiercely. Toward noon the wind subsided, and Christian's hopes began to rise. Every thought of his heart was a prayer that the lives of these men might be saved. In the solitude of his cabin he wrestled hard with an almost overwhelming sense of helplessness and self-condemnation.

"I brought them into this death," he groaned. "O God! will the responsibility lie with me?" But even as he uttered these words they were answered. He saw himself standing before his father, and heard the question, "Is the Eglantine seaworthy?" And the reply rose up before him with torturing distinctness—"She is seaworthy." No; the responsibility did not lie with him.

Where the responsibility did lie was only too clear. Mr. Hilliard had sent these men to their death, as many other English merchants are doing to this day. The withering denunciations of Mr. Plimsoll and a few other devoted friends of the sailors have done but little to check the shameful practice. Day after day vessels well insured leave English ports, laden with precious lives, and are never heard of again. Homes are desolated, women are made widows, and children fatherless in order that these wealthy merchants may increase their accursed gains. What matters a wreck to them? They calculate that the vessel may return safely, and then a large profit results; and if it is lost, they are indemnified from loss by the insurance companies. And so, being safe themselves from pecuniary loss, they keep up their vile traffic in which men's lives count for nothing in the reckoning. The voice of these sailors' blood cries to heaven from every sea, and surely a day of reckoning will yet come.

Night again closed around the Eglantine and her crew, and still the winds were lulled; but at ten o'clock they suddenly burst upon the vessel from another quarter, splitting the foresail into fragments, and carrying it far away in the darkness. If the wind and waves had run riot before, they ran wilder riot now. Every moment the heavy cross seas swept over the deck, carrying every thing before them.

"Hold hard, sir! hold hard!" shouted the captain; "don't let go for your life."

Christian turned and saw a vast mountain of white crested water looming above them; and then down it came with a crash, and he lost consciousness.

When he came to himself, a strong arm was holding him firmly round the waist. "You were nearly done for then, Mr. Christian," said Cairns' familiar voice. "It's a good thing I was close behind you, sir, or you'd have stood no chance of seeing old England again. One of the boats is gone, worse luck!" It had been swinging by the iron davits close to them the minute before, but the mighty strength of the wave had snapped its holdings, and carried it far to leeward.

Then as if the wind were satisfied for a time, there was a lull, and the waters grew a little calmer. Cairns still stood close to Christian.

"We haven't seen the end yet," he said. "I feel a sort of care about you, Mr. Christian, because it was 'long of me you came. Won't you go down a bit, sir? You ain't used to this sort of thing, and maybe you'll want all your strength by and by."

"Ay, do," said the captain's voice close at hand; "I want a word with you, sir."

They went down and the captain shut the door. "Do you know that one of the boats is gone?" he asked. "That last wave snapped the davits as clean as a newly-cut carrot. I never saw such a thing in my life before. There is only one now, and that the small one."

"Well?" said Christian.

"Well, sir, just this. If what you tell me is true, the ship cannot hold out much longer, and will probably spring a leak. In that case the boats were our only chance, and now the biggest is gone. The litle one cannot hold us all."

Christian looked at him in dull, mute horror.

"Some must be left here to die," went on the captain.

"How many?"

"At least two, besides myself," he answered briefly.

"'Besides yourself!' Do you mean to stop?"

"Could I ask any one to stay instead? I can ask them to stop with me. Mr. Christian, as sure as we live God's vengeance will fall on him who sent the Eglantine out to meet her doom!"

"It will," said Christian, hoarsely. "God is just!"

"Sir, it is a foul, cold-blooded murder!"

"It is!" groaned Christian. "God help us!"

"Do not think I am blaming you, sir. You have acted the part of an honest man, and I honor you for it. Very few would have troubled themselves about a few poor sailors as you have done. I must go on deck now, but there is no knowing what may happen, and I may never see you again, so good-by, sir."

His rough voice trembled as he wrung Christian's hand, and his eye lingered upon the bronzed face, which he had in those few short weeks learned to love.

The wind was gradually falling, and the mountainous waves rolling less wildly round the vessel when he reached the deck. "She may weather it yet," he thought, with a gleam of hope springing up; but the next moment it was dashed out forever. There came a sudden cry in the darkness, piercing the tumult of the boisterous waves and filling every heart with dread:

"She has sprung a leak!"

HEAVENLY CITIZENSHIP.

A Sermon by Rev. W. M. Punshon, D.D.

"For our conversation is in heaven."—PHIL. 3 : 20.

The Apostle's Argument—I. The Source of this Heavenly Citizenship—Methods of Attaining Roman Citizenship—1. By Birth—2. By Manumission—3. By Redemption—This the only Source of Heavenly Citizenship—II. The Duties which this Citizenship Involves—1. Loyalty and Patriotism — Responsibility — 2. Obedience to Laws.

IN the chapter before us Paul has been warning the Philippians against the worthlessness of personal merit, and of ecclesiastical privilege, without Christ. He has been showing them the necessity for their growth in knowledge and attainment, which should be painstaking and continued. He has reminded them of their greater obligations to consistency, because of the prevalent ungodliness around ; and then he sums up and enforces the whole in the words of the text, with its glorious presentation of Christian heritage and hope—"For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself."

As if he had said : "We are Christians ; it doth not beseem us, therfore, to act as worldlings do. The world is their theatre—their treasure-house ; they look and live no higher ; but we of nobler birth and higher expectations, listeners to a holy calling, waiters for the fruition of a cherished hope—let us free ourselves as we ought to do from the trammels of a sensual bondage, mindful of our own rank and of our destiny ; let us beseem ourselves comely, for our conversation is in heaven." Brethren, the need for a warning like this, an exhortation like this, based upon the memory of such privilege, has not certainly ceased.

The world in which many of you mingle in six days' passionate toil, the ordinary cares of labor, made a very drudgery by the fierce competitions of the time, has yet, unhappily, a power on the seventh, when another lordship should take the possession of your soul ; and there are none of you, perhaps, that are so free from its influences of distraction or depression, that you are above the chance of taint, and above the need of warning. It cannot be amiss, therefore, for us to-day to remind you of your heavenly citizenship, that you may be grateful as you think upon its source, that you may be stimulated to discharge its duties, and that you may be comforted amid life's perils and sorrows by the thought of the immunities which it confers—"For our conversation is in heaven."

I. Whence, then, is the source of this heavenly citizenship? At the time these words were written the Roman Empire had attained the culmination of its power. By successive conquests its territorial possessions had been extended. Its arms were acknowledged and dreaded in all lands where its triumphant eagles flew. The long clamor of battle had been hushed in the time of Augustus. The arts and sciences flourished ; the warriors who had conquered Greece had captured not her sons only, but her art, her architecture, and her gods. The Emperor seemed to reign over a consolidated and prosperous Empire ; and through each subject province, or far-off Archipelago of Isles, the man who could say, "I am a Roman citizen," found in the utterance his surest talisman of safety, and his speediest redress from wrong.

1. The first and highest method of attaining the Roman citizenship was, of course, by birth. The sons and daughters of the family, when the parents were citizens, were free by hereditary transmission of privilege. So soon as they assumed the garb and entered upon the responsibilities of the man or the matron, they entered at once, as a right, and without effort or ceremony, upon the civic freedom. They were "free-born." I need hardly remind you that this is not the charter by whose high prescription men come to be citizens of heaven. The race to which we belong has, indeed, a glorious heraldry. Our forefathers were of royal birth ; and there are stray glances even upon the countenances which sin has marred most foully, which give us a shadow and a memory of the divine original ; but we have been long ago disinherited in anger.

Our first parents sold their birthright, and its estates have never been recovered, and we who, if that test of Eden had been borne, and the righteous entail transmitted, might have stood up in native strength, and heired the heavens by reason of our purity of blood, are now naturally homeless and poor, the children of trampled and unhappy slaves. We cannot say as the Jews did to Jesus, "We be Abraham's children, which were never in bondage to any man." Serfs in a thrall baser than of Egypt—banished ones in an exile more hopeless than of Babylon—we cry because of the disquietude of our spirits, and cease from the music of our former joy. We are by nature children of wrath, not heirs of unsearchable riches ; and if we anticipate this heavenly citizenship by virtue of our birth, we do but mock ourselves as with a cruel dream ; to be dispersed like other dreams by the cold awakening light of morning.

2. And then the second way in which the citizens came into possession of their citizenship was by manumission. After faithful servitude and as a reward for it, it was in the power of the master to confer by a public ceremony, in the presence of the officers of the state, the boon of freedom on the slave. The principle is recognized in the initiation by servitude into the corporations of modern times. I need not remind you, I suppose, that neither is this the method by which the sinner comes to be a citizen of heaven. It might have been achieved possibly under the first covenant, when the heart was biased, if at all, to godliness ; when the temptations were all from without, and no headstrong passion coerced the wavering will ; but the sin which closed Eden to humanity inflicted upon humanity a moral feebleness from which no human healer can recover it.

Personal righteousness, justification by works, acceptance by patient but unaided merit, the propitiation of deed, or of suffering—they have been the attempt, and they have been the failure of each successive age. From the time when Cain reared his altar, glossy with its fresh offering of fruits and flowers, and from the time when Jezebel fasted in the intervals of her cruelty, and from the time when the priests of Baal stained with their own blood the russet turf of Carmel, and from the time when the Pharisee swept scornfully into the temple, gathering from the contrite publican, as he passed him, the materials for his haughty prayer—from that time down to the present men having clung lingeringly to this same notion of personal merit, and have bribed themselves to believe that, in another sense than Scriptural, they could work out their own salvation.

But surely, brethren, they have had poor conceptions of the breadth of the commandment, and the very scantiest knowledge of their own deceitful hearts, who could thus vainly feel and teach. What ! man, with this taint of naked vileness, and with his feebleness of moral power—man living in a revolted province, pressed hard on every side by banded foes, his own nature in traitorous collusion with the enemy—man to resist bravely the aggressions of evil, and to earn by stern and strong will the citizenship of heaven ! The thing were hopeless—hopeless and impossible. Blot the sun out of the firmament ; tame the chainless wind ; put an interdict upon the laughing spring ; melt the old mountains by a glance ; draw a film of gossamer across the strand, and bid the raging surf respect it ; bind the sweet influences of Pleiades by a silken cord to an infant's finger ; but hope not, until the Ethiop change his skin, and the leopard his spots, that those who have been accustomed to do evil can charm themselves into holiness and heaven.

Were it possible to surround a man with every condition of advantage, and to seclude him from the contagion of vicious companionships, and to impress him with the sincerities of an earnest, heavenly desire, and then to leave him to himself, unaided, without the presence and agency of the Divine, there would be that within him—a native warp, an inborn dislocation of soul, that would thwart his upward efforts, and enslave him perpetually beneath a tyranny from which he panted to be free. And if you ask the holiest of your fellows, as he gasps in difficult life amid the struggles of the last enemy, to give you before he dies his testimony as to the foundation of his hope, his cheek will kindle with a glow, which will for the moment master his convulsions and make him insensible to pain, as he tells you, "It is not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to His mercy that He saved us, by the washing of regeneration and by the renewing of the Holy Ghost."

3. If, then, the source of this heavenly citizenship is not by birth, and if it is not by manumission, it can only be by redemption, purchased for us by One who loves us, who has paid the satisfying price, and who has exerted the needed power ; and this is the marvel of love, which has actually been wrought on our behalf. We were sinners and Christ died for us. There is the whole matter lying helplessly struggling against a might too strong for us, crying passionately and almost hopelessly for deliverance—Christ came by with His Gospel ; it was the power of God unto our salvation. We were sold under sin, prostrate and agonized in the shame and bitterness of our slavery ; Christ ransomed us by dying, and rose again to welcome us as the free. And there is nothing surely, brethren, which can possibly make the citizenship a more precious privilege, or invest it to the believer with a dearer charm. Let the worldling, if he pleases, erect himself in the haughtiest stature of his pride, and refuse to accept a blessing for which he is indebted to the merit of another. The Christian is thrilled with a very different and more grateful feeling. He sees the love of Jesus in the gifts which He confers, and therefore prizes them the more.

"We love Him because He first loved us." The citizenship was purchased for us by the Saviour Jesus, and the gift is all the dearer for the Giver's sake. We feel burdened by no oppressive sense of obligation when we take gifts from Him. We feel that it is right that He should give them, and it is right that we should take them without murmuring and without dependence. The all-conquering and all-trusting love receives gifts from the loved one just as matters of course ; and a Christian feels, as he takes the blessing from above, that it could not come from dearer, and that it would not come from other hands. The peace of the Christian is a sweeter peace than it would otherwise be, because Christ has conferred it. His hope kindles into a rarer brightness because he knows that Jesus has inspired it, and even as he thinks of the landscapes and the fountains, and the melody in which human fancy may not unlawfully image forth the promised heaven, when he striks his harp, he sings not of these, but "These lively hopes we owe,

Lord, to Thy dying love;
Oh ! may we bless Thy grace below,
And feel Thy power above"

"For our conversation is in heaven."

II. I come, in the second place, to notice the duties which this citizenshipi nvolves. I remind you of your citizenship that you may be stimulated to the discharge of the duties which it involves. That this citizenship entails duties, is a consequence which each Christian heart of you will very cheerfully recognize, as indeed it follows from every principle of right.

1. Those whom the state protects, whom the state advances, owe to it loyalty and patriotism ; and if they fail in the discharge of their duty, they forfeit all claim upon their privilege. He has no true political or social teaching whose talk is frequent of rights and seldom of obligations.

To a well-balanced, right-thinking mind, the thought of responsibility will be co-ordinate with the thought of benefit, and the pulse of the commonwealth will beat, not in the palace or the senate only, but in every hamlet and every homestead of the land. It is a great error to suppose that a state is bound to grant privilege equally to all who dwell within its borders—a great error to suppose that the state is bound to grant privilege equally to the rebel and to the loyal ; to the traitorous, who breath, disloyalty to its government ; or to the selfish, who are alien from its interests ; as to the real-hearted, who have its weal at heart ; and to the volunteers, who arm for its defence. We meet with some, sometimes, big in words, but small in value ; fluent in the utterance of sedition, fertile in plots that only want a sort of dignity and livelihood to entitle them to be called conspiracies ; who claim still that the state they libel should succor them in their need ; and that the country which they traduce should furnish them with the wherewithal to propagate their slanders.

It would be well for them to remember that they are suffered just because they are despised, because in their efforts to be dangerous they only succeed in making themselves thoroughly and universally contemptible' and that the toleration that is given to their licentiousness of speech and deed is the best refutation of the allegations of their mischievous tongues. As in human politics, so it is in reference to the realm that is divine ; there are many of us, alas ! that would fain inherit the blessing, while we are indifferent to the obligation of the covenant which God, in His Son Christ Jesus, has made with the childern of men. The ministers of Christian citizenship follow upon the consistencies of Christian service ; "if ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land ;" and so deeply grateful is the heart of the believer, that he seeks for opportunities where his gratitude may be displayed, and is never so happy as when he wears the badge, ay, and publicly too, so that all men may read it—wears the badge and bears the yoke of Jesus, in a captivity, a willing bondage more blessed than anarch's maddest dream.

THE TWO STRONG ARMS.

A GREAT scholar in Germany, who was anxious to find the right way to heaven, but for all his learning could not succeed, went one day to church. On his way he met a poor old man, to whom he wished "Good-morning." The poor man thanked him, but added, he did not exactly remember ever having a bad one. "Well, then, I wish you much luck." "I thank you, sir ; but to tell the truth, I never yet have had bad luck." The scholar did not know what to make of the man, so he requested him to explain his meaning. "With pleasure," said the poor man. "I have never yet had a sorrowful morning ; for if I am hungry, I praise God ; if I am cold, I praise God ; if it rain or snow, thunder or lighten—let the weather be what it may, I praise God ; and am always joyful. And I have never had a bad week. I resign myself to my dear Lord and Saviour, and am sure He does nothing wrong. What He permits, whether sweet or sour, joy or grief, I know is all for the best, and accept it with thanks and joy. 'All things work together for good to them that love God.' "

The scholar was astonished at the faith of the poor man, and asked again what he would do if God should thrust him into hell at last. "Thrust me into hell ? that He will never do," answered the poor man ; "but if He should, I have two arms—the arm of faith and the arm of love—with them I would grasp Him, and hold Him so fast that He must go with me ; and where my Lord and my God is, there is my heaven."

THE BRAVE.

They are brave who dare to speak
For the fallen and the weak ;
They are brave who dare to be
In the right with two or three.

SEASONABLE COUNSELS.

An Oration by Mr. J. B. Gough,

Delivered at the Head-quarters of the Blue Ribbon Army, Hoxton Music Hall, London, on Saturday, Dec. 14.

Actual Experiences Wanted—Memorable Interview in Glasgow with an old Fellow-workman—A Bedridden Woman Grateful for the Use of Her Thumb—Mr. Gough's First Glass—The Drinker's Fancied Wealth—Dogs Eating up their Directions—A Little Afraid of Christmas—A Troy Tailor Ruined and Killed Through a Single Glass of Liquor—Do not ask People to Drink—Tragical Scene at Niagara Falls.

SOME few weks ago I told Mr. Noble that I would like to come to you, and wish you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year before I left, as I shall not be here at Christmas time. (Responses from the audience, "Same to you.") That is my desire—a strong desire I had ever since I came into this hall some months ago, for I gave you the first speech I gave in England on this visit, except the short speech at the garden party at Westminster on my reception,—and it was my desire to hear some of the experiences of the people in this district.

For it is the experience that we want, because in stating experience we know what we are talking about, and our words have power. A man may talk of the theory of a thing, as a physician can tell, I suppose very eloquently, how an amputation is performed, how he first makes an incision into the skin, and lays it back, and all this sort of thing,—how he takes off the leg and ties up the arteries : he can describe every movement very minutely, but he cannot describe how the man felt when the saw touched the marrow. It is only the man who has experienced it can begin to tell what the feeling is. Now we come to you with experience. Let me give you some of my own experience.

MEMORABLE INTERVIEW WITH A FALLEN FELLOW-WORKMAN IN GLASGOW.

My experience was brought before me, or the contrast was brought home to me, when I was in this country before. I had been speaking in the Glasgow City Hall to about 2500 people. I was the guest of one of the merchant princes of that city. I do not mention this to convey the idea that I was often the guest of merchant princes in that or any other city ; it was only once in a while, and this was the once in the while. There was a carriage waiting to take me to the residence of my host, with footmen in livery, a pair of horses, and silver-mounted harness—a tip-top turn out.

It was a drizzly, wretched night, and the gentleman said to me, "You had better get into the carriage, Mr. Gough, the ladies will be down directly." I got into the carriage, and many crowded round to shake hands with me, for it was my last speech but one previous to my departure for America, when a wretched, haggard, ragged, forlorn, miserable-looking creature came trembling and shuffling up to the side of the carriage. I saw his rags, I saw his naked shoulder, I saw his hair a little grayer than my own, matted and hanging over his face. He held out a shaking hand, and it was fearfully dirty, and he said, "Wi ye shake hands wi me ?"

I laid my hand in his, and as I closed my fingers over it he said, "Don't ye know me ?" "Is your name Aitken ?" "Yes." "Harry Aitken ?" "Yes." "Why you worked with me in a bookbinder's shop, Alexander Hutchinson's, of Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1842." "I did." "What is the matter with you ?" "I am desperate poor ;" and he looked like it. I gave him some money, and got some friend to ascertain what he was doing—picking up bits of bones and rags in the streets, and lodging in one of the horrible dens in that city.

As I sat there in that carriage, surrounded by wealth, and luxuries, and refinement, and beauty, with the ring of the audience in that hall, my hand aching with the grasp of friendship from hundreds, and when I saw that miserable wretch shivering, hungry, forlorn, starving, friendless, I remembered he was a better workman than I, his prospects brighter than mine, when he was my boon companion in the drink : there is he and here am I ; but what an awful gulf between us ! And yet there is what I might have been, shivering in the streets that wretched night, but for one little circumstance, the signing of the temperance pledge some fifteen years before.

A RHEUMATIC BEDRIDDEN WOMAN GRATEFUL FOR THE USE OF ONE THUMB.

Now I am constantly meeting day by day with these contrasts—what it is, what it might have been ; and that is why I have been so extremely interested to-night in hearing the experiences of these men. It is the same thing, the same leading into temptation, the same aptitude for drink. Why, I started in life when I was twelve years old. My father was an old soldier, and when he came back from his soldiering he lived in the little village of Sandgate.

We were very poor. Now I have said before, and I say here, poverty is no degradation. It is nothing wrong to be poor. If it was, there would be a great many sinners in London tonight. Poverty is an affliction or an infliction, take it as you will. But there are those who are poor who are far happier than those who are rich.

You come with me up that stairway ; it is broken and filthy. But go up to the top of the house, and knock at the door. A feeble voice bids you enter. There you see on the bed a woman who has lain for twenty-eight years racked, and crippled, and cramped with rheumatism. She is suffering day and night. For twelve years she has never looked out of the window. She lies there a constant sufferer. Now hear her tale.

She says she is thankful. Thankful? Oh yes ! she is very thankful. Thankful for what ? For the use of one thumb, because she has got an old fork fixed upon the end of that thumb, and with it she can turn over the leaves of her Bible as she lays there, and so she says, "I am thankful for that." Oh ! let the rich people who have so much money that they don't know what to do with it learn a lesson from that patient sufferer.

I heard the other day that Truman, Hanbury & Buxton are making so much money out of the drink they don't know what do to with it, and so they build churches. The Lord help the ministers who preach under such circumstances in churches built by the money obtained from brewers.

MR. GOUGH'S FIRST GLASS.

But to come back again. I said poverty was no degradation—there is no degradation in poverty. I started life when I was twelve years old, and went to America. I went with a family that promised to take care of me. I was a pure-hearted boy, full of life, and full of elasticity. When I grew to be a young man I was a famous singer, and used to tell stories. Well, I used to stand upon a table and imitate people, for I had that gift, that faculty ; and when a man has it, it may be an exceedingly valuable, but it is an exceedingly dangerous qualification for a man to possess.

I will not give you my life at length ; but I went into the city of New York. There I was alone in that large city, full of temptation, full of wickedness. I remember very well the first glass of liquor I drank. It was in the social circle, and I remember, just as well as if it were yesterday, the young lady that asked me to have a glass of wine. I went there to sing—went there to practise sacred music, for they wanted me to sing in the choir. We sang hymns, and the wine and the biscuits were passed round.

I remember that first glass just as well as I remember what happened yesterday ; and as one of those men said to-night, I had then no intention of becoming a drunkard—certainly not; that never entered into my calculation. I drank as young men now drink, thinking it was jolly and manly, and because I thought it did a great deal of good, when at the same time it was laying the foundation of that which was to me years of misery, years of suffering, and years of retchedness. How we who have experienced can come to others and tell them of the re-lt of our experience and suffering!

THE DRINKER'S FANCIED WEALTH.

Young men, I say to you, I ask you what bene-t did you ever derive from the drink? Has ever done you any good? Oh! I know very ell many persons will tell us there is a gratifiation about it, a jollification about it, and all nat sort of thing. To be sure there is. No-ody knows that better than I do. A glass of quor working upon a man's brain and nervous ystem, if he is of a nervous temperament, will nake him jolly, and perhaps make him seem ery rich. "Oh! if you want to borrow a ouple of hundred pounds any time to help you n business, just call on me; I'll let you have it n your own note of hand."

Then you call in the morning and tell him ou would like to have a little money to help ou on in your business, and that he promised o let you have £200. He'll say, "Did I?" 'Yes." "Oh, well, I haven't got it now, but robably shall have it by twelve o'clock." Now hen a man drinks his brain becomes affected, nd it makes a very poor man feel rich. Rich! Have you never seen a man strut with his toes ut of his boots, and the sleeves out of the acket, and trousers shining with old age, his oat buttoned up close to make believe that he as a garment beneath of which he is entirely estitute,—have you never seen him strut about he street as big as you please while there is a ittle drink in him?—but when the recollection omes then comes the wretchedness and misery. Ah! how foolish it is for men to put that into their system that will take away their brains, as Shakespeare says.

DOGS EATING UP THEIR DIRECTIONS.

I remember reading a little incident that amused me very much some years ago, of a couple of dogs that were being taken by rail. They were given into the charge of the guard, and put into the dog box. When they started they had a piece of parchment fixed to their collars, with their directions written upon it. On putting them out of the train a porter was leading them along, and some one said, "Where are those dogs going to?" "I don't know where the dogs are going to—nobody knows where the dogs are going to, and the dogs don't know themselves where they're going to. You see they came in by the rail; they started all right, but the silly creatures have been and eaten up their directions." While we laugh at the dogs who eat up their directions, what do we say of the men who will drink up their directions?

Now, then, if there is a sort of gratification in it, there is an awful degradation in it—a fearful degradation in it. But I want to speak to you more particularly, first for a few minutes in view of the temptations that are assailing some of our reformed men just about this time. A lady here on the platform said she was

A LITTLE AFRAID OF CHRISTMAS.

I would say to her, "Don't be afraid, my good lady; stand firm to the principle of total abstinence. And remember this, any man or woman who will offer you a glass of liquor who knows your pledge, offers you the grossest insult. It is a simple outrage. It is just as bad as calling you to your face a liar; and that is a thing no man or woman should stand in Great Britain. And I would say to any here who intend going into festivities, and who will drink themselves, Drink, if you will, but don't you offer it to others. "Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones, it were better for him that a millstone were hung about his neck, and he cast into the depths of the sea." That is not my word—it is the word of One greater than I.

And I tell you, men and women, before you dare to put a stumbling-block in the way of one of those who are trying to rise above the appetite, remember God is the judge, and in His hands must we leave it. It may seem but a little thing, a small affair, to give a man a glass of liquor, but what is the result from a single glass of liquor sometimes?

A TROY TAILOR RUINED AND KILLED THROUGH A SINGLE GLASS OF LIQUOR.

Let me give you just one fact. In the town of Troy, New York State, was a tailor with his wife and four children: he was a native of Pittsfield, but he moved from there because he was not getting along in business very well, and he thought he might do a better business in Troy. His wife died in Troy, and he made up his mind to go back to Pittsfield. He had been a sad drunkard, but signed the pledge, and during the few years that he remained in Troy he had accumulated a little money, and was worth, perhaps, £1000.

He sold out his business and got £150 for it. Then he put his four little children in the care of a neighbor and went to Pittsfield, to look out a new home in his native place. He arrived there one evening; it was a festive occasion, and put up at a hotel. A gentleman who saw the whole transaction said, "I never was more moved in my life, but I could not interfere, for I did not know the man." They were having what they call "a hop," and he was looking in at the door, when some of the young men saw him and caught hold of him. "Ah! how do you do? Why, I haven't seen you for a long time. Won't you take something to drink?—something in remembrance of old times, you know?"

This gentleman told that he never in his life saw a man so badgered, and so worried, and so irritated by these men. They got him by the collar and pulled him about, and pestered him to have something to drink; but he steadily refused. At last he said, "Well, I'll take one glass just to satisfy you, and then I'll go to bed." He took that one glass; and many of you who have been in the habit of drinking, you who have been intemperate men, you who are reformed men, know what was the result.

For three weeks that man staggered round from public-house to public-house, squandering his money, and giving it away, and at the end of three weeks he had not a penny left of the whole £150. Then he awoke to the consciousness of his children. "My children are in Troy." He began to come to himself, but he had not a penny. He went down to the railway station and asked them to give him a passage on an engine. They refused. He tried to get on a freight train while the train was in motion, the wheels went diagonally across his chest and crushed out all the life in him.

The gentleman said to me it was the most awful funeral he ever saw in his life. That man was buried by the parish, and four little orphan children stood by the side of the grave, to be taken away to the poorhouse.

DO NOT ASK PEOPLE TO DRINK.

All through one glass! Oh! it is nothing to give a man a glass; only one, that is all. You know not where the result of that one glass may end. And so I say to you, if there are any here attending what is called a festive occasion at Christmas or any other time, or giving wine to your friends, be careful you give not to those who are trying to reform, for it is a fearful thing to lay any burden upon another, or to put a stumbling-block in the way of your brother.

With regard to my own experience, men may say to me, "Well, and would you be afraid to drink a glass of liquor to-night?" That has nothing to do with it, whether I'd be afraid or not. I would not do it; that is all. But they say sometimes, "Ah, you're afraid!" Every man ought to be afraid to do what is wrong, and for me to drink a glass of liquor would be a sin. I do not say it would be for you. I judge no man; but for me to drink a glass of liquor to-night would be a sin, with my principle, and with my pledge, and with my views and experience with regard to it.

When you tempt a man to drink, I do not suppose you intend to do him any particular harm. When the mother gives a glass of ale to her child, or a glass of wine, or a little sup of gin, she does not intend to harm it. She loves that child. It is natural for a mother to love her child. What will not a mother do to save that child from suffering, to save it from pain? She will do any thing, make any sacrifice, will not she? But certainly, when she gives a glass of ale, or a little drop of spirit, or a sip of wine, she never intends to do the child any mischief. Certainly not. But what is she doing? She is giving the child that which by no possibility can do the child any good, and which may do that child much harm, like

THE FOOLHARDY ACT THAT OCCURRED AT NIAGARA FALLS.

There is one part of the river, within, perhaps, 100 feet of the great Niagara Fall, where you can lie on your face and touch the water with your finger; and many persons were in the habit of doing that because there was something a little risky about it—to put your hands into the water within a few yards of the cataract, covered with the spray that came up from that awful depth. And the people who had charge of it had established some precaution—they had made a little slip noose that a person could put round his ankle, and that was fastened to sticks driven in the earth.

Thus people could dabble in the water without any danger, because there was a tendency for persons to be drawn in with the rush of water just before it went over the Falls. Well, there was a party there, among them a young student named Addleton, and a very beautiful child, a sweet little creature. While they were at the Falls the young student began to play with the water without taking the precaution, and his friend called out, "Don't do that; there is a risk." "Oh! there's no risk; it only wants a little nerve; it's all very well for women and children to be afraid, but it only wants a little nerve."

Presently he leant over a little further, and took off his cap, and shouted, "It only wants a little nerve; there is no absclute danger." Catching hold of the child, he said, "Look here, my dear; I will hold you where no child has ever been held before;" and, seeing no danger at all, he held her right over the rapids. He might have held her there for a hour, for he was a strong man and had a firm grip on both sides of the waist of that child; but she was a nervous little creature; she saw the water and got frightened, gave a sudden cry and a twist, and he dropped her.

Over she went and he after her, and the last words were, "God have mercy upon us," as he went over, and not a thread of his clothing or a trace of the bodies of either of them was ever discovered.

Now, I say, you may give that child the drink and it may be in safety, but when you give that boy a glass of beer you are HOLDING HIM OVER THE RAPIDS.

You may hold him there safe. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred men may hold their children there safe, but in the hundredth there may be a power, an influence, that you have no control over; and if that boy goes over to destruction are your skirts clear of his blood? That is a question you must ask of God; ask yourself that question, and you cannot get away from it by saying,

"AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER?"

Riding on an Ass.—It is related of the Reverend Rowland Hill that he once disposed of a censorious critic in the following fashion: It happened that Mr. Hill, who was in comfortable circumstances, rode in a brougham. For this conduct he received an anonymous letter rebuking him as a lover of ease and display, and commending to him as a pattern his great Master, who went about doing good, but only on one occasion condescending to assume any sort of state, when He entered Jerusalem, riding upon an ass. Rowland Hill read this epistle from the pulpit on the following Sunday, and then observed that there was really a great deal of truth in the remarks, and that if his anonymous correspondent would come to the vestry next Sunday with a saddle and bridle he would be most happy to ride him home after service.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Commercial distress in England is commented upon by the London Times in its issue of December 31st. The number of insolvencies in that country in 1878 is set down at not less than 5000 greater than that of last year. The artisan population is in a miserable condition, many thousands being in actual want or unpleasantly near to it, and the distress particularly affects what is designated as the "lower middle class." Of course, labor complications continue to be numerous, intricate, and troublesome. The mechanical societies are preparing to resist any experiment of increasing the hours of labor. The newspapers discuss many schemes for the bettering of business, and assign various causes for the present depression; but meanwhile trade and production are in a highly embarrassed condition, with no bright prospect of improvement.

The Czar of Russia has, it is stated, finally refused to interfere in behalf of the Ameer of Afghanistan. The New York Herald announces that one of its correspondents has travelled to the camp of the Russian General Kaufman at Tashkend, Turkestan, and was present when the Czar's answer was given to the emissaries of the Ameer.

He writes: "It was impossible for the emissaries wholly to conceal their disappointment, suppress its outward manifestation how they would. They and their suite, immediately upon withdrawing from the Russian commander's presence, left the city of Tashkend. On the 15th of January they will rejoin Shere Ali, the Ameer, at Mazar-i-Sharif, in the north of Afghanistan, some four hundred and fifty miles south by west of Tashkend." He will, no doubt, also feel greatly disappointed at the decision of Russia, and will be sadly conscious of the soundness of the Psalmist's advice: "Put not your trust in princes" (Psalm 146 : 3).

Russia is probably also disappointed that she does not see her way to effectual interference, for such undertakings have usually ended profitably for her in the past. Had not the Afghan ruler collapsed so suddenly, something might have been done; but as it is, Russia feels it her duty to leave him to his enemies. On the whole, probably, the Ameer will fare quite as well at the hands of his enemies, the English, as he would at the hands of his friends the Russians, had they protected him. In the past, it has usually gone badly with the weak nations Russia has "protected."

A strike among the English ironworkers is apprehended. The employers propose increasing the number of hours which constitute a week's work to fifty-seven and a half hours, which was formerly the custom in the trade. This proposal the workmen are resolved to resist, and if it is persisted in, will probably issue in a strike. The trades-union to which the men belong—that of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers—is the wealthiest in the United Kingdom, and the fund in reserve for an emergency like the present is said to amount to $1,250,000. If this estimate be correct, as it probably is, it shows that the men must have had "good times" pretty recently, and it should be seriously considered by their leaders whether, in view of the deplorable state of English trade, it would not be better to concede a little to the demand of the employers than expend their funds in a protracted contest with them; especially as the proposal is not to diminish wages, except as reckoned by the hour rate.

Mr. Spurgeon's Twin Sons.—On Sunday, December 15th, the two sons of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon were both preaching in London—the Rev. Charles Spurgeon at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, who appears the more eloquent of the two, at the Highbury Hill Chapel, formerly the scene of the labors of the Rev. Dr. Culross, to local congregations. It may be remembered that, on the occasion of his son Thomas delivering an address at the Tabernacle in 1875, Mr. Spurgeon in writing of it said that he proved by his cool, clear delivery, and lively, warm-hearted manner, that he would worthily sustain the family name. Those who have heard Mr. Thomas Spurgeon will be most heartily of the same opinion. The quality of his voice resembles his father's, and it is evident that without effort his clear, deep, resonant tones can make themselves heard in a large building.

His evening text was Jeremiah 3 : 22, 23, "Return, ye backsliding children." He divided his sermon into three particulars—invitation, acceptation, obligation, and in connection with each of these points made many loving, earnest appeals to heart and conscience. He quoted appropriate verses of hymns and poetry. Many prayers will doubtless be offered that he may be a much-blessed winner of souls. We shall give a sermon and portrait of him and his brother soon.

The great iron-clad vessels of the European navies are formidable engines of destruction, which in naval warfare would be no mean adversaries to encounter. Even in times of peace their destructive powers unfortunately do not remain idle. A terrible disaster occurred on board the Thunderer, one of the largest of the English iron-clads, on Thursday, January 2d. In firing one of the 38-ton guns with which the ship is armed, it exploded, blowing the muzzle into the sea, and disabling the turret in which it was fixed. Ten men were killed and thirty-three badly wounded by the explosion. This vessel has been peculiarly unfortunate, for on her trial trip in July, 1876, one of her boilers burst, doing still greater damage than resulted from the recent accident. The total loss of the Vanguard in 1875, and the German iron-clad, Grosser Kurfurst last year, prove that these costly vessels are a source of peril to their possessors as well as to their foes.

Bigotry in religious matters is said to be displayed by an Englishman so highly placed as the Marquis of Salisbury, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. A visitor to Hatfield, where his lordship resides, thus describes the condition of Methodists in that locality: "There was only room for a few short forms, on which about half the congregation found seats. The atmosphere was almost insufferable, and the outer air, at the close of a service of an hour long, was quite a boon. At night the crush was worse, and a considerable time was spent in enabling the congregation so to adjust themselves as to give accommodation to the greatest number. When they were seated it was a matter for wonder how the people would get up, and when they were up, it was equally a riddle to see how they were to sit down again. The heat was intense. Perspiration was running down the faces of all present." The writer adds: "Naturally I put the question, 'Why don't you get a larger place?' The reply was: 'We often get the room filled like that, and if we had room we could get some 300. But we can't go anywhere, nor get a bit of land. Every thing here belongs to the Marquis. Some time back we thought of having the service in a work-room—there's one just across, that would accommodate 300 or 400 people—but the steward found it out, and now no one on the estate is allowed to let any building for a religious service.'" Lord Salisbury is by no means the only English nobleman of whom a similar complaint is made.

Constitutional ministers often seem to the statesmen of a despotic or semi-despotic government to be like "reeds shaken by the wind." The great power called Public Opinion is a power of which they are cognizant, but of which they are unable to estimate the force. The ease with which they are able to force unpopular measures on the countries they rule renders them incapable of justly estimating the difficulties of a minister in a country possessing a free constitution. Prince Bismarck's is a case in point. Speaking recently of English ministers, he is reported to have said: "Whenever I come to close quarters with the English Government and feel its pulse the more I am struck with its complete want of systematic and consistent ideas. They waver, and you find that there has been an election or a meeting or a newspaper articl which has thrown them into a panic. It is jus the same whether Lord Beaconsfield or Mr Gladstone is Minister. No Turkish Pachas ar more afraid of the Sultan than are these Englisl Grand Viziers of public opinion, and, unfortunately, this Sultan is not less capricious or les uninformed than the other. Some one havin observed that Lord Beaconsfield was a grea party leader, and that Mr. Gladstone was a grea financier, the Prince added: "If Lord Beaconsfield really deserves that reputation he must lea his party much better than he does his countr and if Mr. Gladstone's finance is so admirable must be conducted upon very different principl from those of his foreign policy."

Prince Bismarck may deride the statesmen free countries like England and the Unite States, and we know that every form of gover ment has its imperfections; but we have yet meet with an enlightened citizen of either la who would prefer living under a governme such as Germany is blessed with.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Illness continue The following letter from him was read at t Tabernacle by Mr. C. Spurgeon, on Decemb 15th: "I am very ill or I would be in my plac I am ready to weep at being still away. T the people that night and day I am full of pai These three Sundays I have hoped to be wi them and failed, but they will be all assured th it will be my highest joy to be back among the to see their loving faces and to speak to them t good word. I am an exiled prisoner, and t iron enters into my soul; but the Lord is Go and in His name do I hope."

Russians and the Bible.—There is no coun in the world where the people are so ready receive the Word of God as in Russia. In provinces, if a pedler goes to sell books, th which are not religious are not often boug whereas any thing of a religious character greatly valued. Last winter in St. Petersbur boy heard a New Testament read by an istv chik who had just received it. When the istv chik went to bed, the boy began to read it at at night, and read on without stopping till ei the next morning. If you give your sled driver a few tracts he is as grateful as if gave him extra fare, and often if he meets again he will tell you that he has sent them his family in the country.

A Miller's Wife and Auricular Confessio The Rev. Canon Ryle, speaking at the Chu Conference at Derby, England, last month, t the following story: "Not long ago, wit fifteen miles of his own church, a certain cle man tried to introduce the detestable, abon ble, and truly mischievous thing, private con sion. Happily many of his parishioners w not to be caught with such chaff. ALICE MAUD MARY, second daughter of Victoria, Queen of England, was born on April 25th, 1843, and was consequently in her thirty-sixth year at the time of her death. The following reference to her birth, extracted from "The Life of the Prince Consort," possesses now a painful interest:

"On the 25th of April, 1843, another Princess was added to the Royal Family. The Queen wrote to her uncle, the King of the Belgians: "Our little baby is to be called Alice, an old English name, and the other names are to be Maud (another old English name, and the same as Matilda), and Mary, as she was born on Aunt Gloucester's birthday. The sponsors are to be the King of Hanover, Ernestus Primus (now the Duke of Coburg), poor Princess Sophia Matilda, and Feodore, and the christening to be on the 2d of June.' The King of Hanover arrived too late to be present at the ceremony. Nevertheless, as the Queen reports to her uncle (6th June), it went off very brilliantly. Nothing could be more anständig, and little Alice behaved extremely well."

of the Princess's life present few features of importance. At the date of the marriage of the Princess Royal she was only a girl of fifteen, but she had already developed qualities of mind and heart of no ordinary kind, and thus was able to fill up in some measure the vacancy created by the removal of her gifted elder sister to Berlin. Naturally, she was drawn nearer to her father, the lamented Prince Consort, and the influence of his pure and lofty character and pious teaching made its deep and lasting impression on her receptive nature. He looked upon her with a loving appreciation, and she, on her part, loved him with a devotion only tempered by a profound reverence for those great qualities which her subsequent experience enabled her accurately to measure. When in later years she spoke of the Prince all could see that, as an old writer said of Shakespeare, "She honored his memory, on this side idolatry, as much as any."

"The teaching of that beloved father was put to the proof," observes a writer in one of the newspapers, "in those sad days of patient watching which preceded his death. Things were told at the time of the devotion and the marvellous self-control of the young girl, called so sternly and so suddenly to face death in the person of a much-loved father." A few days after the Prince's death, she was spoken of in these noticeable words:

"Of the devotion and strength of mind shown by the Princess Alice all through these trying scenes it is impossible to speak too highly. Her Royal Highness has, indeed, felt that it was her place to be a comfort and a support to her mother in her affliction, and to her dutiful care we may perhaps owe it that the Queen has borne her loss with exemplary resignation, and a composure which under so sudden and terrible a bereavement could not have been anticipated."

The knowledge of this fact—and it was a fact—sank deeply into people's minds. It was never forgotten, and from that day the name of the Princess Alice has been a cherished household word to all her countrymen and countrywomen.

HER MARRIAGE

with Prince Louis, Grand Duke of Hesse, which had been postponed in consequence of the Prince Consort's death, took place at Osborne on the 1st of July, 1861, the ceremony being of a quiet and unostentatious character, the Queen attending it in deep mourning.

The fruit of this marriage, which was truly one of affection, was a somewhat large family, five daughters and two sons—Victoria Alberta Elizabeth Matilda Mary, born in 1863; Elizabeth Alexandrine Louise Alice, born in 1864; Irene Marie Louise Anna, born in 1866; Ernest Louis Charles Albert William, born in 1868; Frederick William Augustus Victor Leopold Louis, born in 1870; Victoria Alice Helena Louise Beatrice, born June 6th, 1872; Marie Victoria Feodore Leopoldine, born in 1874.

Meanwhile she had acquired a further title on the esteem and affection of her country by reason of the affectionate promptitude with which she left her German home when in 1871 the Prince of Wales was struck down by the same malady which killed his father, and the Royal Family was threatened with another great sorrow, and the English nation with what might have been a great political calamity. Again did the Princess Alice take her place by the side of the sufferer, nursing him with the same care as she had bestowed on her father. In that year the 14th of December was a day of much anxiety throughout Great Britain. That day had come to be associated in the minds of the people with a fatal connection for the reigning family. The Prince of Wales lay sick, and it had been said the crisis of his disease would be reached on that day. The nation, though not superstitious, regarded it as an ill omen. But it brought life, not death. It has come round once more, and this time it has taken away the illustrious lady who was the chief solace of her English home in the darkest hours of its sorrow, and whose latest days of health were passed in the relief of suffering.

In Germany the Princess, by her kindly interest in, and sympathy with, the people of the land of her adoption, soon won the same respect and love she had long enjoyed in the land of her birth. She never ceased, however, to take a lively and intelligent interest in England, and English affairs. More especially, any thing that concerned the working classes attracted her attention, and any effort of a philanthropic character, tending to an increase of their comforts, always won her hearty sympathy. How much of their misery, nay, of their evil ways, was due to their wretched habitations, she felt most keenly, and she gave her support to every effort for their improvement.

The experiments of Miss Octavia Hill in this direction had no warmer supporter. She made herself acquainted with the details of that lady's work, and translated into German two or three of her admirable papers, that appeared in Macmillan's Magazine some years ago, on "The Homes of the Poor," and published them, with a brief but pregnant preface of her own (to which only her initial A. was prefixed), commending to the attention of German philanthropists the methods which had been practised so successfully in London by Miss Hill and her followers.

Naturally full of spirit, and possessing a cheerful interest in the thousand topics which life offers to a young and ardent intelligence, those who observed the Princess Alice closely were conscious that her mind had a pensiveness somewhat akin to that of the Prince Consort in his later years, and not unnatural in one on whose mind and heart a severe strain had been so early put deepened this earnestness—for sadness it was not. Those long months of separation from her husband, who was in the very heart of the hard work and dangers of the campaign, would of themselves have told on her finely strung and sensitive nature.

But she was brought face to face with the ghastly horrors of maimed and suffering men, by which the honors of the greatest victories seem at times to be too dearly bought. In the crowded hospital for the wounded at Darmstadt no one was more active, more hopeful with kind thought and gentle hand, than the Princess Alice. To many a brave and suffering heart she brought solace beyond all that the skill of the most skilful surgeon could have wrought.

To herself, however, the memory of what had then to be endured from actual contemplation of the havoc wrought on the human frame by war, as well as by the thick-coming fancies of a loving heart, living in hourly apprehension for the life that was dearest to it, was ever afterwards a visible pain, despite the gratitude which she felt that that life had been spared, and that her father's dream of a united Germany hac been made a reality.

The first breach made by death in the rank of the Princess's family was under peculiarl painful circumstances. On the 29th of May 1873, Prince Frederick William, then a littl more than two years and a half old, fell from a open window in the palace at Darmstadt, an received such injuries that he died. The ne bereavement of Her Royal Highness was mo recent, and immediately preceded the sad eve which has startled the English people with painful shock.

The Princess, with her husband and childre spent some weeks in England in the last a tumn, the greater part of their time being pass at Eastbourne. They were in England on the of September, when the terrible catastrop occurred of the steamer bearing the name of H Royal Highness being run down in the Thame and the sympathetic message sent by the Pri cess to the London Steamboat Company, pressing a fervent hope that the loss of life w not so great as had been reported, is still fre in the memory of thousands.

Soon after returning to Darmstadt, the fi indications of the terrible malady (diphther were manifested, which carried off first t youngest child and now the mother. It was the 6th of November that the first outbre occurred, and on that day the Princess Victo in her sixteenth year, was attacked. Five d later her little sister, Princess Alice, was pla under medical care. She was immediately lowed by the Princess Marie, aged four; within the next three days the Princess Ire aged twelve, the Hereditary Grand Duke, a ten, and the Grand Duke himself, were suc sively prostrated.

All recovered except the Princess Marie. whose case from the beginning the disease assumed a most malignant form. She early on the morning of the 16th of Novem two days after the departure of the Marqui Lorne and Princess Louise for Canada.

HER DEATH.

The condition of the Grand Duchess became critical about December 10th, s which date the bulletins of her health came daily more and more alarming. Queen, whose own health now inspires ous anxiety, was very much affected by loss of the little Princess, who was on her chief favorites among her grandchil and upon the news of the critical conditio her daughter would have hastened to her side but that her medical adviser deemed it gerous to take such a step. She, however spatched to Darmstadt Sir William Jenner eminent physician, to whose skill the reco of the Prince of Wales in 1872 was attrib and thus procured for her dying daughter a alleviation possible under the circumsta On Friday morning the bulletins report slightly favorable change in her symptoms fever having somewhat abated, but it ret toward night; and by ten o'clock she be unconscious, her pulse ran up to one hu and forty and breathing ceased, and at an hour on Saturday, December 14th, she c and placidly passed away. She had express ardent wish to see her mother, to whom sh fondly and devotedly attached, but that co was, unfortunately, impracticable.

The direct cause of her seizure is a mo

: one, and touchingly reveals the tender ins of the maternal nature to which she in ng sacrificed her life. "The physicians permitted her to watch over her suffering y enjoined her under no circumstances ever to be tempted into an embrace. Her rable self-restraint guarded her through the of this terrible complaint in safety. She mbered and observed the injunctions of her cians. But it became her lot to break to on, quite a youth, the death of his youngest , to whom he was devotedly attached.
boy was so overcome with misery that the ted mother clasped him in her arms, and she received the kiss of death."

HER NATURAL ABILITY.

om her earliest years the Princess Alice was rkable for the quickness of her intellect and weetness of her disposition. Long ere she into maidenhood. it was noted that she ined in a very remarkable manner the mental acteristics of her illustrious father—a cir-stance which may possibly account for the ng bond of affection that always seemed to her to him. She was ever his favorite hter, and it is well known that he viewed no little pride the rapid development of her lties and her growing taste for intellectual artistic pursuits. Her education was to him bject of anxious thought and tender solici-
. He gave it his personal attention, and the fully justified the high estimate he had ed of her mental powers, and proved that care with which they had been trained was bestowed.

hen in her teens the Princess was one of most accomplished young ladies in Eng-
. Her mind was well stored, without being -burdened, with knowledge, and what she w she knew thoroughly. There was nothing sy or superficial about her acquirements,
, in conversation with persons of distinction, ning, and long experience of the world, she her part modestly and intelligently, demeanherself with becoming grace and great good se. Her virtues were her praise alike in Eng-d and the land of her adoption. She wore—

"The white flower of a blameless life."

her sweet character, her rare gifts, her self-otion to others, her exquisite womanly graces, eared to all who knew her. Foremost in ry philanthropic enterprise, and specially insted in every new method and detail in hos-l management, she was no less distinguished patroness of science and literature; and in stions of philosophy and theology she took deepest interest. She touched with quick, sitive sympathy many points of modern inectual and spiritual life, and illustrated that rit of practical piety which is confined to no and no country.

et strangely enough, although a lady of ong intellectual ability, and a thoughtful, dious temperament, the Princess was the most nesticated of all the queen's daughters. It med to be her ideal not to play a brilliant t in the world's history, but rather to live the love of those nearest and dearest to her.
sickness it was to her that her family almost tinctively turned for help.

During the long, weary days of watching at her her's bedside she was his chosen attendant, npanion, and confidant, and seemed to be en-wed with a preternatural calmness and fortile. Her father used to speak with her open-of his dying condition and of his desires for future, even when he did not deem it expe-nt to speak with the same certitude of imnding death to the Queen herself. Day by she sat at his bedside, nerving herself to k cheerful, and whenever the agitation of the ment proved too strong for her emotions she uld repress her tears until she could gain the ietude of her own apartments. All this time was her trying task to display her usual cheer-ness to her royal mother, to brothers and sis-s, and when all was over it fell to her lot to the chief stay and consolation to the widowed een.

In a word, the character of the lamented Princess was truly and without exaggeration summed up by the Earl of Beaconsfield, when he spoke of her as "one of the most noble-minded and gifted of women, and endeared to the people of England by her rich intelligence and life of perfect domestic bliss and duty." Nor must we omit to add that it is our joy to know that she possessed that pearl of great price—a saving faith in the Lord Jesus Christ—without which the noblest of earth's crowns lacks its brightest and only enduring splendor.

"We are enabled to state, on the authority of those who had the opportunity of conversing with the Princess Alice very recently, that whatever temptations might in former years have beguiled Her Royal Highness to admire the writings of Strauss, the author of the infidel 'Life of Christ,' a complete change had passed over her mind. At first the terrible calamity which deprived her of her little son seemed to have produced only 'the sorrow of the world, that worketh death.' But gradually it became, by God's mercy, the means of leading her to think, so that she finally came to seek and find peace in a firm faith in Jesus Christ revealed in the Scriptures of truth as the Saviour for sinners."

In the House of Lords, Earl Granville read part of a letter in which the Prince of Wales, in language of tender simplicity, writes of the death of his sister. The Earl concluded his address thus: "I trust that neither the writer of the letter I am about to read nor your lordships will think it indiscreet in me if, instead of trusting to my own language to express what your lordships feel of the loss which occurred on the 14th December to the royal families of England and Hesse-Darmstadt, I read a very few words extracted from a letter written on the very day of the sad tragedy of the Princess Alice's death, by her brother, who was so passionately attached to his sister, and who left England yesterday for the purpose of paying the last tribute of affection and regard to her beloved memory: 'So good, so kind, so clever. We had gone through so much together—my father's illness and then my own—and she has succumbed to the pernicious malady which laid low her husband and children, whom she nursed and watched with unceasing care and attention.' I will add nothing to this last tribute of respect."

The English Chancellor of the Exchequer, in moving an address of condolence to the Queen on December 17th, said: "I feel it would be superfluous on my part to speak of one so well known to us all, and so highly appreciated for the nobleness, tenderness, and true womanliness of her character. Apart altogether from her royal birth and her exalted station, Princess Alice had qualities to command love and admiration, whether we think of her as a daughter ministering at the dying bed of her father, as a sister exerting herself as a careful, affectionate, and skilful nurse to her brother when he lay almost at the point of death, as a tender mother who may be said to have sacrificed her life in her affectionate care of her own children, or whether we recall the time when she came forward to alleviate the sufferings of the sick and wounded of her adopted country, we recognize that combination of qualities—warmth of heart, soundness of judgment, and practical energy—which go to make up the type of a perfect woman."

The Rev. Canon Prothero, rector of Whippingham, and one of the Queen's chaplains, preached to a crowded congregation in Westminster Abbey on Sunday, December 15th. The Rev. Canon took his text from Malachi 3: 1, 2, and thus alluded to the death of the Princess:

"In the world vast is the crowd of mourners; but at this moment there is one whose grief is great and poignant, with whom the nation with one voice wishes to express its sympathy. After seventeen years of happy married life her child has closed her brilliant career of usefulness and charity, strangely and mysteriously, on the same day in which her noble father breathed his last amid the loving ministrations of his family, in which our late Princess then took a prominent part, and on the same day, too, in which her brother, then lying on the brink of the grave, was given back to his mother.

"Truly this Advent time has witnessed much sorrow in the house of our Queen—may it also bring to her widowed heart the truest and best consolations of the Christian's hope! But now in her new-born grief it must needs be a source of comfort to reflect on the useful, honored, spotless life just closed—a life which from early days (and having known her from her twelfth year the Rev. Canon could speak from personal knowledge) was devoted to ministrations to the sick, and which never ceased its efforts for the relief of suffering wherever it could be found.

"Even in childhood the poor and the sick ever found in her a true and sympathizing friend; but at her dying father's bedside her life may be said to have been consecrated to that high and blessed calling which reflects on all who walk in it, but perhaps especially on the great ones of the earth, so much honor and glory and enduring fame. In time of peace and equally amidst the distracting miseries of war, the great aim of her life was the improvement of hospitals, the alleviation of pain, and the comforting of the sick; whilst the condition of the habitations of the poor was ever a subject of her care and of her deepest interest.

"Not a hospital or asylum of this great city but has been visited and inspected by her, for the purpose of carrying back to her adopted home the latest aids to nursing, as well as the most modern contrivances for the advantageous treatment of the sick. Although engaged in good works outside her own home, that home was watched over in a true Christian spirit—the mother's heart was always bent on bringing up her children in the fear and nurture of the Lord. Her desire was that those who were born to greatness should be examples of good and virtuous life, and by their conduct should win and maintain the honors which they inherited.

"But whilst every duty of her life was performed with the eagerness and vigor which belonged to her character, fatal disease entered her home, seizing with its deadly grasp on every member of her loved family, and having taken one dear child, finally fell on her tired and weakened frame, and made an easy prey. In that devoted attendance on the sick of her own home that gallant life sacrificed itself under the call of duty and of love. To a life so womanly, so unselfish, so devoted, death could be but gain—for one who followed Christ death could have no terrors!"

The London Record says: "It was her noble aspiration not to lead a 'useless life.' The visitors and the residents at Eastbourne, where she was seen in the Sunday-schools and in the homes of the poor, will not soon forget the simple domestic happiness of her life in the midst of them last autumn. She and her husband often drove out in a carriage, with the sweet child who has since been gathered into the fold above. Of late at least it has been made known that, notwithstanding all the rationalistic influences to which she was exposed in Germany, Princess Alice had become a simple believer in the Lord Jesus, 'and was not ashamed' to confess Him.

"She was the patroness of the Home for Fallen Women at Brighton, which she visited. The work of that institution interested her deeply, as she was herself thinking of establishing one on a like model in Germany. It had become her desire, as those in every rank who had the privilege of personal intimacy with her could tell, to live and work for Christ.

"To our limited apprehension it may seem strange that such an influence should have been removed; that the sun of so sweet a life should have gone down while it was yet day. For the explanation of this and many similar occurrences we must be content to wait till the fulfilment of the Divine Word, 'What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.'"

MINISTERS AND THEIR SLANDERERS.

An Autobiographical Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached Sunday morning, January 12, 1879.

THERE are now in the world one thousand three hundred and seventy-seven millions of people, and consequently there are one thousand three hundred and seventy-seven million fields of usefulness. No individual can do the work of any one else. If a man neglects his work it is undone forever. "To every man his work."

You may not know that this is a double anniversary. It is nearly ten years since I became pastor of this church. Besides that, last Wednesday, January 7th, I was forty-seven years of age. This being a double anniversary, you will not be surprised if my sermon this morning is autobiographical. I started life in an old-fashioned Christian family, where they had prayers morning and night, and always asked a blessing at the table; and there was no exception to the rule, for, if my father was sick or away, my mother led, and while sometimes, when my father led, we found it hard to repress childish restlessness, there was something in the tones of my mother, and there was something in the tears which always choked her utterance before she got through with the prayer, that was irresistible.

The fact is that mothers get their hearts so wound around their children, that when they think of their future, and the trials and temptations to which they may be subjected, they cannot control their emotions as easily as men do. While he had a very sympathetic nature, I never saw my father cry but once, and that was when they put the lid over my mother. Her hair was white as the snow, and her face was very much wrinkled, for she had worked very hard for us all and had had many sicknesses and bereavements. I do not know how she appeared to the world, nor what artists may have thought of her features, but to us she was perfectly beautiful.

There were twelve of us children, but six of them are in heaven. I started for the legal profession with an admiration for it which has never cooled, for I cannot now walk along by a court-house, or hear an attorney address a jury, without having all my pulses accelerated and my enthusiasm aroused. I cannot express my admiration for a profession adorned with the names of Marshall, and Story, and Kent, and Rufus Choate, and John McLean.

But God converted my soul and put me into the ministry by a variety of circumstances, shutting me up to that glorious profession. And what a work it is! I thank God every day for the honor of being associated with what I consider the most elevated, educated, refined, and consecrated band of men on this planet—of America. I know, I think, about five thousand of them personally, and they are as near perfection as human nature ever gets to be. Some of them on starvation salaries, and with worn health and amid ten thousand disadvantages, trying to bring comfort and pardon to the race. I am proud to have my name on the roll with them, though my name may be at the very bottom of the roll, and am willing to be their servant for Jesus' sake. But we all have a work. "To every man his work."

I will not hide the fact that it has been the chief ambition of my ministry to apply a religion six thousand years old to the present day—a religion of four thousand years B.C. to 1869 and 1879 A.D. So I went to work to find the oldest religion I could see. I sought for it in my Bible, and I found it in the Garden of Eden, where the serpent's head is promised a bruising by the heel of Christ. I said, "That is the religion," and I went to work to see what kind of men that religion made, and I found Joshua, and Moses, and Paul, and John the Evangelist, and John Bunyan, and John Wesley, and John Summerfield, and others.

I said: "Ah! that is the religion I want to preach—the Edenic religion that bruises the serpent's head." That is what I have been trying to do. The serpent's head must be bruised. I hate him. I never see his head but I throw something at it. That is what I have been trying to do during these courses of sermons—to bruise the serpent's head, and every time I bruised him he hissed, and the harder I bruised him the harder he hissed. You never trod on a serpent but he hissed. But I trod on him with only one foot. Before I get through I shall tread on him with both feet.

If God will help me I shall bruise the oppression, and the fraud, and the impurity coiled up amid our great cities. Come now, God helping me, I declare a war of twenty-five years against iniquity and for Christ, if God will let me live so long. To this conflict I bring every muscle of my body, every faculty of my mind, every passion of my soul. Between here and my bed in Greenwood there shall not be an inch of retreat, of indifference, or of compromise. After I am dead, I ask of the world and of the church only one thing—not for a marble slab, not for a draped chair, not for a long funeral procession, not for a flattering ovation. A plain box in a plain wagon will be enough, if the elders of the church will stand here and say that I never compromised with evil, and always presented Christ to the people. Then let Father Pearson, if he be still alive, pronounce the benediction, and the mourners go home.

I do not forget that my style of preaching and my work in general have been sometimes severely criticised by some of

MY CLERICAL BRETHREN.

It has come to be understood that at installations and at dedications I shall be assailed. I have sometimes said to prominent men in my church, "Go down to such and such an installation, and hear them excoriate Talmage." And they go, and they are always gratified! I have heard that sometimes in Brooklyn, when an audience gets dull through lack of ventilation in the church, the pastor will look over toward Brooklyn Tabernacle and say something that will wake all the people up, and they will hunch each other and say, "That's Talmage!"

You see, there are some ministers who want me to do just the way they do; and, as I cannot see my duty in their direction, they sometimes call me all sorts of names. Some of them call me one thing, and some call me another thing; but I think the three words that are most glibly used in this connection are "mountebanks," "sensationalism," "buffoonery," and a variety of phrases showing that some of my dear clerical brethren are not happy. Now, I have the advantage of all such critical brethren in the fact that I never assault them though they assault me. The dear souls! I wish them all the good I can think of. I rub my hands all over their heads in benediction. You never heard me say one word against any Christian worker, and you never will. The fact is, that I am so busy in assaulting the powers of darkness that I have no time to stop and stab any of my own regiment in the back.

Now, there are two ways in which I might answer some of the critical clergy. I might answer them by the same bitterness and acrimony and caricature with which some of them have assaulted me; but would that advance our holy religion? Do you not know that there is nothing that so prejudices people against Christianity as to see ministers fighting? It takes two to make a battle, so I will let them go on. It relieves them and does not hurt me!

There is another way, and that is by giving them kindly, loving, and brotherly advice. "Ah!" you say, "that's the way; that's a Christian way."

Then I advise my critical brethren of th clergy to remember what every layman knows whether in the church or in the world, that yo never build yourself up by trying to pull anybod else down. You see, my dear critical brethre —and I hope the audience will make no respons to wh[illegible] I am saying—you see, my dear critica brethren, you fail in two respects when you tr to do that; first, you do not build yourselve up, and secondly, you do not pull anybody els down. Show me the case in five hundred year where any pulpit, or any church, has been bui up by bombarding some other pulpit.

The fact is, we have an immense membershi in this church, and they are all my person friends. Then we have a great many regular a tendants who are not church-members, and great many occasional attendants from all par of the land, and these people know that I nev give any bad advice in this place, and that always give good advice.

Now, my dear critical brethren of the clerg why assault all these homes throughout t world? When you assault me, you assault the Beside that, "to every man his work." I wi you all prosperity, critical brethren. You, f instance, are metaphysical. May you succe in driving people into heaven by raising a gre fog on earth. You are severely logical. Ho the people into glory by the horns of a dilemm You are anecdotal. Charm the people to tru by capital stories well told. You are illustrati Twist all the flowers of the field and all the st of heaven into your sermon. You are classic Wield the club of Hercules for the truth, a make Parnassus bow to Calvary. Your work not so much in the pulpit as from house to hou by pastoral visitation. The Lord go with you you go to take tea with the old ladies, and h the children on your lap and tell them how mu they look like their father and mother! prosperity to you in this pastoral work, and m you by that means get the whole family into t kingdom of God. You will reach people I ne will reach, and I will reach people you never reach.

GO AHEAD.

In every possible way, my dear critical bre ren of the clergy, will I help you. If you h any thing going on in your church—lecture, c cert, religious meeting—send me the notice I will read it here with complimentary rema and when you call me a hard name I will call a blessed fellow, and when you throw a brick at me, an ecclesiastical brickbat, then I will p holy oil on your head until it runs clear d on your coat-collar! There is nothing tha invigorates and inspires me as the opportu to say pleasant things about my clerical breth God prosper you, my critical brethren of ministry, and put a blessing on your head, a blessing in your gown—if you wear one—a blessing before you, and a blessing behind y and a blessing under you, and a blessing on top of you, so that you cannot get out until mount into heaven, where I appoint a mee with you on the north side of the river, u the Tree of Life, to talk over the honor we on earth of working each one in his own w "To every man his work."

We ought to be an example, my critical br ren, to other occupations. How often we ar lawyers talking against lawyers, and doctors t king against doctors, and merchants tal g against merchants. You would hardly go o a store on one side of the street to get a r chant's opinion of a merchant on the other le of the street in the same line of business. e ought, in the ministry, to be examples to all other occupations. If we have spites and l ousies, let us hide them forever. If we have ot enough divine grace to do it, let common wor ly prudence dictate.

But during these ten years in which I ve preached to you, I have not only received he criticism of the world, but I have often receive its

MISREPRESENTATION,

I do not suppose any man of any age escapes i be trying to do a particular work for God a the church. It was said that Rowland Hill ertised he would on the following Sabbath e a pair of shoes in his pulpit, in the pres- of his audience, and that he came into the it with a pair of boots and a knife, and having d off the top of the boots, presented the pair hoes. It was said that Whitefield was preach- one summer day, and a fly buzzed around his d, and that he said, "The sinner will be de- yed as certainly as I catch that fly." He ched at the fly and missed it. The story that then he said that after all perhaps the er might escape through salvation.

wenty years ago the pictorials of London full of pictures of Charles Spurgeon, astride rail of the pulpit, riding down in the pres- of the audience to show how easy it was to into sin; and then the pictorials represented as climbing up the railing of the pulpit to w how hard it was to get to heaven. Mr. B cher was said to have entered his pulpit one m day, and, wiping the perspiration from forehead, to have said, "It's hot!" with an letive more emphatic than devotional!

LIES! LIES!

of them lies. No minister of the Gospel pes. Certainly I have not escaped!

few years ago, when I was living in Phila- phia, I came on to unite in holy marriage Dr. ynton, the eloquent geological lecturer, with dy of New York. I solemnized the marriage emony in the parlors of the Fifth Avenue tel. The couple made their wedding excur- n in a balloon that left Central Park within the sence of five thousand people. When I got k to Philadelphia I saw in the papers that I disgraced the holy ordinance of marriage by forming it a mile high, above the earth, in a loon! And there are thousands of people to s day who believe that I solemnized that rriage above the clouds.

About eight or nine years ago, in our chapel, a Christmas festival, one week night, amid six eight hundred children roaring happy, with dies and oranges and corn-balls, and with the resentation of a star in Christmas-greens ht before me, I said: "Boys, I feel like a rning-star." It so happened that that phrase to be found in a negro song, and two days af- wards it appeared over the name of a man o said he was "a member of a neighboring urch," that I had the previous Sunday night, my pulpit, quoted two or three verses from Shoo Fly!" And, moreover, it went on to y that we sang that every Sunday in our Sun- y-school! And as it was supposed that "a ember of a neighboring church" would not lie, ave editorials appeared in prominent newspa- rs deploring the fact that the pulpit should be desecrated, and that the Sabbath-schools of is country seemed to be going to ruin.

Some years ago I wrote an article denouncing e exclusiveness of churches, and making a plea r the working-classes. In the midst of that ticle there were two ironical sentences, in hich I expressed the disgust which some peo- e have for anybody that works for a living. ome enemy took those two ironical sentences d sent them all around the world as my senti- ents of disgust with the working-classes; and popular magazine of the country, taking those wo ironical sentences as a text, went on to say at I preached every Sunday with kid gloves nd swallow-tail coat (!), and that I ought to member that if I ever got to heaven I should ave to be associated with the working-classes, nd be with the fishermen apostles, and Paul, e tent-maker. To this very day, I get letters om all parts of the earth containing little news- aper scraps, saying, "Did you really say that? ow is it possible you can so hate the work- g-classes? How can you make that accord ith the words of sympathy you have recently een uttering in behalf of their sorrows?"

A few years ago I preached a series of sermons ere on good and bad amusements. There appeared a sermon as mine, denouncing all amusements, representing that all actors, play-actors, and actresses were dissolute without any exception, and that all theatrical places were indecent, and that every man who went to a theatre lost his soul, and that it was wrong even to go to a zoological garden, and a sin to look at a zebra. I never preached one word of the sermon. Every word of that sermon was written in a printing-office, by a man who had never seen me, or seen Brooklyn Tabernacle—every word of it except the text, and that he got by sending to another printing-office.

In the State of Maine a religious paper has a letter from a clergyman who says that I came into this pulpit on Sabbath morning with Indian dress, feathers on my head, and scalping-knife in my hand, and that the pulpit was appropriately adorned with arrows, and Indian blankets, and buffalo-skins; and the clergyman, in that letter, goes on, with tears, to ask, "What is the world coming to?" and asks if ecclesiastical authority somehow cannot be evoked to stop such an outrage.

Why do I state these things? To stop them? Oh no! But for public information. I do not want to stop them. They make things spicy! Beside that, my enemies do more for me than my friends can. I long ago learned to harness the falsehood and abuse of the world for Christian service. I thought it would be if I could preach the Gospel through the secular press beyond these two cities. The secular press of these two cities, as a matter of good neighborhood and of home news, have more than done me justice; and I thank them for it. If they put the Gospel as I preach it in their reportorial columns, I should be very mean and ungrateful if I objected to any thing in the editorial columns.

I have felt if this world is ever brought to God, it will be by the printing-press; and while I have for many years been allowed the privilege of preaching the Gospel through the religious press all around the world, I wanted to preach the Gospel through the secular press beyond these cities, to people who do not go to church and who dislike churches. My enemies have given me the chance. They have told such monstrous lies about this pulpit and about this church that they have made all the world curious to know what really is said here. They have opened the way before me everywhere, in all the cities of this land, so that now the very best, the most conscientious, and the most leading papers of the country allow me, week by week, to preach repentance and Christ to the people. And first of all, now, I thank the secular press of these two cities for their kindness, and after that I publicly thank—for I shall never have any opportunity of doing so save this—the religious press, who have published my sermons all around the world.

And I want to tell you that when I was called here to this place, while I received the call from nineteen people, my enemies now give me the opportunity every week of preaching the Gospel to between seven and eight million souls. They have made the curiosity to see and hear what I would say, and then the leading, the honorable newspapers of the country have gratified that curiosity. Go on, mine enemies! If you can afford it in your soul I can. So God makes the wrath of men to praise Him, and while I thank my friends I thank my enemies.

But, while the falsehoods to which I have referred may somewhat have stirred your humor, there is strikes a different key, for it and, when I tell the story, the fair-minded men and women and children of the land will be indignant. I will read it, so that if any one may want to copy it they can afterward. (Reading from manuscript.) It has been stated over and over again in private circles, and in newspapers hinted, until tens of thousands of people have heard the report, that sixteen or seventeen years ago I went sailing on the Schuylkill River with my wife and her sister (who was my sister-in-law); that the boat capsized, and that having the opportunity of saving either my wife or her sister, I let my wife drown and saved her sister, I marrying her in sixty days! I propose to nail that infamous lie on the forehead of every villain, man or woman, who shall utter it again, and to invoke the law to help me.

INVADES THE SANCTITY OF MY HOME;

One beautiful morning, my own sister by blood relation, Sarah Talmage Whiteknack, and her daughter Mary, being on a visit to us in Philadelphia, I proposed that we go to Fairmount Park and make it pleasant for them. With my wife and my only daughter—she being a little child—and my sister Sarah and her daughter, I started for Fairmount. Having just moved to Philadelphia, I was ignorant of the topography of the suburbs. Passing along by the river I saw a boat and proposed a row. I hired the boat and we got in, and not knowing any thing of the dam across the river, and unwarned by the keeper of the boat of any danger, I pulled straight for the brink, suspecting nothing until we saw some one wildly waving on the shore as though there were danger. I looked back, and lo! we were already in the current of the dam. With a terror that you cannot imagine I tried to back the boat, but in vain. We went over. The boat capsized. My wife instantly disappeared and was drawn under the dam, from which her body was not brought until days after; I, not able to swim a stroke, hanging on the bottom of the boat, my niece hanging on to me, my sister Sarah clinging to the other side of the boat. A boat from shore rescued us.

After an hour of effort to resuscitate my child, who was nine-tenths dead—and I can see her blackened body yet, rolling over the barrel, such as is used for restoring the drowned—she breathed again. A carriage came up, and leaving my wife in the bottom of the Schuylkill River, and with my little girl in semi-unconsciousness, and blood issuing from nostril and lip, wrapped in a shawl, on my lap, and with my sister Sarah and her child in the carriage, we rode to our desolated home.

And that is the scene over which some ministers of the Gospel, and men and women pretending to be decent, have made sport. My present wife was not within a hundred miles of the place. So far from being sisters, the two were entire strangers. They never heard of each other, and not until nine months after that tragedy on the Schuylkill did I ever know of the existence of my present wife. Nine months after that calamity on the Schuylkill, she was introduced to me by my brother, her pastor, Rev. Goyn Talmage, nor of Paramus, New Jersey. My first wife's name was Mary R. Avery, a member of the Reformed Church on Harrison Street, South Brooklyn, where there are many hundreds of people who could tell the story. My present wife, I say, was not within a hundred miles of the spot. Her name was Susie Whittemore, and she was a member of the church in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, where multitudes could tell the story.

With multitudes of people on the bank of the Schuylkill who witnessed my landing on that awful day of calamity, and hundreds of people within half an hour's walk of this place who knew Mary Avery, and hundreds of people in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, who knew my present wife, Susie Whittemore—what do you think, husbands and wives, fathers and mothers, editors and reporters, of a lie like that manufactured out of the whole cloth? I never have spoken of this subject before, and I never shall again; but I give fair notice that, if any two responsible witnesses will give me the name of any responsible person after this affirming this slander, I will pay the informant $100, and I will put upon the criminal vagabond who utters it the full force of the law.

But while I have thus referred to falsehoods and criticisms, I want to tell you that in the upturned faces of my congregation, and in the sympathy of a church always indulgent, and in the perpetual blessing of God, my ten years here in Brooklyn have been a rapture. Now,

AS TO THE FUTURE—

for I am preaching my anniversary sermon—as to the future, I want to be of more service. My ideas of a sermon have all changed. My entire theology has condensed into one word, and that a word of four letters, and that word is "help." Before I select my text when I come to this pulpit, when I rise to preach, the one thought is:

HOW SHALL I HELP THE PEOPLE?

And this coming year I mean, if God will give me His Spirit, to help young men. They have an awful struggle, and I want to put my arm through their arm with a tight grip, such as an older brother has a right to give a younger brother, and I want to help them through. Many of them have magnificent promise and hope. I am going to cheer them on up the steps of usefulness and honor. God help the young men! I get letters every week from somebody in the country, saying: "My son has gone to the city; he is in such a bank, or store, or shop. Will you look after him? He was a good boy at home, but there are many temptations in the city. Pray for him, and counsel him."

I want to help the old. They begin to feel in the way; they begin to feel neglected, perhaps. I want, at the edge of the snow-bank of old age, to show them the crocus. I want to put in their hands the staff and the rod of the Gospel. God bless your gray hairs.

I want to help these wives and mothers in the struggle of housekeeping, and in the training of their children for God and for heaven. I want to preach a Gospel as appropriate to Martha as to Mary. God help the martyrs of the kitchen, and the martyrs of the drawing-room, and the martyrs of the nursery, and the martyrs of the sewing-machine.

I want to help merchants; whether the times are good or bad, they have a struggle. I want to preach a sermon that will last them all the week; when they have notes to pay, and no money to pay them with; when they are abused and assaulted. I want to give them a Gospel as appropriate for Wall Street, and Broadway, and Chestnut Street, and State Street, as for the communion-table.

I want to help dissipated men who are trying to reform. Instead of coming to them with a patronizing air that seems to say, "How high I am up, and how low you are down!" I want to come to them with a manner which seems to say, "If I had been in the same kind of temptation I would have done worse." I have more interest in the lost sheep that bleats on the mountain than in the ninety-nine sheep asleep in the fold.

I want to help the bereft. Oh! they are all around us. It seems as if the cry of orphanage and childlessness and widowhood would never end. Only last Wednesday we carried out a beautiful girl of twenty years. Fond parents could not cure her. Doctors could not cure her. Oceanic voyage to Europe could not cure her. She went out over that road over which so many of your loved ones have gone. Oh! we want comfort. This is a world of graves. God makes me the sun of consolation to the troubled. Help for one. Help for all. Help now. While this moment the sun rides mid-heaven, may the eternal noon of God's pardon and comfort flood your soul!

I was reading this morning, that when Richard Baxter was preaching on a certain occasion in England, the shock of arms was heard in the distance. Twenty-five thousand men were in combat, but he went on preaching, and the audience sat and listened, though they knew that a great conflict was raging. While I preach this morning, I know there is a mightier contest—all heaven and hell in battle array, contending for the mastery of your immortal spirit. Who shall have it?

TEACHING THE DUMB TO SPEAK.

BY THE REV. DAVID MACRAE.

SOME say the age of miracles is past. One might rather say, in view of the railway, telegraph, telephone, printing press, phonograph, and electric light, that the age of miracles is only beginning.

Making the dumb speak used to be miraculous. It is now reduced to a system; schools and colleges have been opened for its practice; and thousands who were deemed hoplessly mute are being delivered from their bondage.

I went one day recently to see the class opened by Professor Graham Bell in the Greenock Academy, and now taught by one of his teachers (Mr. Jones) from America. I was the more interested in seeing the method, because I had met with deaf-mutes who had been trained under it, and who were able, in consequence, and without the use of any manual signs, to understand all I said, and to speak, I cannot say musically, but in a perfectly intelligible style.

On reaching the academy I was directed to school-room No. 12, opening off one of the galleries upstairs. There I found Mr. Jones busy with a class of three little girls, deaf-mutes. The first thing that struck me was the wonderful spirit with which the work of the little class was kept up. The exercises were, as far as possible, arranged so as to interest and delight the children while instructing them. The exercise they were at when I entered was connected with postures. On the blackboard was written "Stand up," "Raise your hands," "Put down your hands," "Walk," "Sit down," etc. These words the children were taught, not only to understand as written, but to understand when spoken, from watching the motions of the teacher's lips. This is called lip-reading. They are also taught to articulate the words themselves. This is done by Professor Melville Bell's system of "Visible speech," which has a beautifully constructed alphabet of its own, based on the various positions of the organs of speech required for articulation. Each word on the chart is practically a picture of the successive positions and movements of the organs of speech required for the pronunciation of the word. It is a beautiful and perfectly scientific system, at the same time so simple that a child can readily understand it. The deaf-mutes I saw had only been three weeks under Mr. Jones's tuition, and yet they were learning to articulate by it, and were rapidly coming to understand what was said to them from the mere motion of the lips. Deaf-mutes as they are by nature, they will soon, under this training, be able to converse with any one, and mingle on almost equal terms with their fellow-creatures. The great advantage of this system over the system of manual signs is at once apparent. The deaf-mute who depends on the system of manual signs—the "dumb alphabet," as it is called—can only have correspondence with the very few who can read and also use these signs. Whereas the deaf-mute taught "visible speech" needs no special sign, but understands what is being said from the ordinary motions of the lips always accompanying speech. His language is also the same as ours, and is therefore intelligible to all.

The fact of this class being opened—the only one of the kind, as far as I am aware, yet opened in Scotland—will interest many. It not only brings the best training for deaf-mutes within the reach of many who cannot afford to send their children out of Scotland, but it makes it possible for those who have hitherto been compelled to do so to have their children at or nearer home, and better as well as more cheaply taught. The teacher in the Greenock Academy is, I understand, supported by two Greenock gentlemen, who have deaf and dumb children themselves, and who, at great expense, kept them at a deaf and dumb institution in London. They find it almost as cheap now to maintain a teacher in Greenock between them, besides having the children under a much better system, having them at home, and having them taught writing, sewing, etc., with other children, in the u classes. These gentlemen, however, have ki made the class for their children a public c so that the deaf and dumb children of ot may, at a moderate fee, have the same ad tages as their own. The system itself, howe on scientific and other grounds is exceedi interesting.

SEASONABLE COUNSELS.

An Oration by Mr. J. B. Gough at the Ho Hall, December 14, 1878.

A Merry Time at Christmas—Sea-Sicknes the Voyage to Jersey—Mr. Gough's Pers Experience—Effect of Sympathy—The Fr Count's Story—Breakdown of Bill, the St Man of Newbury.

NOW we do not want to be always grave strait-laced in this world—pulling long, faces. We teetotalers are about as jolly a s people as ever lived. We have the me time in the world. You ask Mr. Noble, has been to my house, if we don't have times there. We don't need to drink. Wh the use of that? If a man cannot find e ment in life without getting it by stimul his system by drink, he had better go wit enjoyment.

We believe in enjoyment, and in a ly. hearty, rollicking laugh. Man is the only ni- mal that can laugh, and he ought to enjo is privilege. But if we don't drink any thin we shall be thought wonderfully ascetic and Talk about Christmas time, having a m jolly Christmas without taking a glass of to drink! Why, to be sure, we seek for e oy- ment that is rational, and we get it. We ca sit down and tell stories, and when we somet ies begin, we say, "That reminds me of—and the other reminds me of;" and one will tell a s ry, and another will tell a story, and tell them on- secutively and with some sense in them ten they have not drink on the brain. Did you ver hear a man undertake to tell a story whe he was drunk? How he got tangled over it and how he went forth and back and back and or- ward? When we tell a story we tell it cle ly, and make it laughable without any stimul ion of the brain.

There are some persons who never lau h— very sour-faced people. They never laugh and they don't understand a joke. They are ery curious people.

SEA-SICKNESS ON THE VOYAGE TO JERS .

Will you allow me to tell you this? You nay say it has nothing to do with temperance. ap- tain De Carteret reminded me of it. I nce went from Jersey to Southampton; if you ave been on that trip when it is very rough you know that going across the English Channe t a nasty sea. It is a short, chopping sea. ou do not go down a legitimate depth and ise gradually, but go about half as far as you wa to and then back again, and you make the pa age in a sort of tubs of boats.

There was a poor fellow leaning over th ide of the vessel "Oh dear! oh, dear!" And me one said to him very sympathizingly, "Ar you sick?"—"What? Sick? Why, confoun ye, you don't think I'm doing this for fun, do y ?" I was up on deck, holding on with all my m ht. the vessel was pitching and rolling, and I f as the poor Frenchman must have felt whe the waiter came to him and wanted his boots. He said, "You may have my boots; you may ave every ting; you may have all I possess; I all never want noting no more."

And while I was holding on, struggling ag nst the motion of the vessel, a gentleman came om the other side of the deck, and said, She pitches a good deal; don't she?" I said, ' es, sir."—"I believe this is Mr. Gough?" " s" —"You have been a great traveller, I believe Mr Gough? She pitches a good deal, don't he? Travelled a good deal in England and in A eri-?" "Yes." "Well, I have often thought if I ver met you, Mr. Gough, I would ask you what our opinion is in reference to—pitches a good al, don't she?—in reference to the distinctive eculiarity of the Anglo-Saxon race, as devel- ped in the immense emigration to the European ties and the United States?"

All I could say to him was, "Sir, if I was as ell as I ever was in my life it would take me wo weeks to answer such a question as you put to e." He could not understand it at all. Every ing seemed to him perfectly straight and reg- lar; and there are persons who, in such a ludicrous scene as that, at such a description as hat, will sit with their faces as stiff as if they ere afraid of cracking something, with a cast- ron countenance, that they never laugh at all.

Now we believe in a good hearty, rollicking augh; and teetotalers are not an ascetic people. We believe in taking all the pleasure God has given us. I want to say to you there is no en- oyment worth having that you cannot thank God for.

You may say to me, you have travelled over a good amount of ground. I do not intend to make a connected sort of speech. I do not care the snap of my finger whether my speeches have unity in them if I can hold the people. I do not care whether it is eloquence or oratory, or any thing of the kind. Now, with regard to experience, I have known as much as any man, except, perhaps, one or two.

MR. GOUGH'S PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

I stopped drinking when I was twenty-five years of age; if I had continued it, perhaps till I was thirty-five, my experience would have been more terrible. When Joel Stratton put his hand on my shoulder, I was pretty well reduced; I believe I had one shirt left, and I was afraid to put that on. I cannot describe it to you exactly. I had not a stocking in the world. I am suffering now with tender feet from the fact that I had no shoes; and instead of going barefoot I got an old pair of india-rubbers, which drew my feet so fearfully that I am suffering, thirty-six years after signing the temperance pledge, with tender feet. I had a coat without any front to it. I had an old stock, but nothing ever appeared above that black stock.

I just give you these particulars to show you how utterly destitute I was; but I could always get liquor. I could go down to a grog-shop, and go in and commence singing some comic song. (Here Mr. Gough sang a verse of some song.) I could always do that, or else strike an attitude and go through some theatrical performances. "Here you are, old fellow; what will you have to drink?" I could always get drink when I could not get clothes.

When you see an intemperate man jolly and merry and singing songs, you say, "What a jolly sort of fellow he is!" But go and see him at night alone, when he puts his hands to his face and remembers the time when he knelt at his mother's knee, and her soft warm hand rested on his head and she taught him his first little prayer, and when the fumes of the drink had gone off he thinks of his mother, and the little prayer comes ringing in his ears or whispering in his ears, as if the soft lips of the mother were breathing it there; he sits there poor and wretched, drumming his feet and grinding his teeth, and saying, "What a cursed fool I am! I am a lost, lost, man,"—and so on until morning; and then into a dramshop again, and after one or two glasses, "Ha! ha! ha! Throw care to the wind! Who cares for any thing? I care for nobody!" And that is life, —the most awful life a man can lead.

EFFECT OF SYMPATHY.

Before Joel Stratton spoke to me one Sunday night in Worcester, Massachusetts, and persuaded me to sign the pledge, a few others had given me advice, but they never came to me in the right way. They looked upon me as if I was beneath them. They would talk to me sometimes like a Dutch uncle. Why, a man can't stand that. But as soon as a man comes right down to your level and lays his hand on your shoulder, what then? Why, there were men there, Christian men, members of churches, ministers of the Gospel, who knew me, who knew what I was, who knew I was wretched, and knew there were better things for me if I could be redeemed from the power of the drink; and I know of no time during the last five years or three years of my drinking, if any man laid his hand on my shoulder and spoke to me as a man and a brother, I believe I should have gone with him as readily as a child goes for its food. But no one ever spoke to me. I tell you what it is, there are some ministers of the Gospel that know some of these men who stand up and speak as they do here, and what do they do?

They need treating by these men as the costermonger treated his donkey. The donkey would not go, and stood perfectly firm and obstinate. What did the costermonger do? He just took the donkey out of the barrow and wheeled it off himself. Somebody asked what did he do that for? Said he, "I wanted to shame him into it." So some of these men that related their experience here to-night will shame some of those who set themselves up as being so much better than we.

I did some wicked things—some naughty things. What will not a man do when he is in drink? I remember once going into a Methodist meeting, and taking up a spittoon, and saying "We'll now take up a collection,"—and the spittoon had been passed along before the joke was noticed. There is no knowing what they would not set me to do. I used to find a place where there was a meeting and some men would stand to keep the door. I would say to a lot of boys, "Stand right behind me, and follow me up close,"—and then in would I go with a rush, and say, "Who's that pushing behind?" These young men thought there would be some fun. Such is the folly of drinkers.

I remember meeting a French count—he called himself a count, I don't know whether he was any account or not—he was a teetotaler, in the city of Troy, and he said to me, "You will tink it vas very strange I am a teetotaler. I do not drink ale, wine, spirits, or anytink of dat kind. Me goes to a party and dey say, 'Vill you take a glass of vine vid us?' Dey say, 'You had betaire take von glass vid us.' I say, 'No, tank you.' 'Well, jez take von vid us.' I say again, 'Tank you; I do not take vine.' Soon another says, 'Oh, but do take only von glass to keep us company.' I repeat again, 'No; I don't vish to.' I forget to put on de 'tank you.' Den presently dey ask me again, 'Do take jez a little vine vith us,' and I say, 'I DON'T VONT TO' (shouting), just like dat. Suppose dey ask me to take von ongyong (onion); I don't like ongyongs. 'Oh, jez take von ongyon.' What biznez dey ask me to take von ongyong any more dan ask me to take von glass of vine?

"By and by dey say, 'Oh, jez take von glass vid us jez to be comfortable vith your companions, for good vill, you jez take von.' I put my foot down jez like dat (stamping), and I say 'I WILL NOT,' and I look like dat (frowning), and then they say, 'You great big fool.' Ah! very well. By and by they get drunk, everybody drunk, drunk, drunk. I call on dem next morning. Dey are in dere bed. Ha! ha! ha! I say, 'Vat is de mattare vid you?' 'Oh, such a bad headache; my headache like to be cracked. Oh! I have such a bad headache.' 'Vy, vat is de mattare?' 'Oh! dat vine.' 'Ah!' I say, 'who is de big fool now, eh? Is it you or is it me who will not drink de vine? It is you dat is the big fool.'"

BREAKDOWN OF BILL, THE STRONG MAN OF NEWBURY.

We abstain from the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage, because we believe it to be utterly useless. "Well," you say, "don't a little drop of beer do a man a little good occasionally?" Now, we will look at the good, if you please. What does it do for a man? You know as well as I do that a man is not stronger after drinking beer than he was before. You say a man can do a harder day's work after taking a little drop of beer or a little drop of spirits—a harder day's work than he could if he did not take it.

Well, as regards such a notion as that, I remember once, when I was a young man, I went fishing at a Bay off the Labrador coast. We were drinking people then. There was a young man there, said to be one of the strongest men in the States. He was the strongest I ever saw. I have seen him stand with three men, one on his shoulders, and another on his, and another on his, and he would just step round the deck with that weight upon him. We came to an anchor that was marked 750—whether it was pounds or not I do not know—but the fluke of the anchor was buried in the sand.

Some one said to him, "Bill, you can't lift that anchor." "Can't I?" he said; "I will try it." So he got astride of the anchor, and, laying firmly hold of it he drew himself up, but he could not move it. After trying again he said, "I'll give it up; that is a little too much for me." We went for a ramble up the country that day, and all had some whiskey—not enough to get drunk, but a little, and were just fit for any thing. As we came back, one said to him, "Bill, there is your old enemy; you won't lift it now." He said, "I will lift it."

He brought himself over the anchor, and, passing some ropes over his shoulder, he lifted with all his might. You could see the veins stand on his forehead and the great drops of sweat stand out on his face as he strained himself, but he lifted the fluke out of the sand. "I have done it," he exclaimed, "but" (placing his hands to his stomach) "I have hurt myself." That man in the city of Newbury goes walking just like this (imitating the movement of a cripple), and has never been able to do a day's work since. Did that whiskey help him? Yes, it gave him stimulus, but it gave him no additional strength, no power, no muscle.

Just as if you have a horse with a heavy load and it cannot start it, and the horse ought not to start it; and while it is doing its best with its shoulder to the wheel, the driver takes his black whip and whips him, and it is able to start the load. The horse ought not to have that heavy load. But did the whip give him any strength? Did it give him any power? No, it gave him stimulus, and you made him do what he had no right to do; and that man that does a day's work under the influence of stimulus that he could not do without it, owes it to the damage of his constitution. Pay-day will come by and by, and Nature's a hard creditor. We find men who have reduced their capital by stimulus, broken at forty, fifty, or sixty years of age, when they might have lived ten or fifteen years longer.

If you would keep yourselves, tide yourselves over this Christmas time and the New Year, use continued prayer to God and you will be perfectly safe, and you will look back upon this Christmas as the merriest and best Christmas you ever experienced in your life. And why should it not be? It is in commemoration of the birth of Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost and to do it by giving Himself a sacrifice for others; and if He came into the world to save you and me, He has pledged Himself to save us if we are willing to be saved, and it is our own fault if we are not.

After all the condescension—infinite condescension—that led Him to come here and take up His abode with us to save us, I say to you, in the coming festivities—for they should be festivities, festivities without drink, reasonable festivities—in the coming festivities keep yourselves well gathered up in the attitude of prayer, and trust in God, and not one of the Hoxton members who have signed the pledge in this hall will break it, or even be tempted to break it, if we keep in the attitude of prayer.

I did not intend to make a speech to you, for I am told I must not make a speech just yet; but I felt a deep interest in this ever since I came here with Dr. Taylor, of New York, and thought I would like to come and wish you "A merry Christmas and a happy New Year."

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ANNOUNCEMENT.

In commencing the publication of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times in America, it was impossible to form an accurate or even an approximate idea of the extent to which it would enjoy the favor of the Religious Public. The price was therefore fixed at four cents per single copy, that being the lowest sum deemed prudent under the circumstances.

Now, however, after the issue of only a few numbers, the journal has attained a circulation which, in connection with the numbers of commendatory letters daily received, justifies a

REDUCTION IN PRICE.

We have accordingly much pleasure in announcing that the price of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now reduced to

for single copies. Annual subscription, postage paid, $1.50. Remittances should be by check or post-office order or registered letter, and be made payable to Joseph Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, New York.

Though but a few weeks have elapsed since the issue of the first number of the American edition of The Christian Herald, we feel constrained thus early to express our grateful thanks for the numerous friendly greetings and kind expressions of appreciation that have reached us from every quarter.

While thankful to all who have aided us, we have at this time especially to acknowledge the aid and sympathy of hundreds of ministers from all parts of the country, and of every denomination.

It has been the occasion of surprise that while we have received hundreds of letters commendatory of the appearance and character of the paper in detail, there has been not one objection, either to particular articles or to the general course of the paper.

We ask a continuance of the sympathy and co-operation of our brethren of every name. We greatly desire that The Christian Herald shall reach every family in the United States, and believe that the above reduction in price ought to effect that object.

The Christian Herald is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress met again on Tuesday, January 7th, but little business except of a routine character was transacted. On Thursday both Houses attended the funeral of Representative Hartridge, the services being held in the hall of the House.

The investigation in the matter of the cipher telegrams goes forward in a languid manner. The Republicans are not urgent in the business; and Democrats allege that the want of enthusiasm is owing to the fear that a thorough investigation will reveal matters the Republicans would prefer remaining concealed. The Democrats press for an investigation, and it is said their object in doing so is to destroy Mr. Tilden's prospects in the next Presidential election, and enhance the chances of another candidate of the party.

Dr. Talmage's sermon which we publish this week deserves to be widely read. His assailants have attacked him with merciless severity, and have not even refrained from libelling him in relation to his private affairs. These scurrilous attacks have hitherto been borne patiently, but now their subject has wisely broken silence, and refuted them. It has ever been the manner of the world to fulfil one prediction of our Saviour's, namely, to speak against Christian teachers "all manner of evil falsely," and Dr. Talmage and other preachers whom he mentions have not escaped. We shall see whether those who have maligned them will make his contradiction as public as they made their false charges.

Mr. Moody has closed his work in the Northwestern section of Baltimore. After preaching daily for several consecutive weeks at the Eutaw Place Baptist Church in the afternoon, and at Grace M. E. Church at night, he has transferred his labors to the north-eastern portion of the city. He preached twice on Sabbath last and the Sabbath preceding, and once during the interval between. On each occasion he addressed crowded and deeply interested audiences, and a number of persons repaired to the Inquiry Room for religious conversation and counsel.

Some idea may be formed of the effect of his efforts, writes a correspondent in Baltimore, by the characters reached and impressed by them. At one time we noticed five professional gamblers and two avowed skeptics among the inquirers; at another, an atheist, an infidel, a Unitarian, and two Universalists. This shows that the extreme classes among the unconverted do not escape the edge of the Spirit's sword as wielded by this faithful minister of God. Every type of sinners comes under the power of his searching, practical presentations of truth. We are satisfied that he has already accomplished a vast deal of good among us, and that his work has not been superficial, but deep, genuine, and thorough.

The Chicago Post-Office was burned again on Saturday evening, January 4th. It was burned in the great fire of 1871, and then took refuge in a church on Wabash Avenue just below the fire limits. It was driven out of that by the fire of 1874, and then occupied the splendid Honore Block, corner of Dearborn and Adams streets. On Saturday evening that building took fire and was damaged to the amount of about $100,000. It was dreadfully cold, and the firemen had a hard battle of it, but they conquered. The water froze in the burning building, and when the fire was extinguished it stood a palace of ice—entirely covered with a glazing of ice and enormous icicles hanging from every sill, cornice, and projection of any kind.

Diphtheria is of all diseases at once the most terrible and the one of which we know the least. The laws which regulate the course of typhoid, of cholera, of scarlatina, and of most other epidemic maladies are to a certain extent ascertained. Diphtheria remains, as in old times did the plague, beyond the range of medical science. It is a putrid fever, and apt to be epidemic. It commences with ordinary febrile symptoms, which soon assume a specific character. The throat and fauces begin to swell, and then there spreads from the roof of the mouth, downward and back almost into the lungs, an inflammation of the most sudden and malignant kind, coupled with a characteristic exudation of a thick, leathery, white, malignant growth, like some unwholesome fungus or confervoid. Only too often the patient succumbs, partly from exhaustion and partly from absolute suffocation. All attempts to reduce the local symptoms have in the great majority of cases hitherto proved ineffectual. The strongest applications fail to give relief, and if the foul, sporadic growth is mechanically removed—a desperate experiment, which has before now been essayed—it only leaves a raw, bleeding surface, upon which the putrid miasma almost immediately gathers itself together with renewed strength. Even should the natural strength and vigor of the patient ultimately prove superior to the poison, the danger is not yet past. The patient who has escaped with his life remains liable to sequelæ of the most serious kind, not the least frequent of which is general paralysis, with all the many distressing symptoms which usually accompany that most painful of all nervous derangements. Its origin has been ascribed to the inhalation of sewer gas, to the use of impure milk, to malarious poison in the atmosphere derived from the immediate neighborhood of expanses of swamp and morass.

The Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting in its reports continues to furnish an answer to the question so often raised, What profit shall we have if we pray unto Him?

One of three thanksgiving friends writes: "About three weeks ago I wrote to you asking your prayers for God's blessing and the pouring out of His Holy Spirit upon the people here. Now I write asking you to rejoice with us in, as we hope, the conversion and addition to the church of sixteen persons and the restoration of backsliders. My brother and one of my Sunday scholars were of those added to the church. We have a list of about one hundred for whom we have covenanted to pray. Remember these in your prayers."

Says another: "On Monday of last week a wife asked prayers for a much-loved husband who was estranged from her, and who seemed to have forgotten the vows he once made as a follower of his Heavenly Father. The same week I received a letter from my husband asking for reconciliation, and expressing a desire to lead a more consistent Christian life. What shall I render to my God for His loving-kindness toward us? I now ask your prayers that my husband and myself may give ourselves to God and His service—may be entirely His and be faithful till death."

The last friend writes: "I desire to thank God for an answer to your prayers in my behalf. God has been very merciful to me, and is healing me of my sickness. Do pray for me that my faith may be strengthened, and that the Lord will continue His healing mercy to me."

Anecdote of Garibaldi.—One evening in 1861 as General Garibaldi was going home, he met a Sardinian shepherd lamenting the loss of a lamb out of his flock. Garibaldi at once turned to his staff and announced his intention of scouring the mountain in search of the lamb. A grand expedition was organized. Lanterns were brought, and old officers of many a campaign started off full of zeal to hunt the fugitive. But no lamb was found, and the soldiers were ordered to their beds. The next morning Garibaldi's attendant found him in bed fast asleep. He was surprised at this, for the General was always up before anybody else. The attendant went off softly and returned in half an hour. Garibaldi still slept. After another delay the attendant waked him. The General rubbed his eyes, and so did his attendant, when he saw the old warrior take from under the covering the lost lamb and bid him convey it to the shepherd. The General had kept up the search through the night until he had found it. Even so doth the Good Shepherd go in search of His lost sheep until He finds them.

Miss Linda Gilbert, the discharged criminals' friend, so well known out West, has written a letter which has been published in the New York Herald giving an account of some results of her labors. She has devoted much of her time and attention to the work of aiding prisoners whose terms of confinement have expired to lead better lives, and in securing places for them where they could earn an honest living. During the last four years of labor in this cause honorable employment has been provided for 375 discharged convicts. Of this number 200 are upon farms in the West, concerning whom the lady says: "Their employers do not know that they ever saw the inside of a prison, and I am free to say that, of the whole number I have aided, not 15 per cent have disappointed me in this my plan." This is indeed a noble record in favor of a class of persons who very much need friendly advice and help.

Sunday-Schools.—The year 1880 will be the hundredth since the establishment of Robert Raikes' Sunday-schools, and the Committee of the Church of England Sunday-school Institute propose commemorating the event by a series of services, conferences, and meetings of an unusually important character. The proceedings will extend from June 28th to July 4th of that year. It is impossible to form any estimate of the good effected by Sunday-schools in the hundred years. Every day furnishes some evidence of their usefulness. The reports of the past year's work in one or two places show the progress they are making here. In the Northwest alone during the past eight months 276 new schools have been established and 985 others have been assisted by the American Union; besides this, 1383 persons were supplied with the Scriptures, and nearly $4000 worth of religious juvenile reading was put into the hands of children. In London the schools number 814, with 19,681 teachers and 230,084 scholars. The churches in Illinois during the year just passed received 18,182 additions through the Sunday-schools, and in the past eight years 126,024. In Newark, N. J., the eighteen schools have 5123 scholars and 617 teachers. The first school was organized in 1819.

The snow-storms which prevailed last week have seriously interfered with commercial transactions. Some idea of their violence can be gathered from the fact that there were at the end of the week between New York and the West no less than 5000 car-loads of grain blockaded. "The beautiful snow," so lauded by poets, is in this case very inconvenient and embarrassing, and a beautiful thaw would be welcomed.

A California Sand-Storm.—About two weeks ago, as the train which left Los Angeles in the afternoon approached Cucamonga Station it encountered a sand-storm of extraordinary violence. The train was soon obliged to stop. Superintendent Hewit was at once informed of the occurrence, and immediately dispatched a strong force of men to clear the track, but entirely without avail. The train was delayed about fifteen hours. The simoom, or sirocco, came whistling through the Cajou Pass as though it was discharged from a funnel. Something of the force of the wind may be conjectured from the fact that the rails for a distance of three or four miles were covered with sand to depths ranging from one to three feet. Fortunately these sand-storms are not of very frequent occurrence. A number of years ago a whirlwind poured out of the Cajou Pass which took substantially the same course as this one, but of a more violent character.

Newburgh, N. Y., a city of 20,000 inhabitants, containing many public and private educational institutions, and a number of churches of various denominations, was recently canvassed by an agent of the City Bible Society with the following result: "383 families were found entirely destitute of Bibles and Testaments; 215 of these families refused to accept of either a Bible or Testament from the agent; to the balance, 168 families, the agent gave 158 Bibles, 60 small Testaments, and one large one."

Mr. Charles E. Stowe, son of Harriet Beecher and Professor Calvin Stowe, was ordained an evangelist by a Congregationalist council recently. Mr. Stowe is a graduate of Harvard College, and has studied theology in Germany, mostly at Bonn. He began his preparations for the ministry in connection with the Episcopal Church, but withdrew from it some time since. It is understood that he has offered himself for home-missionary service in a remote settlement of Northern Maine.

Rev. Dr. Budington has resigned the pastorate of the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, a position which he has occupied since the organization of the church in 1855. The reasons given by the doctor for his desire to sever his relations with the church are his long cessation from active work, as advised by his physicians on account of cancer in the mouth, from which he has been suffering since May last, and his conviction that the church and congregation really need a pastor at once. Thus far no action has been taken by the church.

Providence, Rhode Island, is just now the scene of the labors of Messrs. Pentecost & Stebbins. All those who witnessed the blessings which attended their work at Fall River will pray that a similar result may attend them in their new sphere. Those who know most of the Fall River locality tell us that a vast amount of real and permanent good has been done.

Saved under the Sea.—A professional diver said he had in his house what would probably strike a visitor as a very strange chimney ornament—the shells of an oyster holding fast a piece of printed paper. The possessor of this ornament was diving on the coast, when he observed at the bottom of the sea this oyster on a rock, with a piece of paper in its mouth, which he detached, and commenced to read through the goggles of his head-dress. It was a Gospel tract, and, coming to him thus strangely and unexpectedly, so impressed his unconverted heart, that he said, "I can hold out against God's mercy in Christ no longer, since it pursues me thus." He became, whilst in the ocean's depths, a repentant, converted, and (as he was assured) sin-forgiven man—"saved at the bottom of the sea."

The Young Man and Noah's Ark.—A young man, who had been a drunken, blaspheming, fighting man, reckless of all considerations of right, stumbled, accidentally, as he supposed at the time, but providentially as the results proved, into a prayer-meeting. As he entered, the leader of the meeting was reading the account of the Flood and the deliverance of Noah and his family so safely housed in the ark. "And the Lord shut him in," were the words that fell upon the young man's ear as he took his seat. "And the rest of the world were shut out," something seemed to say to him; and then he thought of the day when the storm of God's wrath against sin should fall on all not safe in the spiritual ark the Lord Jesus Christ. He remembered his past life so crowded with sin, and it seemed to him as though the door of mercy were already closed against him. "Outside, Outside," every thing around him seemed to say; but God had not forsaken him—mercy was in store for him. He sought pardon through the blood of the atoning Lamb, and found it.

A Wayside Courtesy.—A minister says: "I was once walking a short distance behind a well-dressed young lady, and thinking, as I looked at her becoming apparel, 'I wonder if she takes as much pains with her heart as she does with her body.' An old man was coming up the walk with a loaded wheelbarrow, and before he reached us he made two attempts to go into the yard of a small house; but the gate was heavy, and would swing back before he could get through. 'Wait,' said the young girl, springing lightly forward, 'I'll hold the gate open.' And she held the gate open until he passed in, and received his thanks with a pleasant smile as she went on. 'She deserves to have graceful attire,' I thought, 'for a beautiful disposition dwells in her breast.'"

A VILE WEED AND A FAIR FLOWER.

A Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."—HEBREWS 13: 5, 6.

Is it Possible for the Consecrated to become Covetous?— I. A Vice to be Shunned—1. Covetousness should not be in Conversation—2. Nor in Action—3. Nor in Desire—How Covetousness shows Itself—I. In Repining—2. In Envy—3. In Craving—4. In Fretful Fears—Covetous Men Self-Deceivers—II. A Virtue to be Sought—The Way to be Cheerful—Live by the Day—Look Ahead — God's Presence Glorifies a Garret—III. Confidence to Produce Courage.

Is it not deeply humiliating, beloved friends, that the best of Christians should need to be cautioned against the worst of sins? May the consecrated become covetous? Is it possible that the regenerate may drivel into misers? Alas, what perils surround us, what tendencies are within us! Although a man may be a sincere believer in the self-sacrificing Jesus, yet it is needful to say to him, "Let your conversation be without covetousness." Covetousness is a vice of a very degrading kind, and it is therefore the more surprising that those who have a renewed nature, and in whom the Spirit of God dwells, should require to be warned against bowing down their souls before it, and yet such is the necessity that once and again the saints are warned against "covetousness, which is idolatry."

As long as Israel is in the wilderness she is not out of danger from the golden calf. There is no superfluous text in the Bible; had there been no peril, there would have been no precept; but, alas! the best of saints may be betrayed into the basest sins. Moreover, the common talk of the people, with whom we daily mingle in business, is so much about buying and selling and getting gain, that we are apt to be entangled in their nets and find ourselves in the meshes of their craft before we are well aware of it. It is hard to live where greed grasps all, and not try to save a little for ourselves out of the wreck. "Take heed and beware of covetousness," is a needful caution for these latitudes.

It appears from our text that the children of God need also to be exhorted to cherish that most simple and natural of virtues—contentment. One would think that, at least in some instances, they would have this good thing as a matter of course. Among our villagers we have met with persons so well satisfied with their lowly lot that they would not cross the sea to gain an empire. Yet their contentment has sprung up wild as the daisies and buttercups of their own meadows, for they have not been acquainted with the truth as it is in Jesus, or the blessed hope which makes trials light to bear. Do Christians, then, need to be admonished with precepts, and stimulated with promises, to make them yield the commonplace virtues of life?

Do their fields refuse to grow "the herb called heartsease," which simple folk have gathered unsown from their little garden plots? Must believers be exhorted with earnestness if you would have them contented? It is even so. Against the worst of vices they need to be warned, and towards the humblest of virtues they need to be exhorted. O Lord! thou knowest us better than we know ourselves, for thou understandest what poor, faulty things even Thine own children are. The best of men are men at the best. Unless the grace of God had engaged to keep them every moment, and to defend them from the temptations of their many foes, they would long ago have utterly perished from the way. Great need have they to say, "The Lord is my helper," for if He be not so, they will fall a prey to covetousness and discontent.

Our discourse, like the text which dictates it, must run out in three distinct branches. There is a covetousness to be eschewed, a contentment to be entertained, and a confidence to be established.

A VICE TO BE SHUNNED.

I. First, I shall have to say a little about COVETOUSNESS. We are told that our conversation is to be "without covetousness." The term "conversation" includes, as you know, the whole of our lives. It is true that we are not to talk covetously, but conversation means far more than speech ; it includes thoughts, words, and actions : in fact, the whole of life.

1. Taking the first meaning of conversation, namely, talk, we ought not in our words to be on the side of those who grip for wealth or growl for wage, who grasp for power or grind the poor. We ought not in our talk to take part with the churl and the illiberal. If we hear of a mean transaction, and it is called a sharp stroke of business and commended as something clever, we are not to sanction it even with a smile ; but make our looks and our language alike discountenance overreaching and oppression. The skinning of flints and the driving of screws are practised by many people as if they were positively meritorious, and there are those who, while they would shrink from doing aught so questionable themselves, will smile at the crooked policy of others, perhaps feebly blaming the fraud, but all the while admiring the cuteness which carried it out and pocketed the result.

With satiric praise instead of severe censure, they will say, "Wonderful man that ! Nobody can ever get on the blind side of his head. He can get blood out of gateposts, and profits out of losses." Those who praise sharpers are the patrons of thieves. Never think that dexterity will condone deceit, or cleverness excuse a lie. Let your conversation savor of grace and generosity, and of kindness altogether unselfish ; and never let it flatter the successful trickster or the greedy grinder of the needy. Never let your language be such as might help to sharpen the cunning of a Laban or sanction the churlishness of a Nabal. This be far from you. "Let your conversation be without covetousness."

2. But our conversation has to do with our actions as well as our words. The sugar of words is sickening if it be not attended with the honey of deeds. Let our whole life in our dealings with our fellow-men be moved by liberal principles, and enriched with a generous spirit. Let us be full of kindness, full of thoughtfulness, full of a desire that others may live as well as ourselves—that our coming into a country may not be like the coming of the Tartar's horse, of which it is said that no grass will grow where once it sets its foot. The miser is a creature too hungry, too greedy, too ravenous, to allow any other cattle to feed after him ; he makes the land barren, by gnawing the very roots out of the ground. There are some whose whole life is the use of the rake to scrape every thing to themselves, and these men leave nothing for others, however honest and industrious they may be. This is not Christlike, nor will Christ own one who thus lives to himself. Let your actions, then, in trade and labor, as well as your words, be without covetousness.

3. But this will not do unless the word "conversation" takes in our desires, our projects, our plans, our thoughts. We must be without covetousness within, for if that vice reigns in the soul it is sure to rule in the life. Our prayer should be that of David, "Incline my heart unto Thy testimonies, and not to covetousness." Why is a man miserly in his actions ? Why, because he is miserable in his thoughts. If the inner man were right, the outer man could not be wrong. Beloved, may God cleanse our way, both in private and in public, from any thing like greed, that we may be obedient to the text, "Let your conversation be without covetousness."

It is so very easy a thing to be covetous, that no class of society is free from it. A man may be very poor and covetous withal, and a man may be exceedingly rich and still may think that he is not half rich enough. It is not possible to satisfy the greedy. If God gave them one whole world to themselves they would cry for another ; and if it were possible for them to possess heaven as they now are, they would feel themselves in hell, because others were in heaven too, for their greed is such that they must have every thing or else they have nothing. Unless they can call all things theirs, they are as miserable as Haman, who, although all Shushan bowed before him, was not content, because one poor Jew who sat in the gate would not pay him homage.

A covetous spirit can enter anywhere, and can live any where. It is necessary that we search ourselves, lest the wretched lust of greed should fix itself upon us ; for, remember, it can live in one room in a back street, but it can also live in the most sumptuous mansion of Belgravia ; it can starve itself to save a shilling, and it can indulge itself in all manner of extravagance to grasp a fortune. Covetousness has many ways of manifesting itself ; and the text does not warn us against one of those ways, but against them all. "Let your conversation be without covetousness."

HOW THE VICE SHOWS ITSELF.

I have said that covetousness has many ways of showing itself ; let me mention some of them.

1. In some it is most seen in repining and complaining against their lot. God has so circumstanced them that they scarcely ever have more than barely enough. They have struggled to rise, but they have never succeeded ; probably because they have not the capacity for so doing. There must be people in the world to take the rough side of it, and these men are evidently of the number, for although they are anxious to make headway in the world, yet they never rise an inch. Now, if we know our lot, it is idle to refuse it. If we do so, our conversation is not without covetousness ; we are not satisfied with the things that we have. We are not satisfied with our heavenly Father's will, nor willing that He should be Father and that we should be children. We have not learned to say, "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Here is the neglected part of our education, and we must go to school again to the Holy Spirit.

There are some complaining ones who would be no happier if their lot were changed. If they were lifted from a cottage to a palace they would repine still, for repining is far more a matter of the heart than of the condition ; and a mind that has not bowed to the will of God in one place would be rebellious also in another, and would rebel still. There be some who have all that heart could wish who still murmur, and still think that God deals hardly with them. This disease is born and bred in our very bones, and it needs the grace of God to get it out of us. It is ill when it shows itself in a perpetual fault-finding with all that providence appoints, in always grumbling that we are left out in the cold, as if in every distribution of divine love we came in for the last portion and the least share, and were doomed to be the forgotten ones of the family. Shake off that spirit, beloved. God help us all to get rid of every particle of it, for it savors not of grace, but it is earthly, sensual, devilish.

2. In some others this covetous principle shows itself in envying others. If others are better off, or more esteemed, they straightway seem to regard them as enemies, cannot think well of them, cannot wish them well, would almost rejoice to see them dragged down. I have known some rich persons that were very proud ; I have known some poor people who were prouder still ; and their envying of those who were better off has developed in them a pride of an almost ferocious character, akin to the fury of savages. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous, but who is able to stand before envy ? Now, if I envy a man, I am clearly guilty of covetousness, for I wish that something which he has were not his, but mine. And that may happen to you when you do not think about his property. You may be covetous of his gifts. Somebody in the little school to which you belong can address the children better than you : do you ever catch yourself feeling jealous of him ? Go before God and weep over it, and pray the feeling down.

Possibly you are a minister, and alas ! even with us this wretched feeling will come in. Some star outshines ours, and we are likely to be eclipsed, and straightway we are covetous of our honor. We do not like it, brethren, but if we were right at heart with God as we ought to be we should glory in being excelled by our fellow-servants ; we should be glad for our heavenly Father to be better served than we can serve Him, and for the Church of God to have more valued servants in it than we are ever likely to be. This is not easy, because envy preys upon us, that compound of meanness and malice, that vilest reptile of the old serpent's brood.

This ill-natured vice shows itself generally in finding fault. Of course our brethren are not perfect ; but why should we take a delight in pointing out their peculiarities, their eccentricities, or their shortcomings ? If they win a great many to Christ the question is sceptically mooted, "But how will their converts wear ?" What makes us raise the question ? Is it brotherly love ? If throngs gather around them, we say, "Ah ! they are a nine days' wonder : that little excitement will soon pass off." Is it grace or envy which makes us hope so ? Perhaps we complain that they are very young. This, I suppose, they cannot help ; we were once young ourselves, and would like to be so still. Or else we say, on the other hand, they have passed their meridian, and if they flourish for a little while, their sun is setting, and it is not much they will ever achieve.

Ah, greed of honor ! what is there which thou wilt not say ? Would God that Christians would cease from tearing one another ! Let your conversation be without that covetousness which shows itself in envy. If the Lord has given you one talent, use it ; but do not waste your time in finding fault with him who has five talents. I your Master makes you a hewer of wood, throw your strength into your felling and cleaving, d not throw the axe at your fellow-servant ; and i he makes you a drawer of water, do not empt your buckets on your neighbor, but do your ow service well, and bring what you have done an lay it at your Master's feet. This will be thank worthy ; this will be Christlike. You will the be obeying the injunction, "Let your convers tion be without covetousness."

3. And covetousness may show itself in a other way, namely, by perpetually craving an desiring that which we have not. The old mora ists used to say that the man who would be tru rich had better retrench his appetites than i crease his fortune. Some men seem as if the never could fix their thoughts on what they hav but they are always in the other tense and moo thinking of what they could, would, or shou have. They have swallowed the two daughters Solomon's horseleech, and these continually cr "Give, give." They must have somethi more : their desires are boundless, the sea is n more ready to swallow up all that it can co at. A little more they told us would conte them some years ago, and a great deal more h been added to their stores, but still they want little more now. Let your conversation be wit out covetousness in that respect, and be conte with such things as ye have.

4. In many—perhaps in the most numer class—this anxiety for acquisition betrays itself fretful fears about the future ; and I must in honesty grant that this form of the vice h sometimes the appearance of being the most cusable of the whole. "What shall I do," are apt to say, "in case I should be laid asi and a pecarious income should suddenly come an end ? It is not for myself alone : it is for wife and numerous family that I am chiefly c cerned—how could they be provided for ?" M a man lies awake at night desiring to incre his income, not because he is ambitious to rich, but because he is haunted with the fea being poor.

Gifted, perhaps, for the present with com tency, he is still scared with dire foreboding

"What will become of my family if I die?" "Or should such and such a source of income be dried up, and it is very precarious, what then will become of my household? What then?" Full many are not content with such things as they have because the dread of a distant season of trial is constantly harassing them. They cannot be happy in the present sunshine because mayhap a storm is brewing out of sight. They cannot lie down in peace because they want to lay up against a rainy day. In vain for them their table is bountifully spread unless they have a store in hand against every contingency that may happen.

Do you notice how precious is that promise which provides for all possible casualties that may befall you? "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." The censure, therefore, falls where this sacred pledge is unheeded; and he is accounted covetous who walks after the cravings of the flesh, rather than after the counsel of the Spirit of God. If God would have thee live by the day, why dost thou want to gather enough for seven days at once?

If thy Father bids thee trust Him, why dost thou distrust His paternal care? Use prudent thrift by all means; do not waste what He gives, nor heedlessly forget that you will have wants on the morrow as well as to-day; but abstain from fretfulness, abjure murmuring, and abhor every tendency to unbelief, lest you provoke Him to anger:

"Commit thou all thy griefs
And ways unto His hands;
To His sure truth, and tender care,
Who earth and heaven commands."

He would not have you careful about those earthly things after which the Gentiles seek. "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things." "Let your conversation be without covetousness."

This covetousness is a great and crying evil. It is expressly forbidden in the law. It has a commandment all to itself: "Thou shalt not covet." O brother! wouldst thou wish to fly into an evil which the Lord Himself accounts so gross that He has branded it across the brow with one of the ten commands of the Decalogue: "Thou shalt not covet?"

God is not selfish, God is love: God hoards not, He giveth liberally; He refuses not the poor, He delighteth in mercy. He spreads abroad in the midst of His creatures the good things which belong to Him, and He bids them freely gather what He freely gives; even thus would He have us distribute generously and disperse freely without covetousness.

I scarcely know any other vice which can more effectually damn its victim; and I speak the more earnestly about it because covetousness can readily enter into a man's heart, and he may not know it. St. Francis de Sales said that many came to him to confess all manner of sins, and many of them of a glaring nature; but that all his life long he never knew anybody acknowledge covetousness. Do you exclaim, "I wonder why this is?" Well, it is because a man does not like to think that he can be covetous; he cannot bring himself to acknowledge that he has quite gone that length. When his avarice is the most heartless he generally calls it by a prettier name, such as prudence, thrift, or carefulness, so as to make it look more respectable. There is a great propensity about gold and silver, and houses and lands, to stick to one's heart and blind the judgment. It is difficult for those who have much to do with wealth to be quite clear of self. Some men, by divine grace, get much, and give much, and use the world, and do not abuse it: but it is of the earth earthy after all, and when it comes into contact with these hearts of ours it will corrupt and corrode.

II. Secondly, as there is a vice to be shunned so there is

A VIRTUE TO BE SOUGHT.

The theme is much more pleasing now that we speak upon CONTENTMENT. "Be content with such things as ye have."

It is, after all, no very great virtue if we should attain it: the more pity, therefore, if we should miss it. The old moralists constantly twit us with the fact that we may have the necessaries of life upon very easy terms, whereas we put ourselves to great pains for its luxuries. There have been contented persons whose heads have been clear, their hearts simple, and their habits temperate, though they have not known the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. We ought surely then to rise to that low average of sanctity in which our moderation shall be known unto all men.

To be content with such things as we have should be specially easy to us, because we have so much to be thankful for, such constant communications from the great Benefactor, and so certain an assurance that He will withhold no good thing from those that walk uprightly. I am not speaking now of those who have houses and land and goods in abundance, for their repinings are discord indeed; but I speak of all Christians.

This world is ours, and worlds to come. Earth is our lodge, and heaven our home. It ought to be easy for us to be contented since all things are ordered for our good. Arranged by our own dear Father's hand, His appointments ought not to be difficult for a loving child to approve. The trial of our faith will soon be over; a long life of affliction is but a pin's point of time. Be it never so painful, we ought to be willing to bear the light affliction, which is but for a moment. We know that God loves us, for we feel His love shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. Should not contentment be easy under such circumstances?

I believe that contentment depends very much upon taking right views of things. There is, to wit, a short view. To live by the day is the way to be cheerful. If you try to live by the month you will bring home a month's troubles to eat up a day's meat. God has not constructed His people to live by the month: their souls, like their bodies, are fashioned to live by the day. His supplies, His promises, the very prayers He puts into our mouths, all deal with days: "Give us this day our daily bread." "As thy days so shall thy strength be." Live by the day, then, and you will be content Take also long views as well as short views. Take the view which says, "It will be all the same a hundred years hence." Take the view which says, "We shall soon laugh at this present little vexation." Take that distant view which says, "When I get to heaven, this great trial will seem very small: when I look from the hill-tops of glory at my present dilemma, it will probably cause me many a smile, to think that I should have been so vexed and tormented by it." Take this view of things—that a man's life consists not in the abundance of the things that he possesses. Full often the more your goods increase the more your cares multiply; the care to keep is often greater than the care to win; while, after all, the care rightly to use ought to be the most weighty care of all.

If thy God has loaded a neighbor with ten thousand a year, thank God that He has not burdened thee in that way. Be glad if He has given thee as much as thou canst carry easily, and no more. When I go for a walk, I like a staff—just one, but I should not like to be compelled to carry a hundred. Some men appear to me to have a hundred times as much as they can possibly want, and so they are hampered with what might, in moderation, have been their help. Be not eager for great riches, nor seek after large domains in this world, lest thou wallow in wealth, stick in it as in a bog, and drown thy soul. Why load thyself with more clay when thou hast as much to carry now as thou canst well get along with? Be not surprised, therefore, any of you, but rather be thankful if God doth sometimes lighten your load a little to quicken your pace in the heavenly journey.

The secret of true contentment, and the way to get at it, is admirably expressed in these words, "Be content with such things as ye have; for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Some of the most easy-going people in the world are those who have a government pension of so much a month. It is little, but it is sure. If all the banks break, they will get it. They have no trouble as to how the markets fluctuate, or how different stocks rise and fall in value; or what dividends they might derive from investments. It is not a large income that falls to their lot, 'tis true; but then it is all they require, and it is always sure. You say to such a person, "You may set your heart at rest, because your supplies come from a sure source."

Now, then, that is exactly where the child of God stands; for ye know who hath said, "Thy bread shall be given thee, and thy water shall be sure." Between now and heaven I do not know who may starve; but I never shall, because the Lord is my Shepherd, and I shall not want. Those clever lawyers, those sharp-teethed schemers, those greedy oppressors, those young lions, may lack and suffer hunger; but they that fear the Lord shall not want any good thing The Christian man's fortune is made. "Oh! but he may be in great straits." Yes, but he shall be supplied in due time. All that he needs in this time state his heavenly Father will give him. He wants but faith to believe this, and he shall find it to be really so: "for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

God's word ought to be taken as truth itself. A promise from the mouth of God is better than a bond signed and sealed by the wealthiest of men. No negotiable securities can be comparable in value to this declaration of the Lord, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." It is put very strongly. In the original there are five negatives, as in the verse you sang just now:

"The soul that on Jesus hath lean'd for repose,
I will not, I will not, desert to his foes;
That soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake."

The five negatives in the last line of that verse correspond with the five placed in this text—"I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

It means that in no one single instance will the Lord leave thee, nor in any one particular will He leave thee, nor for any reason will He leave thee. If thou hast cast thyself upon His infinite power and grace, He will carry thee to the end. Not only will He not desert thee altogether, but He will not leave thee even for a little while. He may seem for a small moment to hide His face from thee, but He will still love thee and still supply thy needs. Behind the wall He will pour oil upon the flame if in the front of the wall He permits Satan to throw water upon it. He will feed thee somehow—by the back door, if not by the front—by the ravens, if not by the doves. If the brook Cherith fails, He shall find a widow woman, even in a distant land, who in all her straits shall, nevertheless, feed the servant of God.

Buckingham Palace has not a drawing-room to compare with that little room upstairs against the thatch, or with that garret where you cannot stand upright, where the stars peep in at night between the tiles. If God be there, I would sooner live in the worst cottage's worst room, on the pittance of the parish, than where the floor was paved with marble and the richest hangings adorned the ample chambers but the divine glory was unknown. If God be there—("I will never leave thee")—then wherever the child of God is cast, there is a glory round about him which makes him sublime in the midst of his poverty.

III. Our last point, upon which our time will only admit of a word or two, is the CONFIDENCE with which we may encourage ourselves and bid defiance to a frowning world. "So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and what man can do unto me."

This promise of the Lord is fitted to nerve us with courage, as well as to solace us with contentment. Chicken-hearted and craven fears ill become the disciples of Christ. If we are oppressed, or if we have to encounter opposition, we may just go straight ahead in the strength of our text, and say, "What can man do unto me?" If God be our helper, dear brethren, why should we shrink or falter; why should we droop or look dismayed; why should we hold our peace or speak with bated breath? Are there any of you who are afraid to confess my Lord's name before men, to enlist in His service, to buckle on His armor, to avow yourselves His followers? Parley no longer, I beseech you, with such ungracious fears.

Great thoughts have stirred within your breasts while we have presented the consoling word, and the Spirit of God has rested upon it. Be great in act as you have been in thought. Since He has said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," why are you ashamed to come and own Him? "I am afraid I might dishonor His name," say you. But He has said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." "I am very weak," say you. He has said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." "I might bring dishonor upon the church to which I should unite myself." Very likely you would if He left you, but He has said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." It is always safe to do what God bids. There can be no sound policy in neglecting a divine precept. So come forward and say boldly, "The Lord is my helper."

Possibly some of you have been persecuted. Hard names have been hurled at you: I hope you did not cry because of that. Poor child of God, thy strength is very small if thou art afraid of an ugly name. We have had a good many in our time; they have not broken any of our bones, nor will they injure you. "Oh! but you do not know what the chaff of the shop is." No, but give them some of your wheat in return. Let them see how a Christian can bear and forbear when their fun grows foul; how he can endure reproach for righteousness' sake.

"Alas, sir! but I am threatened with the loss of my situation unless I will go contrary to divine commands." Then do not flinch, but tell your heavenly Father all about it. Commit your cause to Him. Let not fifty places or five hundred people make you swerve from the course that faith dictates and duty demands. Appeal to God, and He will provide for you. Any temporary loss you may sustain will be much more than made up in the prosperity He awards you: or if not in that way, in the peace He vouchsafes you and the honor He confers on you in suffering for Christ's sake.

Oh that this very night the veil might be taken off many faces, the burden unloaded from many shoulders, and fear dispelled from many hearts! If you have cast off your grievous disquietudes while I have been talking, do not put them on again when you get outside. I have known many a poor tried child of God forget his trouble when he was sitting here, but he looked it up before he reached his home, and so he returned to his old condition. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee. He will never suffer the righteous to be moved."

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

TAKE HOLD AND HELP.

A SCHOOL-TEACHER relates the following incident as observed from her window: "Two colored men were engaged in loading cotton bales. One of the men shirked. Although he went through all the motions, he did not help much in the work, while the other used all his strength. Finally, he turned to his fellow-laborer, and surveying him from head to foot, said, 'Sambo, are you a Christian?' 'Yes.' 'Then take hold and help.'"

There are many who make a profession of Christianity but do nothing to help the cause of Christ in the world. Their common excuse is, "I am poor, I am weak, I am unlearned—what can I do?" If you are a Christian you can do something. Think of the widow and her two mites.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

WHO SAILED IN HER—AND WHY.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

THE intelligence that the Eglantine had sprung a leak spread rapidly through the ship. Every man knew what that meant. It sounded in their ears like a death-knell, and all knew that the last enemy had come terribly near them.

For a moment Captain Thorpe was stupefied into silence; then he gave orders mechanically to man the pumps.

Christian, in the cabin below, knew nothing of the dismay above. The roar of the tempest was all that he could hear; but the falling of the wind was bringing with it hope, when the captain's hand fell on his shoulder, and in his face he read the fatal truth.

"The men are hard at work with the pumps, Mr. Christian, but it is of no use; the water is rising rapidly, and the hold is filling!"

Slowly Christian seemed to comprehend his meaning.

"And the pumps are our last chance!" he said.

"Our last chance, and it is failing!"

He went back to the deck, and Christian rose to follow. But his head swam, and he sank back into his seat. Until that moment he had not entirely given up hope. Now the fiat had gone forth and he knew what was coming.

"Lost!" he murmured, "lost! God forgive him!"

How long a time had passed he did not know when he heard the captain's voice in his ear.

"Come, sir; the boat is ready."

They went up and found the men waiting for their captain. It was early morning dawn, and their faces were haggard with suspense and fear. They were no cowards; but death was staring them in the face, and they dared not look at it.

"The boat won't hold all, sir," said one, with eager, pleading eyes. He was only a boy, and a widowed mother waited his coming in the little cottage-home, and—life was sweet.

"I know it," was the calm reply. "My men, some must stay behind! Who shall it be? Who will stay with me?"

"And me?" said Christian, stepping to his side.

There rose a murmur from the men. Not one among them but loved and respected the man who had voluntarily undergone discomfort and inconvenience for their sake, and they revolted against leaving him there to die.

"Not you, sir! not you!" said Cairns, imploringly. "Let me stay instead. There is room for all but two, Captain," he said, turning to Thorpe. "Jackson was washed away by that last wave! Mr. Christian can go in his place!"

The captain stretched out his hand. "You are a brave man to die with, Cairns," he said, simply.

"Now, sir, if you please; there is no time to spare."

"What do you take me for?" cried Christian, his eyes gleaming with passionate anger and indignation. "Get in this moment, Cairns!"

"But, sir!" he pleaded.

"Do you hear what I say?" came the stern, peremptory words, for it was no time for gentle persuasion. "Do as I command you."

A strange lull had fallen on the fury of the storm, and the Eglantine was filling fast. The men had crowded into the boat, and were waiting for the word to push off.

"Go," repeated Christian, "and take this for my father. Give it him from me." He placed a letter in his hand as he spoke, and pushed him towards the boat. For one moment Cairns hesitated, and then he threw up his arms passionately.

"What! go and leave you here to die! when I was the one as made you come? Dash it all, sir, am I a brute? Why, the very dogs stay by their drowning master. Push off, mates; I'm going to stay. Here, Ned, take this letter for Mr. Hilliard. Good-by, mates!"

With his own hand he unfastened the rope, and the next minute the boat was far from the fast-sinking ship. The young boy cowered down in his seat, and hid his face with a shuddering gasp. "I wish I'd stayed!" he moaned. "I'd rather have died with them; they're good men."

"Don't talk of dying, lad," said one, kindly. "We'll get home yet."

And so they left the Eglantine to find her last resting-place in the shadowless depths of the wild Atlantic; while they pulled hard in the forlorn hope that their frail bark might even yet carry them to their homes in England. A forlorn hope indeed, but they knew that so long as they could keep afloat there was always the chance that they might be seen by some passing steamer, and be rescued from their perilous position.

But what hope was there for the three men left behind on the sinking ship? Oh! it was hard to stand there helpless to meet death. It was a brave and a noble act, but what a fate was theirs, to be cut off in health and strength, the victims of that merchant's lust of gain. It was a murder, a cowardly murder, and the conviction that it was so, was the indignant thought in every mind on board the boat, as on board the wretched and fast-sinking Eglantine. But while they grieved for their comrades left behind, it was of no use for that boat's crew to waste their time and energies in idle sorrow. This was no time for sentiment, and sailors are not the men to indulge in it to any extent at any time, and least of all when their lives depend on their most strenuous exertions. So, banishing the thought of their friends, they bent to their oars, while Ned Wright sat in the stern, the tiller ropes in his hand and Christian Hilliard's letter to his father in his pocket.

Meantime, news of the Eglantine was being eagerly looked for in England. Not only in the merchant's office by the clerks, who had all learned to like Christian, with his frank, manly ways and his ready sympathy and consideration for any, even the humblest among them, but by gentle eyes that had never ceased to yearn for the sight of his beloved face. Maud Ingleton had for months shown an interest in the newspapers she had never felt before; but it was no general interest, as any one could see who watched her, for a very few minutes sufficed to exhaust her interest in the voluminous intelligence. The Eglantine was not in the list of ships arrived—that was all she learned day by day. That was the name for which she sought, and not finding that, she looked no further; for that name was related to all she held dearest, and to which her earthly happiness was bound.

Many were the prayers she offered for her lover's safety, and many a night when the wind was blowing hard round her house she would toss uneasily in her sleep and awake to listen to its howling. Then her thoughts would fly to the dear one for whom she yearned, and rising from her couch she would spend hours in wrestling in prayer for his life with Him whose the sea is, "for He made it."

In the merchant's solitary mansion, too, the first news of the Eglantine was eagerly looked for. Mr. Hilliard never mentioned the ship, but those who saw most of him knew how anxiously he anticipated her arrival. As the time when she was due drew nearer, the tension on his mind became almost intolerable to him, and it was only by a strong effort he could maintain the outward serenity of his usual manner.

He had more cause for anxiety than any other, for he alone knew how terrible was the risk he ran; and now he knew that if that ship was lost and his only son in it, his loss and the grief that would result to him would be a just retribution for his sins. His hopes built on his son's future would be shattered; the ambition of his life had been to leave that boy in a position to take a high rank among the merchant princes of the land; he had done his best to prepare him for such a position, had spent large sums on his education, and now all his hopes were embarked on a crazy vessel in mid-Atlantic. Such folly in a worldly point of view seemed besotted, and he trembled as he ruminated upon it.

The time came when the Eglantine might be expected, but no news came. Mr. Hilliard did not despond, for contrary winds might have delayed her, and many ships had arrived safely which were far longer overdue. Still no news came, and every morning as he went to his office he wondered whether this day would bring any tidings. The anxiety was preying upon him, and the clerks noticed that he was more querulous and irritable than heretofore.

At last the news came—the dread news of the loss of the vessel. It came one morning early. Mr. Hilliard had not arrived, and Mr. Headson, the chief clerk, had seized the telegram and perused it eagerly as soon as delivered. With deep and sincere emotion he proclaimed the sad intelligence to his fellow-clerks, and then all work was suspended, and they gathered around him with eager questioning.

"You'll send to Mr. Hilliard at once, won't you?" said one. "How do you think he'll take it?"

A sudden silence fell upon the group, as, at the mention of his name, Mr. Hilliard appeared in the doorway.

"Good-morning, gentlemen," he said, with icy coldness. "I am glad to find your time so well employed. Perhaps, however, if you have had sufficient recreation, you will oblige me by returning to your desks."

They took their seats in perfect silence, for the first time untouched by his hated sarcasm; and he passed on into his private office, Headson following. As he shut the door, Mr. Hilliard turned sharply round.

"What do you want?" he asked, with the quick accent of irritation. "When I wish for your presence, I will ring."

"An important telegram has just come, sir," was the hesitating reply. "I thought it best to tell you at once."

There was something in his tone, something in his face, which drew Mr. Hilliard's attention. "What is it?" he asked.

"Bad news of one of the vessels, sir. I fear it is lost," answered the clerk, wishing himself anywhere but where he was.

An awful suspicion began to dawn upon Mr. Hilliard's mind, and he stood gazing before him with paling face. "Is it——?" He paused, unable to frame the name, while the cold, damp perspiration broke out upon his forehead.

"Is it the—Eglantine?" With stern determination he forced his lips to utter the words, clasping with iron grasp the back of the chair by which he stood.

"Yes, sir; she sprang a leak, and—"

"Are they saved?"

Headson started; the voice was so strange and dull.

"Some of them, sir," he answered, reluctantly. "Most of them, I may say, but—"

He could not tell the fated truth, could not utter the words which Mr. Hilliard was waiting to hear.

"And my son is dead?" came the slow, forced words.

"I fear so, sir; and the captain and Cairns. The rest are saved."

"Let me see the telegram."

Silently he laid it on the table, and went out, leaving him alone in the strange stupor of an overwhelming horror.

"The Eglantine was lost, and his son was dead."

None knew what he suffered then; it was a horrible agony, and it seemed like a deathblow. He had fought with a stronger than himself and was worsted. For a long time he had disregarded God's laws with impunity. It had seemed to him as to thousands of other sinners, as if God were "altogether such an one as themselves;" but now sudden destruction seemed to have come upon him, and there "was none to deliver."

For a long time he sat there motionless, overwhelmed with the calamity. At last he arose, took up the fatal telegram, and left the office. He would go home and bear his trouble there, he thought; and so, without a word to his employés, he passed out, a weary, broken-hearted man. He reached the handsome mansion at last, and entering, went straight to his own room and shut himself in, alone with his sorrow.

Later in the evening a roughly-clad boy approached the same doors, and knocked. The footman opened the door, and fancying from the lad's dress he was some tramp applying for relief, was about to bid him begone, when he said boldly and in a voice unlike a beggar's:

"Can I see Mr. Hilliard?"

"What do you want him for? He won't see you," was the supercilious reply.

"Yes, he will, if you tell him I have something to tell him about Mr. Christian. I belonged to the Eglantine."

The footman drew back instantly, his look and tone changing. "Come in and sit down. I'll tell master you're here," he said, leading the way to the housekeeper's room. "He's over his wine now, and don't like to be disturbed."

The boy drew back. "I can't wait long. Just you tell him it's Ned Wright, who went to sea 'long with Mr. Christian, will you? I've got something for him."

"What is it?" asked the man, his curiosity excited. "Let me see."

"You can't see nothing but an envelope, and that won't satisfy you," replied the boy. "I must see Mr. Hilliard himself, and I will give the letter to no one else."

Mr. Hilliard sat alone in his luxuriously furnished room, gazing with vacant eyes into the blazing fire. His glass of wine stood by his hand untouched, and for the last hour he had not moved. At the sound of the opening door he started, turning his head with a shrinking fear.

"If you please, sir, here's a boy who was on board the Eglantine: he's got a letter for you," said the man, apologetically.

Mr. Hilliard stared at him with dull, lustreless eyes. "The Eglantine—a letter," he repeated mechanically.

"From Mr. Christian, sir," was the subdued reply. "May he come in?"

At a sign from his master he beckoned the boy to enter, and then went out, shutting the door.

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE

at the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York.

CLOSING SESSION.

Mr. W. Reynolds, the president of the Conference, in opening the last meeting, started the well-known hymn "When Jesus comes," and in doing so related the following connected with its composition. He said:

"I never sing this hymn without thinking of the circumstances under which it was written. The late Mr. P. P. Bliss was my guest one evening, and after sitting in my parlor and talking about the Lord Jesus Christ, he retired about eleven o'clock to his room. The next morning he went down, opened the piano, and went to singing this hymn. He said when he retired his soul was so full of the subject he had been talking about, that he lay awake nearly all night, just composing this hymn. It gained its birth at that place, and I never sing it without thinking of that glorious man. They said he was not a believer in this doctrine. I know he was a firm believer in it, and looked for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ."

It had been felt that the Conference should not be concluded without some permanent and tangible result being effected which should remain as a record of the conclusions arrived at by the distinguished and able men assembled at its sessions. A committee was therefore appointed, and instructed to prepare a body of resolutions which should express, in a concise form, the doctrines held and agreed upon by the divines who had attended and taken part in the conference.

The following

were submitted by the committee, and carried nem.-con. in the crowded meeting.

I. We affirm our belief in the supreme and absolute authority of the written Word of God on all questions of doctrine and duty.

II. The prophetic words of the Old Testament Scriptures, concerning the first coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, were literally fulfilled in His birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension; and so the prophetic words of both the Old and the New Testaments concerning His second coming will be literally fulfilled in His visible bodily return to this earth in like manner as He went up into Heaven; and this glorious Epiphany of the great God, our Saviour Jesus Christ, is the blessed hope of the believer and of the Church during this entire dispensation.

III. This second coming of the Lord Jesus is everywhere in the Scriptures represented as imminent, and may occur at any moment; yet the precise day and hour thereof is unknown to man and known only to God.

IV. The Scriptures nowhere teach that the whole world will be converted to God, and that there will be a reign of universal righteousness and peace before the return of our blessed Lord, but that only at and by His coming in power and glory will the prophecies concerning the progress of evil and the development of Antichrist, the times of the Gentiles, and the ingathering of Israel, the resurrection of the dead in Christ and the transfiguration of His living saints, receive their fulfilment, and the period of millennial blessedness its inauguration.

V. The duty of the Church during the absence of the Bridegroom is to watch and pray, to work and wait, to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, and thus hasten the coming of the day of God; and to His latest promise, "Surely I come quickly," to respond, in joyous hope, "Even so; come, Lord Jesus."

The Rev. Dr. S. H. Kellogg, of Allegheny, Pennsylvania, made the following remarks on the influence of the doctrine on Foreign Missionary labor:

We hear this said constantly: "If you don't look for the conversion of the world, then there is an end of the foreign missions." One of the most venerable and beloved missionaries of the Church of God—his name well known in all the churches—said to me within a fortnight, with the tears in his eyes, in reference to this convention, that he dreaded the effect of it upon the foreign mission work. I told him it filled me with hope.

Look at the early age of the Church, as you have heard it already. The one age of the Church in which that faith was absolutely universal was an age in which the zeal of the Church in spreading abroad the Gospel among the nations of the earth was such as has never been seen, even in the nineteenth century. In my own case personally, a change of view upon the subject, from the doctrine of the universal conversion of the world to the faith of the Advent of the Lord Jesus to the hope of the world, was one of the most effectual and immediate motives of the occasion of my deciding I could not afford to stay at home; that if the Lord were possibly at hand, I had better be about my Master's business. Woe to that servant who neglects his Lord's commission if that Lord be at hand.

And let me go further. It has not always happened so, but there are many in the mission work who think differently from us on this matter; but in my own class in the Theological Seminary, where this doctrine was not taught, but the contrary, there were in all seven men who offered to go as foreign missionaries. They were every one of them Pre-Millenarians, and there was not a single other one in that class that so much as offered to go. They felt interest in the mission, but did not offer to go.

I can only say in regard to the mission of our Church in India—the Presbyterian Church—that a few years ago there I was curious to take a census of the Indian views upon this subject. I don't know how they stand at present, but I know at that time the Pre-Millenarians, as proportioned to the others, were about two to one; and I am happy to remark that two of those honored comrades of mine I have seen in this house to-day—missionary brethren, both Pre-Millenarians.

The Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, delivered an address on the "Imminence of the Appearing as an Incentive to Watchfulness:"

I was speaking not long ago to a number of people, not one of whom had any sympathy with this truth, and they asked me if I would say something about it, in order that they might hear what these people believed. So in my simple way I undertook to tell them, when a gentleman rising up in the audience said, "Do you say"—for it was what I had been saying—"Do you say that the Lord taught His disciples and left such an impression upon their minds that they were to be watching every day for His return?" "Yes, that is what I said." "Well, He didn't come every day, and hasn't come yet," said one; "were they not grossly deceived?" "Ah!" I said, "my friend, you don't understand it exactly. I will tell you how it is.

"This summer I was up in the country among the hills of New Hampshire, with my wife and children, and being called down to the city, I said to the children. 'I don't know when I may be back—to-morrow or the next day. You may be looking for me any day.' I did not think of the significance of what I said, but when I came back I confess I was somewhat startled and delighted to be told that every night the children had insisted upon being washed up and having on their best clothes and coming down to the depot to meet me. I did not do any harm by telling them what I did tell them. I simply said, 'Be looking for me.' What was the consequence of this?—simply that they had their faces washed and clean garments put on. That is what He meant—that we might be washed and have our garments always white, not knowing at what moment the Lord might overtake us and require of us our account."

Blessed be God, those who have felt the power of this truth know what it does. We know what power there is in this world to make a man feel the imperative necessity every moment of keeping his garments unspotted from the world and ready to meet his God.

I touch on this question, and there is another, not in its bearing especially upon pastors, but upon all Christians, in that wonderful account of Jewish worship by Dr. Eggleston. He tells something I never knew before. He said in a Jewish temple there were the night watchmen. They were set on guard to keep the temple. At hours of the night the overseer of the temple under whom they acted went about, just as is the case among us, to see that the men are at their duty, at their post watching; and said he: "It was not certain at what time he might come; at the first part of the night or at any moment he might suddenly come and surprise them; and it was a law of the temple if any man was found sleeping his garment should be stripped from him and burned."

Then I understood what the Lord meant when He spoke to us about having His watchmen keeping guard over the city at night. "Behold I come as a thief in the night, and blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." God grant that we may keep our garments, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming and Kingdom.

But, says some one, "This is not a practical doctrine, is it?" One gentleman, very eminent for learning and piety, said: "Why, you are making altogether too much of such a thing, to have a convention like this, are you not? Are you not exalting it too much? Is it so very important?" My dear friends, what would you think if—for instance, I appeal to the wife and daughter—the father starts to-morrow on a voyage for Europe. He embarks on the steamer, you see him off, and watch with straining vision as he disappears on the water. But as you are straining your eye to watch the last view of the ship, you see a boat put off from her side with three men in it. You wonder what they are coming back for, and you wait for the message that is to come. He simply sends back to say once more to "Be sure and not forget what he said when he went away."

Well, the disciples stood watching Jesus as He disappeared, and upon their straining vision, as at last the sight of that Blessed One was lost, don't you remember how those shining ones came back and said once again, lest we should forget it, "This same Jesus that is taken up into Heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into Heaven?" Don't you think that post-ascension Gospel was very important?

"But," says some one, "how in regard to its practical bearing upon Christian life?" Dear friends, I wish I could speak of my own experience in this matter. I have sometimes, I confess, been almost startled when I have heard the noise and seen the opposition—that which we especially see to-day—that I am found in such a company; and I am inquiring of my brethren, here and there, "How did it happen that you got into this light and this special way of believing?" Every man says: "I did not mean to do it, but somehow or other my attention was called to it, and I could not help believing it." That was the way with me.

A few years after I came out of the seminary I had a deacon who gave me a great deal of trouble on this question, and I confess I was very bitter, as many people are, because he would be constantly talking about this subject. He wanted me to argue with him, and I took my Bible for the purpose, and, dear friends, to my astonishment I was convinced he was right and I was wrong. Ever since I have owned it, and I do say in the presence of God and the angels to-night, that it has made a different man of me, and if God has helped me to do any work for Him from that hour to this, I can say with all good conscience, I owe it more to that one revelation that burst upon my eyes at that time, than to all other truths I ever apprehended. Why should it not be so?

If the thought is real to us, as it is to me, that before the sun rises or sets at any day my work may be ended; and it is a very real thought to me, and it makes me feel that every hour and moment should be used for calling out from among the people those that have been ordained unto eternal life, and making them a part, and giving them a portion as the bride of Christ.

Major D. W. Whittle, of Chicago, the well-known evangelist, made the following remarks:

I would rather have been silent in this Conference, and yet it is a matter of joy and rejoicing to add my testimony here to the truth as I understand it of God's blessed Word concerning our hope in the Lord Jesus Christ. I feel like just giving a word of testimony very much as I felt

ONE NIGHT IN THE ARMY.

It was near Mobile, and all day long the artillery had been concentrated upon the works in front of us, and a hundred cannons had been pouring shot and shell into those works. About midnight the order came for the infantry to which I was attached to make a flank movement and go into the works. Well, we did, and there we had nothing to do. The enemy had retired, and it has seemed to me, as we have heard these Methodist catapults and Baptist guns and Presbyterian artillery here during the last three days, as though they felt it was about in that condition, and that there was very little left for the infantry to do in this matter except to rejoice and take their places as under the flag to which they would be loyal.

Eight years ago the only call I ever had to preach the Gospel came to me. I did not know it was a call then, I did not know what it meant then, but it was the call of God to me, and I never got it out of my heart until I went out to preach the Gospel of the Son of God. On the streets of Chicago between ten and eleven o'clock at night, coming home from a Gospel meeting —and we had not been very successful, and we were talking together about what we would do just to try and get hold of souls and lead them to Christ—he stopped under a gaslight, opened his Bible, and pointing to this verse, said, in his earnest, unconscious way of speaking: "Well, Whittle, this is all that you and I have to do." He then read: "I charge thee, therefore, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and His kingdom, go preach the Word."

WITH MR. MOODY

That came into my soul, and it never got out of my soul, as being a sort of charge from God to preach the Word. I did not understand then the "appearing of Christ and His kingdom." But years after it did come to me very clearly, the full force of it.

Dear friends, it was no seeking of my own I am sure, no influence of any man upon me in any presentation of this theory that led me to accept the doctrine of the Pre-Millennial coming of Christ. I went to preach the Gospel, to lift up Christ before sinners, to give them the glad message of forgiveness of sin, and as I tried to preach that Gospel faith, believing in the forgiveness of sin, and that eternal life was offered to all that would accept Christ, it could not be avoided.

When I understood the judgment of Christ in its aspect of the living nations, when He should appear on this earth; when I understood the aspect of the Judgment Day—a period of a thousand years, not one literal day, but a long period, ending with the great white throne to judge the dead—the Gospel became a new power, and these Gospel messages had a meaning that I could give to all that would believe.

When I came more and more to understand the Gospel—that it is not believing doctrines about Christ, but believing in a personal Christ; that it is the apprehension of that living, glorified Son of God, and the laying hold of Him by faith that gives eternal life—then, dear friends, more and more I saw that faith in Christ is that which lays hold of Him as being up there in the glory, that which looks for the manifestation of Him as a living person, and it is very questionable to my mind about people having faith that do not look forward to Christ as in the future manifestation. What is your faith?—that He died on the cross and rose again? Why, that is a matter of history, simply historic faith.

The faith in the Bible from beginning to en is faith in the Word of God for that which is t come, looking to the living God to fulfil Hi promises. God reveals these things which ar to come. Does your faith lay hold of a livin Christ who is to come? Why a person become alive and real to us when we are looking for future manifestation.

If we are occupied with a past history he be comes without power to us. To-night the name of Lincoln and Stanton, while they woul awaken memories, would awaken no such thri in the hearts of the American people as the thir one of the number that we looked to during o war. Mention the name of Grant to-night ar a thrill goes through many a heart. Why? B cause he is alive. He is in Europe, and is cor ing home, and with many there is expectation his being with us, and of that which may cor in future. Aye! It becomes alive. It becom very real, and there is a power in His name to hose who look for His appearing.

So, dear friends, in these things, it seems to ome as a natural sequence of preaching the Gospel, and as I know the beloved brethren in he Lord, whom I feebly represent—those that have gone out as Evangelists, those that have been preaching the Gospel—they have had no onsultation, have been to no particular school of theology, haven't taken any man's especial doctrine, have never come together to compare views in the sense of regulating one another's views; but as our paths crossed we found we were in accord; that all were led in the same path of truth—Henry, Varley, Moorehouse, Moody, and Needham, and all these beloved brethren in Christ through all the country so far as I know them. Certainly I must protest in heir name and in my own name against the statement that accepting the truths of the coming of Christ paralyzes missionary effort or evangelistic effort. It was that which sent me out in the field; it is that which has kept me in the ield when oppressed by the flesh, and the world are led perhaps sometimes to think of turning away from it. It has been the thought of a personal Jesus, the Son of God in glory.

FAREWELL WORDS OF THE ENGLISH DELEGATE.

Dr. W. P. Mackay, Presbyterian, of Hull, Eng.

MR. CHAIRMAN: As I have been asked to speak the last words at this solemn meeting, I feel I need the prayers of God's people, because it is the last meeting that can ever be held of the same people gathered together. We can never all meet again at a convention on the earth; may we all meet at the great conference, the gathering to the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, which may be the next conference at which any of us meet.

A brother has well said, "Heaven would be no Heaven without Him, and with Him earth is Heaven." It is a remarkable thing that the fact of people talking about dying and going to Heaven is not found in the New Testament at all. Good people dying and going to Heaven is not in the Bible. I never heard of the phrase "going to Heaven" at all in the New Testament. What is it? Absent from the body, present in the Lord, if it is in the disembodied state. I desire to die and go to Heaven? Not a bit; nothing of the kind. I desire to depart and be with Christ. That is far better. It is Christ that makes the Heaven.

And how often do you find this talk at the gravesides of departed ones? "The Lord Himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout. . . . And the dead shall rise first, and we shall all be caught up to meet Him in the air." The Lord has given us a hope that the dead in Christ shall rise first, and that we that are alive shall be caught up to meet them in the air, and we are to comfort one another with the thought that our dear departed ones go away to be with the Lord before us.

Now we are going to separate, and the question is, What are we going to do? Is the Conference over and done? No. The speeches have been spoken, but the work of the Conference is now to begin. What the Conference has inculcated is now to be done, done in England, done in the United States, done throughout the world, done in your increased missionary collections, done in your renewed efforts. Let us go to our lonely standpoints, then, and testify for the Lord with all our might. We may not be able to work in the bright sunlight, but it is grand to be down in the shade working for the Lord alone. You may not command success, but you can do one thing better, and that is, you can be faithful unto death, and when He comes He will never ask about your success, but He will say, "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

The closing hymn, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," was here sung, and the chairman declared the Prophetic Conference of 1878 dissolved.

THE BUILDERS INTERRUPTED.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 26th.—Neh. 4: 7-23. Golden Text, verse 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day is an illustration of our Lord's precept (Luke 21 : 36): "Watch ye therefore, and pray always." Blessed and true is the work which is carried on in a practical dependence upon God, where every step has been gone over first alone with Him. Many a fault is made when men act first and then pray afterwards.

The building of Jerusalem was not carried on without much annoyance from the enemies of the Jews. They sought by ridicule to hinder the work, as many do nowadays. "What do these feeble Jews? Will they fortify themselves? Will they sacrifice? Will they make an end in a day? Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burned?" The human heart is the same in all ages; it is words like these which God's children hear continually. Nehemiah was wise with God's wisdom, and he knew it was useless to answer them, so he took the matter to God, and never attempted to prove to man the reality of the work he undertook. "Hear, O our God; for we are despised," etc. (verse 4).

Nehemiah relates, "So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof; for the people had a mind to work." But it was just when all seemed so satisfactory that persecution began. Why was this? God is carrying on the education of His children, and they have much to learn. Often when the work of God is prospering in a parish, there comes at that very moment some division among the children of God, some sectarian question, something that divides.

The enemies of Judah "conspired all of them together to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it. Nevertheless we made our prayer unto our God, and set a watch against them day and night." They did not trust in their watch, however, but in the living God, for "The Lord is good, a strong hold in the day of trouble; and He knoweth them that trust in Him" (Nahum 1 : 7). Oh that God's children would learn how real it is to trust in Him, how safe and how sure, for it puts an end to anxiety and worry, and all the forethought which wears out the nerves of so many Christians.

There seems to have been some discouragement among the builders, for Judah said, "The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall." When we look at difficulties, and become bearers of burdens, then no work of God can go forward in our hands.

Their enemies plotted to make a secret attack, but the Jews which dwelt by them warned their brethren, for God was nearer than their foes. So Nehemiah set the people by their families ready armed behind the wall, and then he addressed them in the name of God and said, "Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord." Here is a remedy for the fear of man, and for the fear of the devil and his temptations: "Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord." Ready to fight if needful, but with our eye on God, no enemy dares assail us, for our position is impregnable. "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10 : 19). And God was faithful. "It came to pass, when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to the wall, every one unto his work."

But the watching was not abandoned. They worked on in the consciousness that an enemy was at hand, and at the same time in the consciousness that the living God was at hand. Nehemiah divided his servants into two bands—the one to work, the other to hold the weapons. And "they which builded on the wall" (in the most exposed and dangerous position), "and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side." "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds" (2 Cor. 10 : 4); and well were it for us if we had our arms ever in hand; the girding of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God (Eph. 6 : 14–17). No true work for God can be done in an enemy's land, such as is the world we live in, if the armor of God be not appropriated as a defence against the enemy.

One more provision was made by Nehemiah. He said, "The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another. In what place therefore ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us." And our work also among the sick, among the children, in our Bible-classes, etc., is "great and large;" and so often is it true that we are so taken up with our own little corner in the vineyard that we are separated the one from the other. And this contrary to the spirit of our Lord's sacerdotal prayer (John 17). It is His will that we all should be one.

But we find from the sixth chapter that abuses crept in; self was not extinct, and there were usurers among the Jews then, as there haye been in more recent times. But let us not think that every Jew is a bad Jew. Nehemiah, on the contrary, not only put down this wrongdoing from the high motive that it would bring them into reproach among their enemies, but he was noble enough to refuse the tribute which was his due as governor, and to give free hospitality to the rulers, and to the Jews which came from other lands.

All this while, their enemies, Sanballat, Tobiah, Geshem, and the rest continued their plotting against God's people, and in chapter sixth we read of their making renewed attempts to hinder God's people. Now their attack was directed against the ruler in person. They sent to him saying, "Come and let us meet together in some one of the villages in the plain of Ono. But they thought to do me mischief." How did Nehemiah know this? Surely God had revealed it to him. His answer was worthy of such a man: "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?" Oh that every Christian would thus answer those who would seek to lead him into compromise, or to live at a lower level! Four times they sent to him, but he had no other answer to give.

They next attempted to put him in fear, by raising and spreading a false report. Oh how many Christians have fallen by this snare, and in attempting to justify themselves have failed in Christ-likeness of spirit! God can defend us better, and it is wise to leave it in His hands. So Nehemiah prayed, "Now therefore, O God! strengthen my hands." They next hired a false prophet to warn Nehemiah to take refuge in the temple of God to escape the malice of his foes. His first instinct as one relying on the mighty power of God was to answer, 'Should such a man as I flee? and who is there, that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in." And then he perceived that God had not sent him, but that it was a plot to make him appear afraid before his enemies, that they might reproach him.

Let us be careful how the words of man lead us to look to our own safety in any position in which we may be placed. If we treat God as though He were not trustworthy, we are taking our cause out of His hands. So in spite of all the malice of their enemies "the wall was finished." "And it came to pass, that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things, they were much cast down in their own eyes: for they perceived that this work was wrought of our God." And so will it be with us if we go steadily forward with any work to which God has called us, deaf to every other voice but His, undismayed by the threats and unmoved by the flatteries of man—then no power on earth or in hell can hinder us.

The French Elections.—A Republican victory was looked for in the elections for the French Senate, but not the splendid triumph that has been achieved. It was expected that the present Conservative majority in that body of about a score would be reversed, but the Republicans have outdone prophecy, gaining a majority of nearly sixty in the Chamber. One third of the 225 elective members of the French Senate retire every three years, and this election was to choose the successors of one such retiring section. In all, there were 82 retiring Senators, and more than three fourths were Conservatives —only nineteen being Republicans. The election has almost exactly reversed these figures. This secures the splendid majority in the Chamber already mentioned, and gives overwhelming assurances, not only of the wonderful vitality of the Republican party, but of the stability of the Republic itself.

The dispatches afford some striking proofs of the growth of Republican sentiment in France, in spite of the intrigues of the Monarchists. The returns already received indicate what amounts to a quiet revolution in the sentiment of the country, and it strengthens the Republican idea everywhere to have it proved again that the people of France have learned to make their revolutions in this way.

The Funeral of the Princess Alice of England, Grand Duchess of Hesse Darmstadt, was an occasion of sorrow more genuine and sincere than is often produced by royal obsequies. One of the European papers says: "The most sincere sorrow has been shown by the people of Darmstadt at the death of their Grand Duchess. The ladies of the Princess Alice Union, who, dressed in deep mourning, occupied the gallery of the chapel during the funeral service, wept bitterly as they remembered that they had lost their leader in all benevolent enterprises. Tears stood, too, in the eyes of veteran soldiers, who thought of 1866 and 1870, and knew how the Grand Duchess had been the Florence Nightingale of Germany."

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, after an absence of six weeks, was able to meet with his congregation on Sunday morning, December 22d. He was, however, far from well, and walked to the platform with extreme difficulty. Throughout the service the pastor leant upon a stick, and during the devotions was enveloped in a greatcoat. Her bore up bravely, but showed signs of fatigue when half-way through his sermon, and found it necessary to become seated while the congregation sang a hymn. In the course of the service Mr. Spurgeon made several direct and indirect allusions to his illness. "Our infirmity," he said in his opening petition, "makes us to be but a poor wooden thing; but let the wood burn, and we will glory in infirmity. We thank Thee, Lord, that we can again look upon this house of prayer—once more hear the voice of general song and join in it."

During his illness, though suffering excruciating pain, he revised a sermon every week for the press.

The Pope's Latest Encyclical must be an interesting document when read in its entirety, for it deals with Socialism—a subject that is just now perplexing some of the most powerful minds in the world. Leo has propounded a theory of his own in connection with the difficult problem. He states that "Socialism, Communism, and Nihilism are the product of the Reformation, and its natural development;" that the operations of the evil constitute a serious danger to the community, for "they militate against the civil state, rupturing the matrimonial tie, ignoring the rights of property, claiming every thing, however legally inherited or honestly acquired, and attempting even the lives of kings." And he announces that the only effectual remedy for the evil is, that "all the Principalities and Powers at once accept the church," i.e., the Church of Rome.

However correctly this social physician may have diagnosed the disease, most men will demur to his views of its origin and remedy. History is against the former, for the Reformation was notoriously the harbinger of light and liberty, and Socialism is the offspring of darkness and tyranny. The most terrible manifestation of it the world has ever seen was in 1789–92, in France, a country in which the principles of the Reformation never found congenial soil, and where its advocates, the Huguenots, had previously been exterminated.

The remedy the Pope prescribes will, by the majority of people, be thought worse than the disease. To accept the Church of Rome, as he recommends, is to submit to a tyranny of priests, always the most deadly form of tyranny, and one from which all free peoples shrink. The Pope claims infallibility, and may therefore think his ipse dixit sufficient authority, without reasons; but he will find "the Powers and Principalities" will require something more ere they take a potion so dangerous to the common weal; a quack nostrum as powerless against Socialism as were the celebrated pills formerly recommended by their compounder as "good against earthquake."

Mission Work in Paris and throughout France continues to make rapid progress; the blessing of God being manifest in the labors of Mr. McAll, who has for many years worked most assiduously in that country. In Paris alone Mr. McAll reports that there are now 22 missions with accommodations for 5000 persons. The weekly attendance is about 8000. Branches of mission work have been established in Marseilles and Lyons.

Restoration of the Jews.—Every line of prophecy in the sacred writings points to the restoration of God's chosen people, and it is singular to note how many signs there now are in the East of the speedy fulfilment of this prediction. And in keeping with this view, the London correspondent of the Leeds Mercury stated the other day, "as a fact, and not as a mere rumor," that "a syndicate is actually in process of consolidation which has for its sole object the purchase of Palestine from the Turkish Government, and its restoration to the Jews in some form."

Distress in Europe is still the prevailing cry from the East. From every country the complaint of poverty and want is heard. Decline of trade and stagnation in all departments of industry is generally felt. Since America ceased her fratricidal strife, and betook herself to economy and industry, as General Grant pointed out in his speech the other day at Dublin, she has appeared in European markets as a formidable rival, instead of an extensive purchaser; a change which to some extent has produced the collapse in Europe, and there are other causes not far to seek.

The present condition of English cities grows daily more serious. In Sheffield, it seems, there are at least 12,000 persons, belonging to a class who have been in the habit of earning good wages and have lived in comparative comfort, who are now face to face with starvation. In order to make up decreasing resources, furniture and clothing, bit by bit, has passed to the pawnbroker, and thousands of families are now crowding small rooms which present scarcely any thing but bare walls, bare floors, and bare cupboards to the unhappy inmates.

In Manchester a similar state of things exists, with the difference that in this city the impoverishment seems also to have reached a somewhat higher grade in the social scale than at Sheffield. Owing to recent great failures, large numbers of clerks, stock-keepers, commercial travellers, and others have been thrown out of situations, and many of them are reduced to the direst straits. Poor women and children, pinched and wan with hunger, shiver in their summer dresses, and husbands and fathers, in dumb anguish, look upon the necessities which they cannot supply. We fear that these sad details from Manchester and Sheffield are only specimens of what may be gathered all over Lancashire, in the Potteries, and many other districts.

The Earl of Derby, one of the most sensible and practical of English statesmen, in dealing with the subject at Liverpool on January 2d, took an exhaustive review of the condition of England's trade, and of the obstacles which stood in the way of its revival. He showed how the increased ability of other nations to manufacture for themselves was constantly diminishing the market for English goods, and how difficult it would be for England to keep on paying large sums of money in return for articles of food which she was compelled to purchase from America and other countries. The only remedy, his Lordship said, which suggested itself to his mind, after long and anxious reflection, was wholesale emigration to America and Australia, and he urged this with great earnestness.

A Father's Prayer Answered.—At a meeting in London, "for special prayer for the children of Christian parents," the Rev. Marcus Rainsford delivered an address on the encouragements to parental prayers. In the course of his address he related the following circumstance as happening in Ireland: At a meeting for united prayer, an aged gentleman was pleading very earnestly for his own son, an abandoned prodigal. While in the act of prayer a drunken brawl was heard outside, which occasioned a temporary interruption of the service. After the audience had dispersed, and the minister of the chapel was alone in the vestry, a stranger knocked at the door; on being admitted he asked for advice and prayer, saying that, in company with six riotous companions, he was passing the church, when his attention was attracted by a loud voice within, and, after listening awhile, he exclaimed with an oath, "There's my old father preaching." Presently he heard the earnest prayer for himself. Even in the midst of his drunken revelry the arrow of conviction pierced his heart. He quitted his companions, and now came to seek the minister's aid, exclaiming, "My mother's prayers of long ago are answered, as well as that prayer of my father." Under God's blessing this young man has become a converted man.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon and Neal Dow.—In a letter to a friend in America, Mr. Spurgeon thus deals with the statements of Neal Dow:

NIGHTINGALE LANE, BALHAM,
SURREY, Dec. 24, 1878.

DEAR SIR: If Mr. Neal Dow knew the truth, he would not make such charges against me. My manner of life is before the world. Ask them that know me. Whatever faults I may haye, I have been preserved at all times from excess, and I have given no ground for any one to accuse me of it. I use no alcoholic drink as a beverage, but I am an habitual abstainer, and as a rule, a total abstainer. "Beer," of which Mr. Dow speaks, I never touch, and I neve thought, much less said, that I could not keep up to my work without brandy and beer. I do not believe that these or any other stimulant are a help to any man.

Yours truly, C. H. SPURGEON.

Mr. and Mrs. Eli Johnson, of Brooklyn, at th invitation of a few Christian friends, recentl held a series of meetings in Bristol and Clifton The most important part of the work was in th drawing-room meetings for ladies, which wer held day by day in the houses of influential fam ilies in the neighborhood.

Mrs. Johnson's addresses at these meeting were of great and varied interest, and as th spirit-stirring history of what God had wrough by her and by other Christian ladies in Americ was listened to, it is believed that the questio went up from many hearts, "Lord, what wi Thou have me to do?" Mrs. Johnson, whi speaking with great moderation, and showin much sympathy with those who do not yet s their way to work in the cause of temperanc strongly urged upon Christian ladies that th should come out boldly on the right side of t question.

CALEB CUSHING.

THE announcement of the death of Caleb Cushing on January 2d, in his seventy-ninth year, recalls to the mind a whole series of prominent events in our history, with which his name is associated and which seem to this generation separated from us by a long interval of time. The truth is, that the magnitude of the struggle of 1861–5 has dwarfed into comparative insignificance the events immediately preceding it. To us they appear remote, though in reality comparatively recent. It is only when such an announcement as the death of Cushing occurs, that we realize how rapidly we have lived, and how many important events have been crowded into a single lifetime.

Caleb Cushing was born January 17th, 1800, at Salisbury, Essex County, Massachusetts, where his father was a prosperous shipowner. The name, says the New York Tribune, in that part of the State is both a common and a good one. He was fitted for college at a public school, graduated at Harvard College, second in his class, at the age of seventeen. Two years after he delivered a poem before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, and upon graduating A.M., an oration on the preservation of the Federal Union. In 1819 he was appointed tutor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard College, an office which he retained until 1821.

He studied law and began practice in 1822, his professional success being great and immediate. Newburyport, of which he had become a citizen, sent him to the State House of Representatives in 1825, and in 1826 Essex County elected him to the State Senate. Politics were not at this time very sharply defined, but Mr. Cushing is on record as a Republican. He printed in 1826 a local history of Newburyport and a treatise on the Practical Principles of Political Economy.

In 1824, he married a daughter of Judge Wilde, of Boston, a very clever woman, who in 1832 privately printed an interesting book of travels in France and Spain. In 1826 Mr. Cushing was a candidate for Congress, but failed of an election. He went abroad in 1829, and was engaged in foreign travel until 1832. Upon his return in 1833, he published his "Reminiscences of Spain." This contained several poems translated from the Spanish. It was followed in the same year by "A Review, Historical and Political, of the Late Revolution in France," in two volumes.

In 1833 and 1834 the town of Newburyport again sent Mr. Cushing to the State Legislature. It was at a period of great public interest in financial quarters, and Mr. Cushing's speech on currency and the public deposits was received by the Whigs with much approbation. In 1835 he was elected to the National House of Representatives, and being a great favorite with his constituents, he retained his seat until 1843, when President Tyler sent him as Commissioner to China for the negotiation of a commercial treaty, which was signed July 3d, 1844.

In Congress Mr. Cushing showed all the great powers of thought and perseverance he had exhibited in the Massachusetts Legislature.

He could make no decided mark as a statesman, however, for his party did not come into power till the assembling of the Twenty-seventh Congress, and then he chose to go with Tyler and the minority. When Mr. Cushing entered Congress John Quincy Adams was among his colleagues, and two men who were afterward to be President had seats on the floor—Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, and James K. Polk, of Tennessee (the latter being Speaker of the House). Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Silas Wright, James Buchanan, Thomas H. Benton, and others almost as eminent were then in the Senate, and claimed almost the exclusive attention of the country. At no time during the history of the country was the Senate more disposed to rule than during this period, for, though the House was an able one, it was no match for the Senate. In the next Congress (the Twenty-fifth) Mr. Fillmore was added to the list of eminent names which form the record of the time, and it so happened that he was to close his Congressional career at the same time with Mr. Cushing—the one as leader of the House in the Twenty-seventh Congress and the other as the leader of the administration revolt.

The Whigs had a majority in the Senate and elected a Whig Speaker and a Whig Clerk in the House with ease, but still there was no complete organization for many days. At last Mr. Cushing endeavored to push legislation, without committees and without rules, appealing to the majority, as the friends of the administration, to come to the rescue of the country and organize the House.

At the very outset Mr. Clay submitted a programme of measures in the Senate for his party in opposition to the recommendations of the President's Message. But Tyler was as anxious for a break with the Whig party as the Whig party was desirous of breaking with the President. When the rupture finally came Cushing was the champion of the administration, the Massachusetts Representative justifying the President in his veto of the National Bank bill and appealing to the Whigs to sustain the Executive. But the Whig party went with Mr. Clay and the Whig Congress and against Mr. Cushing and the "Whig President."

The natural result of the break between the Whig Congress and the President was the resignation of the President's Whig Cabinet. In the reorganization of the Council of State Mr. Tyler nominated him for Secretary of the Treasury—a nomination rejected by the Senate.

Newburyport once more sent him to the Legislature in 1846. He was one of the few men in that body who sustained the Mexican War. So strongly did he feel on this subject, that when with his most eloquent advocacy he was unable to get through a bill appropriating $20,000 for the benefit of the Massachusetts volunteers, he furnished that sum from his private means. The regiment gratefully made him its colonel, and in the spring of 1847 he went with it to Mexico, where he was soon raised to the rank of brigadier-general, being attached to the army of General Taylor, and taking part in the battle of Buena Vista. He was afterward transferred to the army of General Scott, under whom he served for the remainder of the war.

While still in Mexico, the Democrats of Massachusetts nominated him for Governor, but he was, as a matter of course, defeated. On his return, in 1850, Newburyport, equally as a matter of course, sent him to the State Legislature again, and elected him Mayor of the city. In 1852 he was appointed an Associate Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, but in March, 1853, was selected for the office of United States Attorney-General, which he held until 1857.

He was president of the Democratic National Convention which met in Charleston, S. C., in April, 1860. He joined the seceders from that body, and when they met at Baltimore in June following, he presided over their convention, which nominated Breckenridge.

When President Buchanan, still hoping for a peaceful solution of difficulties, bethought himself of sending a confidential agent to Charleston, S. C., to make some agreement respecting Fort Sumter, he selected Mr. Cushing for the duty; but, clever as he was, his mission amounted to nothing.

During the progress of the war he was not in any way engaged in the public service, but all his sympathies were with the maintenance of the Union.

Mr. Cushing was in 1866 appointed one of the board to codify and revise the laws of the United States—a work of considerable responsibility and difficulty. He was one of the counsel for the United States at the Geneva Conference, for settling the Alabama Claims. Dissatisfied with the course of Sir Alexander Cockburn, the British arbitrator, he criticized it severely in a volume published in 1873.

In December of that year he was appointed Minister to Spain, and while at that court di played great skill and good judgment in the a justment of difficulties arising out of the deter tion of the Virginius. He succeeded not on in securing the surrender of the vessel, but als in obtaining indemnity to all sufferers by the legal proceedings of the Cuban Government, to the heirs of those who were executed.

Since that time Mr. Cushing did not take a prominent part in political affairs, and duri the [illegible]st five years of his life lived in comparati retirement.

His last illness was a very painful one, and expired January 2d, 1879. He was unconscio during his last hours, and he had spoken duri the day only when he required attendance. P vious to last July Mr. Cushing had enjoyed cellent health for a man of his years, and he peared as vigorous as ever. In July he had attack of erysipelas, which broke him down parently, but he seemed to rally again, and made his preparations for returning to Washi ton after the recess of Congress. He had accepted an invitation to deliver an oration his home in this city on the 22d of February, the occasion of unveiling the new Washing Monument lately presented to the city by Da I. Tenney, of New York. About two weeks he began to fail rapidly, and on New Year's it was manifest that the end was near. He been perfectly conscious, and though he tal little he evidently realized his condition.

He had spent a very busy life, and many of services he rendered to his country were most valuable character. When there was to be done of a laborious and difficult natur was ready to undertake it, and never spared exertion or labor to do it well and thoroug A jurist, a diplomatist, a political manager, tor and oracle, a writer of rare powers of dic a learned historical investigator, a traveller comprehended at sight the situation of land he visited, he was also distinguished linguist and might have made his fortune wit or as a poet. As a representative and a ju he was eminently successful, and deserve gratitude of the people.

As a student, he was a most industrious painstaking man, and the knowledge he acq was probably more extensive than is poss by the majority of bookmen. What he he knew thoroughly; and he never lost poss of it, for his memory was retentive to a re able degree.

Yet, notwithstanding his many brilliant ties, Mr. Cushing was never a man popula the mass of the nation. By his conduct in when he deserted his party during the dency of Mr. Tyler, and by subsequent ac similar character, he earned the reputat being a clever but not a consistent man after all, consistency and sincerity cou much in the popular estimation of a poli Mr. Cushing may have had conscientio sons for his actions, but if so, they were appreciated, and he was generally regarded reliable. A politician less able, but with st moral forces would probably have comm far greater popularity than Mr. Cushin drew around him. Men with only a tithe abilities have climbed into the presidentia —a place for which Mr. Cushing was neve tioned. Great men are never perfect m while intellectual gifts are duly valued people, the defect they are peculiarly ind to overlook is the one, rightly or wrong puted to Mr. Cushing—that of inconsiste a want of moral principle.

He is gone; and just now we are m posed to dwell on the important and services he performed in the interests of tion than on the deficiencies of his ch Those services he probably performed m ciently than any other man of the day co performed them, and it is well for a natic it possesses men fitted for the work it have done. May our land always find su among her sons, whatever may be her the future!

SENSATION VERSUS STAGNATION.

An Anniversary Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached January 19.

"There arose no small stir about that way."—Acts 19 : 23.

Paul was in His Day called a Sensational Preacher—Sensation is Life—The Churches Turned into Sunday Dormitories—The Fault with the Preachers—Somnolence in a Service where All was Beautiful—Resolutions Formed Ten Years Ago and Kept—1. Never to be Dull—A Reminiscence of the War—Ministers Overloaded with Theology—2. Not to Attempt to Explain what I do not Understand—Many Things Known by Experience—The Pulpit should be a Great Fireplace—3. To Smite Sin Without Fear—The Reason Sin Triumphs, Ministers are Intimidated—Preaching After Actual Observation—4. To Preach a Religion that Would not Leave a Man in the Lurch—The Best Religion, a Through Train—The Road to Heaven all Tracked Up.

What was the matter? Paul had been preaching some sermons that seemed to upset every thing. People wondered what he would do next. What is that great bonfire in the streets of Ephesus? Why, Paul has been preaching against the iniquities of the day, until the people have brought out nine thousand dollars' worth of bad books and tumbled them into the fire. There seemed to be no end to his impertinence, for now he is assaulting the Temple of Diana, a building twice as large as St. Paul's Cathedral, London; its roof supported by columns of green jasper; its sculptured altars of Praxiteles; its paintings of Parthasius, and its audience-room capable of holding fifty thousand idolators.

In the month of May, when there were a great many strangers in the city, come there to buy medallion representations of that temple, Paul is thundering against it, until he completely ruins the stock of trinkets and spoils the medallion business, and the merchants gather together in a great indignation mass-meeting to denounce him, and say this thing must stop. Never before or since was there such a sensation.

Paul was

THE GREAT DISTURBER OF THE DAY.

He went to Iconium, and made a sensation. He went to Corinth, and made a sensation. He went to Jerusalem, and made a sensation. In other words, wherever he went, "there was no small stir about that way."

What is a sensation? Noah Webster says it is "an excited state of thought or feeling," and I cannot see any thing more valuable than that, if the excitement of thought and feeling be in the right direction. But as the word "conservatism" has been twisted from its noble sense to mean a stupid do-nothingism, and as "liberalism" has been twisted from meaning generous treatment of opinions of others to mean a surrender of Christianity, so the word "sensation" has sometimes been twisted to mean every thing erratic and reprehensible. But this I do declare: No one ever accomplished any good for church or state without exciting a sensation. Sensation is life. Stagnation is death. When sometimes I have been charged with making a sensation I have taken it as complimentary, and I have wished that the charge were more thoroughly true, and I promise, if God will help me, in the future I will make it more accurate!

I go on in this anniversary discourse, begun last Sabbath, and to-day speak to you chiefly of sensation versus stagnation. When I was a layman, worshipping in the pews, I noticed that religion was very often associated with dulness. I noticed in political conventions where the Governor of the State was to be nominated, all the people were wide-awake; but when they came into religious assemblages where Christ was to get coronation, many were somnolent. I saw that in assemblages where financial questions were being discussed people were all attention; but when, in religious assemblages, the question was whether men should be forever mansioned or forever pauperized, there was little alertness. I noticed in the court-room that when one man was on trial for his life, there was agitation and enthusiasm; but when in religious assemblage the eternal life of five hundred was being discussed, then there was somnolence.

I noticed what every layman notices and remarks, that there is something radically wrong in the Church of God at this day. In our boyhood days we tried every kind of art to keep awake in church. We ate caraway-seed, and cloves, and cinnamon, and held up one foot until it began to ache, and pinched ourselves until we were black and blue, or got stimulus from an older brother who stuck us with a pin, or saw the reproving look of some older sister that filled us with a sense of self-abnegation, until we looked up to the elders' and deacons' pew in the old Dutch church, and saw the seven sleepers (!) these consecrated men having lost their hold at the end of the second head of the discourse, and then we felt encouraged to think that, after all, there might be some chance for us when such very good men got asleep.

What is the use of hiding the fact that there is more sleeping done in the churches than in any other kind of buildings? Many of our churches are great Sunday dormitories. Men who are troubled at home with insomnia and cannot sleep on the pillow at night, find in churches sometimes the needed anodyne. What morphine and chloral and pillow of hops cannot do, sometimes the sermon and the long prayer accomplish. Said the old Puritan clergyman, "And now, to be brief, eighteenthly!" Oh, how many arts to appear awake in church! You have seen men put their heads down on the pew in front, pretending they are overcome with emotion, when they are really overcome with drowsiness. I tell you if we do not keep our audiences awake, it is the fault of us, the clergy, and not the fault of the people.

AN OLD SCOTCH MINISTER,

preaching, saw one of his hearers sound asleep, and he said: "Donald, wake up; if you can't keep awake in any other way, take a pinch of snuff." "Ah!" said Donald, "Doctor, put the pinch of snuff in the sermon!" With all the artillery of eternity at hand, if a man cannot keep his audience awake, it is because he has missed his calling. When men keep taking out their watches during religious services, it is evidence of the fact that they are bored. What would you think of a man at a banquet taking out his watch every few minutes to see how soon he could stop eating a cream meringue? The Gospel is a banquet, and our populations are starving for it, and their souls must have something to eat, and they have no patience with an entertainment which is all made up of napkin-ring, finger-bowl, and red tape. I put the complaint that the people do not come to church where it belongs.

I say to the young men who are entering the ministry, If you want an audience, do as Paul did in my text—make a big stir. "There arose no small stir about that way." Men want help. Give them help, and they will come again. What do they care about the conventionalities of religion. How much of your Latin do they understand? What do they know about those sesquipedalian words that crawl through your senses like thousand-legged worms? They know that your chief anxiety is lest you lose your place in your notes. They know it is all a matter of calculation that the soap-lock curl comes down half-way on your forehead, so that at the right moment you may brush it away with a hand delicate and diamonded. What do they care about your Arian controversy, when the controversy with them is how they can pay a note of $500 with $200, and how they can get comfort for the child they buried yesterday in Greenwood.

I judge other people by myself. I cannot keep awake in a religious service where there is no practicality. I went into for worship. I sat down. The church was not only beautiful, but the singing was beautiful, the sermon was beautiful, the organ was beautiful, the minister was beautiful; but there came over me a spirit of somnolence, and I made manful resistance, and after a while I said to my companions, "No use, I can hold out no longer," and I put my head down on the pew in front, and had one of the most refreshing slumbers in all my life! I committed no sin. The man who stood there for three quarters of an hour with posies, and didactics heavy as lead, was the criminal. As long as we stick to the mere technicalities of religion in our churches, a few people may come because it has been eternally decreed that they should come; but the great masses of the people will not come any more than they would come and sit down in an icehouse, or accept an invitation to spend an evening in the vault of a cemetery.

My friends, the great battle in this country is to be fought not between Christianity and infidelity, but it is to be fought between honest Christian sensation and putrid stagnation. It is high time we fetched up the cavalry. The big guns are stuck in the mud. The great danger for the Church of God in this day is not sensation, but stagnation. Sensation is life. Stagnation is death.

As I told you in the beginning of this discourse last Sabbath, that had been to preach a religion six thousand years old appropriate to the present time, so I now tell you, in the second place, that it has been my resolution, God helping me, never to be dull. There is something in our health, there is something in our lack of ventilation that makes us dull. The reason that ministers are the most merciless critics in all the world is not because their hearts are any worse, but because so many of them are troubled with indigestion. The entire draft is on the nervous system, and much of their life is a sedentary life, and it is almost impossible for some of them to keep well.

When I was editor of a religious newspaper and a book came in that I thought ought to be cut to pieces, I always handed it over to a clerical critic who had the worst dyspepsia, and he always cut it to pieces, and cut it to pieces enough. Let us, however, whatever the state of our health be, always fight against dulness, whether in the pew or in the pulpit—whether in the Sunday-school or in the prayer-meeting, and for that reason let us marshal all our faculties. If we have logical faculty, harness that. If imagination, harness that. If humor, harness that. If physical exuberance, harness that. There is not any thing that is available in a parlor, or on a lecturing platform, in the art of persuading people to right feeling and right action, that is not appropriate for the pulpit.

I shall before long preach a sermon on the sarcasm of the Bible. Elijah used it. Paul used it. Christ used it. If a man say a thing in church merely to make people laugh, he is reprehensible; but if he say a thing so strikingly true that people do laugh, that is another thing. I do not care whether they cry, or laugh, or hiss, or applaud, or get up and go out, or what they do, if they only quit sin and with fleet foot start for heaven. For this purpose we must ransack the mineral, the botanical, the agricultural, the æsthetic, the scientific, the poetic, the literary, the historical, the astronomical worlds for illustation. If we can not get any thing better than two flints, we must smite them together and strike fire. In vain the gold chasing on the hilt of the sword, if the edge of it is not sharp enough to cut. In vain the $100 rod and reel from Conroy's, with fly of gold pheasant or gray drake, if we cannot catch any thing. In vain the expense of the collegiate and theological education of seven or ten years, if we get hopelessly buried in our own armor.

DURING THE LAST WAR

I was chaplain for a few weeks in a Pennsylvania regiment, and I was told one day that there was a cavalryman sick and wounded, and perhaps dying, in a barn four or five miles away. I walked over to see if I could be of any service to him. He asked me to take his horse, which was suffering from lack of attention, and his entire equipment up to headquarters at Hagerstown. I consented, but knew not what I was undertaking, for I had on and around me on the horse a heavy sword, a carbine, pistols, saddle-bags, and a great many other things I knew not the names of, and I was so overloaded I had to go on a slow walk and hold fast to the pommel of the McClellan saddle, and when I got half way up to headquarters the girth broke, and I went off, and it was a great job to get loaded up again. In the woods all around about there were stragglers from the Confederate army, but they did not seem at all affrighted at my warlike appearance! When I rode up to the encampment, and the boys gave three cheers for the chaplain who had been so brave as to capture a horse, my embarrassment exceeded my exhilaration.

But I was then in the condition in which a multitude of us are in the ministry to-day—loaded up with equipment enough to slay Apollyon, yet we cannot wield it, and we go along on a slow walk, afraid that our system of didactic theology will fall off on one side, or our church history or homiletics will fall off on the other side—carefully guarding to keep our theology right side up, while David felled Goliath with a shepherd-boy's sling, and Shamgar slew six hundred men with an ox-goad. I believe in the day of eternity it will be found out that some backwoods Methodist minister who never had but three months' education in his life, but set all the prairies on fire with zeal for God, and in the summer preached to his audience in his shirt-sleeves, that he will be found to have done more for the race than some of us who have all the titles of the schools, and who wrap around us the gowns and the bands and the surplices, which are not enough to keep us from freezing to death in an ecclesiasticism twenty degrees below zero!

2. But I go further, and tell you in this anniversary sermon that in the decade through which we have passed I have tried to carry out the resolution of never explaining to you what I do not understand myself. I believe in God's sovereignty and man's free agency. Harmonize them I cannot. I believe God is one, and yet in three persons. How that can be I know not. I believe that Christ had in His nature the divine and the human. How they were interjoined I cannot explain. For years I tried to explain these things, but I found that was to make other people understand that which was beyond my comprehension. Sometimes when I had preached on the subject and hoped that it was plainer to the people than it was to myself, and pronounced the benediction, some plain man at the foot of the pulpit would ask me a question which would confound me, and I would have to tell him I would see him some other time!

Now, there are some things that I do know. Sin is wrong; that I know. Christ came to help us out of it; that I know. Christ has a sympathy compared with which fatherly and mother compassion is cruelty; that I know. His grace is mighty for mightiest calamity; that I know. The religion of Jesus Christ kindles in the soul great expectations amounting to a supernatural glee; that I know. That religion is a sedative to soothe all nervous perturbation, that it is a stimulus to arouse inertia, that it pulls up by the root the red dahlia of war, and plants instead thereof the white lily of peace—that I know. That it hangs around the dying couch of the Christian the saffron, and orange, and purple clouds of a heavenly sunrise, and swings back the gates of glory so wide that they shiver the gates of the sepulchre—that I know.

Now, knowing these things beyond all controversy, knowing them beyond all mistake, knowing them from my own experience, or from my own observation, what is the use of my taking your precious time and my precious time in telling you what I do not know

We had a great fire at my house the other day. I burned up five hundred manuscript sermons, for when I began to preach I wrote out all my sermons, word for word. In those sermons that I burned up I explained all the mysteries of religion, and the doctrine of election was as clear as a Scotch mist or a San Francisco fog. As I stood by the kitchen fire where these manuscripts were burning, I really thought they threw out more warmth than they had ever thrown out before! Really, the best thing you can do with any style of Christian work that has not warmth in it is to burn it. The pulpit and the church ought to be around which the people, benumbed of the cold world, can come and warm their entire nature. Stir up the fire around the great back-log and bring all the chairs up closer. There is a severe irony in the usual term descriptive of a minister's notes when they are called a minister's skeleton. Cold statements of truth are skeletons that weed round them the warmth, the life, and the eternal sympathy of Christ's Gospel. There is nothing in romance or novel so enchanting as the religion of Christ, if you see it fairly; but put it down on the dissecting-table of sharp analysis and rip its heart out, and you have made it loathsome and a corpse.

Again, in this decade in which it has been my happiness to administer to you, it has been my resolution (3) to smite sin wherever I see it, reckless of the consequences. The reason sin triumphs in the country is because we do not call it by the right name. Ministers of the Gospel were intended to be the Lord's artillerymen, and to fire away at iniquity wherever they see it, and let other people provide the ambulances. What has been the cause of the excitement over the sermons I have been preaching for the last three or four months? Because they were awfully true. You see a group of dogs fighting on the commons, and you throw a stone at them. Which one howls? The one that is hit.

The worst sign of the times is that the public make so many ministers hush up. You might as well try to stop Asiatic cholera, or yellow-fever at Grenada and New Orleans, by saying nothing about them. In order that I might take straighter aim at iniquity the dark places of our cities. The common-sense of the church and of the State approved what I had done. Any man's common sense, if he allowed his common-sense to come up, said: "You cannot forcibly assault iniquity until you see it." But there were some who did not like the way. They thought I ought to have gone down on Brooklyn Heights, and loaded my gun with blank cartridges, and then aimed over at the Fourth Ward, New York, and then turned my head the other way, and shut my eyes and pulled the trigger, and then started for South Bushwick!

Because I did not do that way there were some ministers almost frantic about my exploration of city life. They believed in the exploration of Africa by Stanley, and the exploration of the heart of the North American continent by Fremont, but were afraid of the exploration of worse heathenism within five minutes of the City Hall of Brooklyn, and within five minutes of Broadway, New York.

To hear some of my dear brethren talk, you would have supposed I had been the first clergyman that had ever made an exploration of underground life in our great cities. Why, I could call off the names of scores of ministers and evangelists in the country who have made the same tour. The police who took me around those nights told me they had taken them around on the same rounds. I could make a big disturbance, if I had the heart, in a great many churches in Brooklyn and New York; but I never make any disturbance! The difference between my exploration and the exploration of these other dear brethren was, that they said nothing about it, except among ministerial brethren, while I uttered it in the hearing of my people, announcing the thunders of the Lord God Almighty against the crimes, and warning the young men of this country to look out. The bar of God will decide which was the better plan—to look at iniquity and say nothing about it, or to look at iniquity and give the warning, not only so far as I may reach from this platform, but through these journalists, whom I shall to the day of my death thank for their kindness.

I preached some years ago in this place, about the average American theatre, and the people all over said: "Why, you are talking about the theatre, the historical theatre as it was two or three hundred years ago; if you want to see the theatre as it is now, or know about it, go and look for yourself." I saw there was force in the criticism, and I tell you if I ever treat those subjects again I shall first personally make a tour of the theatres, and I will see who is there, and I shall see what kind of plays they have. I am done looking through other people's spectacles! God has given me two first-rate eyes, and I am going to use them! But whether I denounce sin, or commend Christ to you, my dear congregation, I will always choose the most startling and arousing theme I can find, and bring to it the most startling and arousing illustrations I can think of, trying to produce the most startling and arousing results, willing, if I can save men, to be called by all the world a sensationalist. In this great lawsuit between Sensation the plaintiff vs. Stagnation, the defendant, I appear as attorney for the plaintiff.

But once more, and this will close these anniversary thoughts which I have been presentin for two Sabbaths. (4.) I have tried to presen to you a religion which would not leave a man i the lurch. What has the trouble with thos trains that came out from Chicago a week ag last Thursday? They started out beautifully an swiftly, but they came to the snow-banks an stopped, and the trains were disbanded. Oh my friends, we want to get on

A THROUGH TRAIN.

We do not want a religion which takes smoothly through this life, merely for a fe miles on earth, and then puts us out at th snow-bank of a cheerless grave. No! You ma take that train. I will not take it. I will sta on a highway where the marble of the tomb only the milestone on a road always brighteni and improving.

"Come with us, and we will do you good; f the Lord hath promised concerning Israel." have told the men who feel themselves to be t worst, that Christ died for them, and they ha come. And now this morning I want you all join me on this path to heaven. It is all track up. Examine these tracks in the dust of t road. Ah! those are little feet that have be tracking the road. Have you lost childre They went up this way. I see their tracks the road. But here there are larger footste but footsteps that were very short—very sh steps, as though they were the steps of the ag Is your father gone? Is your mother go They went up this way. And behold! in track of the road I see the mark of a foot t was bare, and a scar in the hollow of the fo Oh! it was the footstep of a wounded Chr This is the way—walk ye in it.

Edward Irving and the Glasgow Shoemak —Mrs. Oliphant, in her "Life of the Rev. Edw Irving," relates the following: "A shoema was a thoroughgoing infidel, and could not induced to speak on religious things. All sought to engage him were met by a cold sh der and a 'Humph!' Irving, in the course of parochial visitation, called on him, and know his man, took up a piece of patent-leather expatiated on it. This he could do admira as his father was a tanner, and he knew the cess well. The shoemaker did not look up, said, roughly, 'What do you ken about ther?' Irving, unabashed, went on, and des ed how shoes were being made by machin then the shoemaker slackened up his work, looked up, and said, 'Od, you're a decent o' a fellow; do you preach?' Next Sabbat shoemaker was at church. On the Monda ving met him in the Gallow Gate, and walked in-arm with him along the street. He was come, and became a friend instead of a fo Christianity; and ever after, when taunted his change, justified himself by saying, 'H sensible man, yon; he kens about leather.'

ARRATIVES FROM THE DIARY OF A CLERGYMAN.

“Was Lost, and is Found.”

Original Story by Mr. Henry Martin, Author of “Stories of Irish Life.”

arriage of a Priest with a Nun at Dublin—Excitement of the Roman Catholics—The History of the Case—Marriage of the Roman Catholic Mr. Cuffe and the Protestant Miss Kennedy—The Bridegroom's Sisters—Issue of the Marriage, Felicia Cuffe—Death of Mr. Cuffe—Plots against his Daughter Felicia.

On September 18th, ——, the parish church n which I was incumbent, was the scene of a ry interesting wedding ceremony, in which an -Roman Catholic priest was united in marriage r an ex-Roman Catholic nun. As is well known, similar union in the bonds of holy matrimony s witnessed in the early days of the great Geran Protestant Reformation. Martin Luther, e undaunted champion of a pure Scriptural th, whose invectives, fired with a heavenspired zeal, scorched and withered before all rope the corruptions of the Papacy, married atherine, a nun whom he had been the means delivering from the superstition, degradation, d misery of a monastic life.

The opponents of the emancipated Gospel, adocates of the old and tottering creed, affected to old up their hands in sanctimonious horror. It as, they declared, an outrage upon all that was cred and becoming for two vowed celibates, Luther and Catherine had been, to enter upon e married state. “Not so,” however replied e Reformer, always, as armed with the truth, crushing antagonist for his foes. “A false, eaven-unsanctioned vow, alien to the nature hich God has given us, is, ten times over, betr in the breach than in the observance.”

“And ye yourselves, O priests of Rome,” he lded, “are unwitting witnesses to the truth of ais; for ye have sanctified even to superstition ie nuptial tie. Ye have exalted matrimony to Sacrament, the seventh in order of your Aposte Church. Denunciation, therefore, of an initution not only founded on nature, but orained by God Himself in Paradise, is, from ou, of all things inconsistent and absurd. Marriage is honorable in all.’ Cease, then, O riests, your shameless speech! Set on fire your vil thoughts. ‘Whom God hath joined ogether, let not man put asunder.’”

The excitement and evil clamor which the marage of Luther and his Catherine stirred up in ermany had their counterpart, though of course ithin a narrower sphere, in Dublin, in conseuence of the wedding which has been menioned at the beginning of this narrative. The whole Roman Catholic population of the city was moved, while a flutter of winged words and thoughts disturbed many a monkish brotherhood. nnuendo and defamatory criticism were rife; mpure motives upon the part of the ex-priest nd ex-nun with unsparing prodigality were imputed, and that the more in order to weaken the force of certain most damaging rumors against he whole conventual system which the history f the nun-bride, as revealed at the time, had brought to the ear of the public.

“Marriages,” it is said, “are made in heaven;” and if ever the words were true, we beieve they were in the marriage which was thus called in question by an ignorant fanaticism and an interested priesthood; which opinion we hink will be confirmed in the judgment of every reader of the following narrative.

During the incumbency of my predecessor, a ady, whom we will call Alice Kennedy, of great personal attractions and of superior social position, was married to a gentleman whom we will name Walter Cuffe. He was a solicitor in good and increasing practice, of manly bearing and intelligent face; but as he was of the Roman Catholic faith, Miss Kennedy's friends were not favorable to the match. It was their conviction that mixed marriages were condemned by the Gospel of Christ, and seldom resulted in happiness. Her spiritual adviser also counselled her to beware; but, led on by an ardent passion, and trusting to her lover's sworn pledge of full liberty of conscience, she contracted with him that bond which only in death knows parting.

To do Mr. Cuffe justice, he faithfully kept, during his life, the promise of non-interference in religious matters which he had given to his wife. Well educated, and liberalized in opinion from contact with the world, and naturally honest-minded, he was more or less free from the bigotry of ignorance and the intolerance of priestcraft, and felt himself bound by his solemn word. It was not thus, however, with the members of his family, who, moving solely in a Roman Catholic social circle, were devotees in feeling, and prejudiced to their heart's core against Protestantism. His sisters, faithful to their Ultramontane sympathies, showed even at their brother's wedding the uncompromising character of their creed. They would not enter the Protestant church where the wedding took place, but sat in their carriage at the church door while the ceremony was being performed; and when remonstrated with for their conduct, replied that “they could not conscientiously enter a heretic church, nor patronize by their presence a nuptial rite which in their view could scarcely, indeed, be considered a marriage at all.”

When, however, the bridal party betook themselves afterwards to the Roman Catholic chapel to have the marriage ceremony, as is not unusual in these cases, performed a second time there, and some of the Protestant friends of the bride threatened to retaliate by remaining outside the chapel door, the Misses Cuffe professed to be shocked and indignant, and declared they would regard such a procedure as an unpardonable insult. So blind is bigotry, and so incapable of justifying in others the conduct which, with even a smiling conscience, it can pursue itself.

As years passed on, Mr. Cuffe grew in influence and wealth; his wife, too, although her husband's connections never acted cordially toward her, passed a tranquil and, as this world goes, a happy life; the laughter and prattle of childhood likewise enlivened the home — one little daughter by its presence enriched and blessed the household: we use the words advisedly, for how poor and dull the world would be without the sunshine of children! They are the charm and the poetry of life. Well has Victor Hugo, who has been called the poet of childhood, written—

“Beeless the hive, birdless the wire-woven bowers—
The home without a child.”

Mrs. Cuffe was permitted to bring up her child in the reformed faith, for such was the understanding before marriage with her husband in regard to any female children that might issue; and well and faithfully, even from the tenderest years, did she accomplish her task. Shortly after her marriage, she came under the influence of an earnest evangelical ministry; her spiritual life was thus awakened and deepened, and her intense desire was to see the peace and joy which pure religion had brought into her own bosom reproduced in the bosom of her child.

Her Roman Catholic relatives, however, were anxious, on the other hand, to rescue a soul from heresy, and the dread peril of those who, at best, must be relegated, in their view, to “the uncovenanted mercies of God.” Mr. Cuffe's sisters especially were in alarm about the eternal risk of their brother's child. They remonstrated with him, protested against the engagement which he had entered into, pronounced it most irreligious, and urged him, with passionate entreaty, to break it. When he refused, they resolved to lessen, as far as in them lay, the awful consequences which, in their belief, must overtake their brother's offspring should it live and die an alien to the Catholic Church. Consequently, before their pretty little niece was a year old, they managed, through the nurse, who was of their creed, to have it baptized a second time secretly by their own parish priest.

Such a practice, we are assured, has not been uncommon upon the part of the Roman Catholic nurses in Ireland; it is done generally from true affection. Attached to the children which they tend, they wish them to escape the evil of dying out of “the true Church”—that is, of passing, in death, not to heaven, but to “limbo.”

Such a revolution of the course of time, it is true, is not at all likely to come round, as the whole spirit of our age is set dead against the Papacy; but the fact of a child having been baptized into the Romish Church, even though the rite was performed without the consent of its parents, may be deemed warrant for a transaction unrighteous and cruel, such as it is one purpose of our narrative to record.

When Felicia Cuffe (such was the name of the child) was six years old, dreadful tidings came to her father's house. She was not of an age fully to comprehend their meaning; but the blank horror which, with instinctive perception, she noticed on her mother's face at the news, lived for many years in her remembrance—her father had been murdered. Through the influence of his wife's friends Mr. Cuffe had been appointed agent of a gentleman's estate in the South of Ireland. The whole country at the time was in a most disturbed condition, and lawlessness had its climax in the South. Landlords could not get in their rents, and the agents of those landowners who required the ejectment or distraint of their tenants enforced either measure at their peril.

Mr. Cuffe, when on a visit to the estate under his legal care, was waylaid and assassinated. Where the bodies of himself and of the driver of his vehicle were discovered, the road showed signs of a maddened encounter. It was known that Mr. Cuffe was resolute; but, taken unawares and overpowered by numbers, courage and personal strength had proved of little avail. The only result was a corpse more blood-stained, gashed, and torn, scaring the sunlight, and a highway more deeply indented by footmarks, as of those who meet in a last and desperate struggle.

Mr. Cuffe's sisters shared in the sorrow and the horror of their brother's wife, for they were really attached to the wretched man who had been ruthlessly hurried from existence. They at the same time, however, ascribed the terrible event to a judgment upon him for marrying a contumacious heretic, and supported their view by the indisputable fact that had he not formed a Protestant connection he would not have been the agent of a landlord the support of whose interests had brought upon him the hatred of his poorer compatriots and co-religionists.

Their whole aim ever after was by any method to get their brother's child from the tutelage of its mother. They were fully aware the success of such a scheme would, in all probability, break their sister-in-law's heart; saw that the presence of the child was the only pleasure that rendered life endurable to the grieving widow; but to minds under a fanatical spell this was of little moment. Were the rights of a parent to be respected when the interests of the “old religion” were to be advanced? for their niece was not only a member of “the true Church” by baptism, but an heiress in her own right; and besides, were they to risk a further descent of judgment from Heaven upon their family by respecting too nicely claims which, after all, were only based, in their mature maidenly notions, upon mere sentiment?

Their wishes and reasonings in this matter soon ended in a fixed determination; but how was a separation of the poor child from its fond and clinging parent to be effected? Persuasion with their sister-in-law would, they well knew, be utterly useless. Never would she consent to part with the only remaining light of her home and the darling of her bosom, and more especially for education in a creed which they heard her often pronounce both unscriptural and untrue. The law, they were aware, would neither enforce nor sanction such an arrangement as the one they longed for. One method of carrying out their purpose remained, and it seemed feasible—namely, to hide their niece in a nunnery!

PROPHETIC PROSPECT FOR 1879.

By Rev. M. Baxter, Author of "Coming Wars," etc., etc.

What will the New Year bring forth?—Modern Progress will not Culminate in the Millennium—Four Distinguishing Characteristics of the Last Year of this Dispensation Socialism, its Character, Actions, Resources, and Final Destruction—How Antichrist may be Recognized—Ominous Signs of the Times—A Computation of Prophetical Dates.

To students of prophecy and all others who know that the course of this world is not one of chance, but has been foreordained by God, and that the leading features of each dispensation have been clearly indicated beforehand in His revealed Word, a natural question at the present time is, What may the New Year bring forth?

Such an inquiry is reasonably prompted by the fact that the world is manifestly in a state of busy preparation for the great events that are to lead to the final catastrophe. The annual increase of armaments, and the unceasing invention of new and more deadly engines of war, and the general spread of a spirit of unrest, are a sufficient refutation of the idea that modern progress and the boasted march of intellect are tending to bring on the predicted time when the nations will not learn war any more, but will beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks (Isaiah 2 : 4).

Among the numerous events which, according to Daniel and Revelation, are to transpire in the closing year of the present dispensation, the following four occurrences are generally agreed by prophetic expositors to be clearly foretold to accompany the reappearance of Christ on this earth:

1. The restoration of the Jews as a nation to Palestine.

2. A state of general anarchy, characterized by excesses such as would not be believed possible amid modern civilization, and described by our Lord as a "great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world, no, nor ever shall be" (Matthew 24 : 21).

3. The supremacy of a despot called "the Antichrist," whose severity will be more atrocious, and his ungodliness more blasphemous, than those of the worst tyrant of ancient times.

4. A persecution of religion so extreme, that the Christian Church will appear for three and a half years to be almost extirpated from the face of the earth.

With reference to the first point, the prospects of the national restoration of the Jews to Palestine, or rather of Palestine to the Jews, appear more hopeful than they ever yet have been. Asia Minor, which includes Palestine, was placed by the Treaty of Berlin, in July, 1878, under the protectorate of Britain, which is now responsible for its defence from foreign invasion, and for the institution of reforms in its government.

It is obvious that this arrangement is calculated to lead to the re-possession of their fatherland by the Jews, and also to the political independence of Syria, which is an event foretold in Daniel 8. In that chapter Alexander's ancient Macedonian empire is foreshown to exist in the last days in its former subdivided state of four horns or distinct kingdoms, namely, Greece, Egypt, Central Turkey (Thrace), and Syria, and therefore the separation of Syria from Turkey must in due time take place.

Daniel's eighth chapter further states that at the time of the End a Little Horn or monarch, who afterwards becomes the Latter-day Antichrist, will grow out of one of the four horn kingdoms, by which we understand that he will first arise as monarch of a little kingdom carved and parcelled out of one of the four kingdoms of Greece, or Egypt, or Central Turkey, or Syria. And subsequently he will, according to Daniel 7, subdue three of the ten kingdoms (the ten consisting of those four and six others—Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Hungary),—and gradually develop into the universally despotic Antichrist.

As regards the second point, we see increasing foretokens of the predicted anarchy and tribulation of the last days in the present development of Socialism on the Continent, and in a less degree in this country. The aims of Socialism as well of Nihilism in Russia are—1, to abolish the idea of a future state; 2, to subvert authority; 3, to level all classes of society; 4, to allow no man a right apart from the will of his fellows.

Their character was signally illustrated in the first French Revolution in 1793, and during the Commune in Paris in 1871. On the former occasion the people, besides committing barbarities which would degrade Turks, solemnly bowed down and worshipped a woman whom they had installed to represent the Goddess of Reason—a proof that will stand to the end of the world that civilization is no guarantee against the most heathenish follies when men surrender themselves to the devil. "As they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind [marg., a mind void of judgment] to do those things which are not convenient" (Rom. 1 : 28).

The measures of the Socialists are exemplified in the unprecedented fact of four attempted murders of crowned kings during 1878. Such a conjunction of infamy never occurred before during all the political rivalries and religious strifes that have convulsed Europe since the days of Charlemagne. Further exemplifications of these measures are to be found in the explosion of bombshells among gatherings of work-people at Florence and Pisa, and at an august assembly at Pesth, when the Prime Minister of Hungary was present; also in the daring language used in the press organs of the party, which are scattered broadcast among the population for the purpose of fomenting discontent.

The means at their disposal are such as will probably insure the success of their aims sooner or later. They have a certain number of able leaders, competent to resist with steady skill the best efforts of statesmen to employ the resources of law against them. They can command the services of semi-idiotic creatures, reckless what risk they run, to assassinate a sovereign or blow up a meeting; they have an unlimited supply of money; and they are organized into a system scarcely less close, complex, and permeating than the Jesuit organization.

It is much to be regretted that the spread of education, designed to advance the poorer classes in all that was socially and morally good, has also had the opposite effect of giving those classes access to a vast ocean of poisonous literature, by which their worst passions are roused, while their weak points are worked upon by false statements and fallacious arguments. It is even the fact that there are influences within the Church of Christ quietly undermining the foundations of truth and godliness; for in the immense popularity of "broad" views, and in the high names associated with doctrines th atattribute to man's inherent nature the noble features that can be his only through the redemptive work of the Saviour, there is a dangerous power for evil.

Socialism will not die without a tremendous struggle, for it is the second of the three unclean spirits in Revelation 16 which are to gather the nations to the war of Armageddon, with which the reign of Christ is to be ushered in. This is in accordance with Hebrews 12 : 26, 27, "Whose voice then shook the earth; but now He hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. And this word, yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain."

Many predictions of Scripture teach us that we are to look for an outbreak of evil more furious than that of Noah's time, when "the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." The Flood proved that the destruction of the works of creation was not enough to prevent evil from again becoming predominant, if the seeds of it were left in the earth; and the experiment of the calling of Abraham showed that the attempt was equally vain to preserve a pure people from the corruption of sin by isolating them. The purification of the Church, like gold, is to be effected by the fire of devastation.

At the two prophetic conferences which were held in London and New York in 1878, and in which many eminent clergymen took part, there was a general consensus of testimony that the world's measure of iniquity is nearly full, and that a crisis is imminent in which there will be no hope for the Church until the Lord suddenly comes to its rescue. A tide of monstrous iniquity is already invading the world—irresistible and overwhelming.

The approaching close of this dispensation will find the civilized world convulsed with wa and revolution; much-vaunted liberty trodde down as it never was before; education, reason and morality mocked by the outright professio and open practice of idolatry; Spiritualism i startling forms largely accepted; religious freedom crushed under a persecution exceeding al that history has recorded; moralists and philanthropists making heroic struggles to rally peo ple's hope in "the ultimate triumph of truth;" the Christian Church overwhelmed with a floo of persecution; the cry, "Behold the Bride groom cometh" (Matt. 25 : 10), raised ever where with unprecedented energy; and man Christians at the point of despair. But at th juncture Jesus of Nazareth will come personall to this earth, and the vexing problem of philoso phers as to the possible end of the world will b solved.

The third point—the development of the pe sonal Antichrist—will be the inevitable cons quence of the second point we have mentione History teaches no conclusion of a popular re olution except its being crushed through th ascendency of a master mind. Regarding th character of the future Antichrist, it may be o served that he will be a mixture of monarch absolutism and lawless democracy. Nearly o hundred expositors believe that he will be a re resentative of the Napoleonic dynasty, "woun ed to death at Waterloo and Sedan, and destin to be healed of its deadly wound" (Revelati 13 : 3). Some persons believe that Jerome N poleon may be the man. The Antichrist w gain over by flatteries the turbulent mass whom he eventually subdues and rules. Fr the very circumstances of his position he will one who "fears not God, neither regards man and when his elevation has turned his head, th will be no assignable limit to the length he w go in glorifying himself and giving the rein his passions.

Of the approach of the fourth event—a u versal religious persecution—there is no parti lar indication yet. But we can point to the e dences of a spirit that only wants opportunity develop into a madness which will rest satis with nothing less than bloodshed and exti tion.

There is, for instance, the remarkable ani ity which the Nihilists and Socialists exhibit any form of religion. They are not conten hold their own opinions, nor to confine t professed reforms to the political sphere; apparently impelled by the spirit of the One, they go out of their way to display an availing resentment against all professors o ligion. When we consider the selfishness, obliteration of conscientiousness, the wan human feeling, and the implacable bitter that seem inseparable from the Socialist sp it will be seen how little is required to turn t resentment into active persecution of C tians.

A singular sign may be observed in the p ress of Ritualism in the most enlightened c try of Europe. Fifty years ago it would been pronounced improbable that in Protes English churches auricular confession shou established and nunneries set up in our m and that crosses and other images shoul openly worshipped in our churches, and pra cered to so-called saints. Yet we see that all ts has actually happened.

The predicted reign of lawlessness is already in i incipiency. Whether the movement in that cection is to be fast or slow, no one can deny tat it has already begun with a steady force, ed in the continual strikes and the increase of mocratic agitation its movements are clearly nifested.

The widespread distress and depression of ude are ominous signs of the times, and accord th our Saviour's prediction that before His cond coming there shall be "distress of na-ons with perplexity, men's hearts failing them r fear of these things coming on the earth," d "there shall be a time of trouble such as ver was since there was a nation even to that me time" (Daniel 12 : 1).

The prophetical dates of 6000 years from the eation of Adam, and of 1260 years (Rev. 11 : 3, 6) from the full establishment of the tempo-l power of Popery and Mohammedanism in D. 606 to 622, are computed to terminate about D. 1882, and the final seven years of this dis-nsation (Daniel's seventieth week, Dan. 9 :) may commence about that time with the edicted seven years' covenant between the apoleonic Antichrist and the Jews for their re-ttlement in Palestine and establishment of eir temple worship in Jerusalem.

Whether 1879 is destined to be a year of peace of war, we may at least rest assured that it ill witness the progressive unfolding of events troductory to the development of those occur-nces which, as just mentioned, are foretold in e prophetic page to introduce, probably in a w years' time, the Second Coming of our Sa-our Jesus Christ.

THE SEASIDE SANITARIUM.

AMONG all the excellent charitable organiza-ons of New York none is more deserving of pport than the West Side Relief Association d Seaside Sanitarium for Destitute and Sick hildren of the city, whose third annual report as just been issued. It is sustained entirely by luntary contributions, which are certain to in-ease in amount as the good fruits of this noble arity become known. The Seaside Sanitarium Rockaway Beach was started under the au-pices of the West Side Association some three ears ago.

The number of mothers and children taken own and cared for at the Sanitarium during the ast season far exceeds either previous one. The tal receipts for the year were $8155.99, meet-ng all the expenses of the society, and leaving a alance in the treasury of $688. What the asso-iation now needs is $5000 to complete their new uilding at the beach. Finding that the old uilding was inadequate to meet the growing de-ands made upon it, a large hotel has been se-ured for future operations, and it is hoped to ave it in readiness by next summer.

This large-hearted charity is entirely unde-ominational. It never questions about creed r nationality. It asks for no recommenda-ions. These children are sick, needy, crippled, oor; that is enough. On one day thirteen lit-le cripples from Bellevue Hospital were sent own. Their ages ranged from six to fourteen ears. Nearly all were suffering from hip dis-ase, and were encased in plaster of Paris cor-ets. Some little limbs were held in place by ron braces. But at the seaside they seemed to orget their miseries, and played in the sand nd bathed in the surf and gathered shells and eaweed and made sand pies till they grew quite rown and fat. On another day 150 Hebrew hildren were sent down. So also at times large umbers of colored children and mothers were ared for. The doors were open to all, the only ondition being poverty and sickness.

"Inasmuch," said our Lord, "as ye have lone it unto one of the least of these My breth-en, ye have done it unto Me." If any of our eaders desire to aid in so good a work the ed-tor will be pleased to receive any contributions ent, and will forward them to the treasurer.

WHY REV. C. H. SPURGEON IS POPULAR IN AMERICA.

THE following critique of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon is supplied to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by the Rev. John Stanford Holme, D.D., who in the course of his literary labors has had better opportunities than the majority of readers to form a fair estimate of the real value of sermons, and to discover the causes which render those of any particular preacher serviceable to the masses and a means of usefulness in the great cause of the advancement of Christ's kingdom of the world.

IT is a fact worthy of especial notice that the sermons of Mr. Spurgeon have had a circulation in this country entirely without precedent. There has been sold of the American edition of his sermons not less than 500,000 copies. And when to this is added the almost innumerable republications of single sermons in the transient periodicals of the day, it is safe to say that no other preacher has had so extensive a hearing in America as Charles H. Spurgeon.

Many of the causes of the wonderful popularity of this distinguished preacher are not difficult to discover. In freshness and vigor of thought, in simplicity and purity of language, in grasp of gospel truth, and in tact and force in its presentation, he is perhaps without a peer in the pulpit.

When in early life Mr. Spurgeon commenced his ministrations in the New Park Street Church, in London, he quickly filled the old house to overflowing. Soon he attracted the attention of all England. But he was regarded by many as a brilliant meteor that would soon fade away. Yet Mr. Spurgeon is to-day a vastly more effective and even a more brilliant preacher than he was twenty years ago. He continues to grow in brilliancy as well as in efficiency year by year. No one can yet point to the slightest indication of exhaustion in either his faculties or his resources.

This doubtless is attributable in a measure to his industry and well-directed application, as well as to natural ability and great personal piety. But Mr. Spurgeon's peculiar views of the Word of God and his manner of preparation for the pulpit also tend in no small degree to secure the inexhaustible variety which so strikingly characterizes his sermons. It is not his manner to spin his web out of himself. The resources from which he draws are not measured by the strength and the store of his own faculties, but rather by the infinite fulness of the Divine Word. He never preaches from a topic. He always has a text. His text is not a mere motto, but in it he finds his sermon. He uses his text with as much apparent reverence and appreciation as if those few words were the only words that God had ever spoken. The text is the germ which furnishes the life—the spirit and the substance of the discourse. Every sermon has the peculiar flavor and fragrance and color of the divine seed-truth of which it is the growth. Thus as the Bible is a storehouse of seed-truths inexhaustible and of infinite variety, so Mr. Spurgeon's sermons are never alike. "Every seed yields its fruit after its kind." If he brings you up again and again to the same old truths it is always on a different side, or in a new light or with new surroundings.

A very strong confirmation of this view has been afforded to the author in the preparation of an edition of his works.

In making up the index of subjects, it was necessary to go carefully through the entire fourteen volumes page by page, and to note the different topics discussed, and then to arrange them in alphabetical order. When this work was done such was the wonderful variety of subject, of thought and of illustration, that in many thousand references no two subjects or thoughts or illustrations were found exactly to correspond. The preacher is discussing essentially the same familiar truths over and over again. He is presenting the same great Saviour to lost sinners, with what might seem slavish fidelity to the spirit and even to the letter of the written Word. And yet his setting forth of truth, his shades of thought and his modes of illustration, always arrange themselves in new forms and colors with wellnigh the endless variety of the combinations and tints of the clouds at setting sun.

It is not surprising, therefore, that sermons so varied, fresh, and evangelical should have so large a circulation in this country, nor that a newspaper, one of the special attractions of which is the weekly sermon of Mr. Spurgeon, should have the reception which is already accorded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

JOHN STANFORD HOLME.

[In connection with the above we may state that by arrangement with Mr. Spurgeon, advance sheets of his latest Sunday-morning sermon are now forwarded to us, and we are thus enabled to publish them before they can appear in any other journal in this country.]

A DOCTOR'S VISIT TO DIPSOMANIACS.

IN a lecture before the British National Temperance League, Dr. Norman Kerr, a well-known writer and practitioner, said, "In the practice of my profession I have had under my care large numbers of dipsomaniacs in every rank and condition of life. Intemperance seems to me to have slightly decreased amongst men, but this decrease has been more than equalized by a decided increase of drunkenness amongst women.

"Not many weeks since I was called to attend to a man of seventy, who had nearly bled to death from a wound of the temporal artery, caused by a blow from a boot hurled at him by his wife, a woman of sixty-five, in a fit of drunken frenzy. He survived the injury, but a few days thereafter she strangled herself in the police cell. The same day I was sent for to a lady of advanced years, the mother of a large family, for an illness brought on by secret intoxication.

"A little later a summons from a terrified family brought me to an elegant and accomplished lady of independent fortune, lying on her face on the floor of her room, not dead, as the terror-stricken children thought, but drunk! Then came the earnest request to hasten to the death-bed of another lady, whom I found surrounded by her disconsolate family, bidding them all adieu forever, who was not dying, but drunk, and is alive to this day. But why go through the sickening catalogue of a single day's professional experience of female intemperance?

"Let me ask you to come with me on another occasion to the bedside of a missionary, who was laid aside by a severe illness; and amongst the comforters there, behold a lady of position, who has been at once a Christian worker and a drunkard many years. In every public-house are to be seen women, old and young, treating each other to liquor, where ten years ago scarce a woman could be seen; and in how few families in the land are there not lamentation and mourning and woe for some loved female member of the domestic circle slain through drink!"

Pernicious Juvenile Literature.—The youth of the lower classes are flooded with this literature, and even when it does not lead to crime it debases the moral sense of its readers. Take a case which was brought before the magistrate at the Wandsworth Police Court, England, lately. A boy, aged thirteen, was charged by his mother with stealing half a sovereign from her. It was not his first offence of the same kind. The constable who took him into custody found a number of illustrated papers upon him, which Mr. Bridge, the magistrate, examined. They were The Boys of London and Boys of New York. The youth had made such progress in the sort of heroism which these productions glorify, that his mother was afraid to touch him, as he had threatened her with a knife. This is not the only example of the pernicious effects of such reading. It is one out of many, nor can any one be surprised that from so evil a source the worst results should come.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ANNOUNCEMENT.

In commencing the publication of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times in America, it was impossible to form an accurate or even an approximate idea of the extent to which it would enjoy the favor of the Religious Public. The price was therefore fixed at four cents per single copy, that being the lowest sum deemed prudent under the circumstances.

Now, however, after the issue of only a few numbers, the journal has attained a circulation which, in connection with the numbers of commendatory letters daily received, justifies a

REDUCTION IN PRICE.

We have accordingly much pleasure in announcing that the price of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now reduced to

for single copies. Annual subscription, postage paid, $1.50. Remittances should be by check or post-office order or registered letter, and be made payable to Joseph Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, New York.

Though but a few weeks have elapsed since the issue of the first number of the American edition of The Christian Herald, we feel constrained thus early to express our grateful thanks for the numerous friendly greetings and kind expressions of appreciation that have reached us from every quarter.

While thankful to all who have aided us, we have at this time especially to acknowledge the aid and sympathy of hundreds of ministers from all parts of the country, and of every denomination.

It has been the occasion of surprise that while we have received hundreds of letters commendatory of the appearance and character of the paper in detail, there has been not one objection, either to particular articles or to the general course of the paper.

We ask a continuance of the sympathy and co-operation of our brethren of every name. We greatly desire that The Christian Herald shall reach every family in the United States, and believe that the above reduction in price ought to effect that object.

The Christian Herald is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Chinese question has for a long time been the cause of serious disturbances in California, and it has at last been brought fairly before Congress by the presentation of a report by the House Committee on Education and Labor, in reference to House bill No. 2423.

This bill provides that no master of a vessel shall take on board at any point in China or elsewhere more than fifteen Chinese passengers with intent to bring them, or shall bring them, within the United States. The violation of this provision is made a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of $100 for each passenger, and imprisonment for six months. The master is required, under like penalties, to report on his arrival a sworn list of all Chinese passengers. The penalty is made a lien upon the vessel. The bill becomes operative on the first day of July, 1879.

The report of the committee consists principally of a discussion of the constitutional right of Congress to enact such a law, and a statement of the necessity of such restrictive legislation, and concludes by recommending the passage of the bill accompanying the report.

The Chinese question has been taken up in a Christian spirit by Rev. David Jones, a Congregational minister recently ordained, who is attempting to bring about a more thorough and systematic instruction of the Chinese in Boston. Miss Harriette Carter, one of the city missionaries, has had Chinese scholars for some two or three years, to the number of 80 in all, in connection with the Chambers Street Sabbath-school.

Polygamy in Utah has, it is hoped, received its death-blow by a recent decision in the Supreme Court. It states clearly and decisively that the practice has no claim to be considered in the light of a religious custom, and as such to be beyond the control of the law. It is satisfactory to find that the legal quibble which would have relegated it to the condition of a theological problem has failed, and that the custom is denounced for what it is—a great and intolerable social scandal. The law having been clearly defined by the highest authority in the nation, it remains now to be seen whether the proper officers will have the courage to put it in operation against the offenders.

A delegation of ladies from Utah had a special audience with Mrs. Hayes January 14th. They laid their case before her, saying that if the anti-polygamy law was enforced it would make outcasts of 50,000 women of Utah who now have happy homes and are honored wives. One of the ladies said she is the mother of two boys, and, being a second wife, she would be deprived of name, and her boys would not be able to bear their father's name nor inherit from him. Mrs. Hayes said she sympathized with every thing that had for its object the bettering of the condition of women. She had received all the petitions that had been sent to her from Utah and elsewhere, and while she was unable to do any thing she appreciated the spirit in which they were sent.

The evil is too serious to allow sympathy to interfere with remedial measures, and the Mormon ladies will probably discover that, while cases of individual hardship are deplored, those persons who have set the laws of God and man at defiance have sooner or later to suffer the consequences of their sin.

Mr. Moody's work at Baltimore is still progressing with great success. He is accompanied by a choir collected from the different churches of the city. Great regret was expressed when Mr. Moody first commenced his operations in Baltimore, that he was not accompanied by Mr. Sankey. All desire to hear this "Sweet Singer of Israel," who elsewhere had proved so important an auxiliary to the great evangelist. But Mr. Moody wisely sought an early substitute for his missing companion. Before beginning to work, he called together volunteer singers from a number of city choirs; thus securing a band of select choristers who have gone with him from place to place, and under the skilful leadership of Professor Sanders have formed a most interesting and attractive feature in all his public services. They use No. 3 of the Gospel Hymns—a collection far in advance of its predecessors both in musical and literary merit, and containing a class of hymns generally more elevated and dignified in tone.

The Socialistic platform in this country varies from that professed in Europe, and as it may not be generally known what are the objects Socialists have in view in the United States, we quote from a manifesto in The Socialist, the organ of the society:

"We demand that the resources of life—the means of production, public transportation and communication—(land, machinery, railroads, telegraph lines, canals, etc.)—become, as fast as practicable, the common property of the whole people through the Government, thus to abolish the wages system and substitute in its stead co-operative production, with a just distribution of its rewards."

A scheme more Utopian could scarcely be found, but it is no less dangerous on that account. The spread of the doctrines of Christianity, combined with the advantages of education, will, it is hoped, counteract doctrines so ominous and revolutionary.

Bayard Taylor.—The poet Longfellow has written the following beautiful lines on the death of our lamented countryman. They were read by Dr. Holmes at a memorial meeting in Boston:

Dead he lay among his books;
The peace of God was in his looks,
As the statues* in the gloom
Watch o'er Maximilian's tomb,
So those volumes, from their shelves,
Watched him, silent as themselves,
Ah! his hand will nevermore
Turn their storied pages o'er;
Nevermore his lips repeat
Songs of theirs, however sweet.

Let the lifeless body rest;
He is gone who was its guest;
Gone as travellers haste to leave
An inn, nor tarry until eve.

Traveller, in what realms afar—
In what planet, in what star,
In what vast aërial space,
Shines the light upon thy face?
In what gardens of delight
Rest thy weary feet to-night?

Poet, thou whose latest verse
Was a garland on thy hearse,
Thou hast sung with organ tone
In Deukalion's life thine own.
On the ruins of the past
Blooms the perfect flower at last.

Friend, but yesterday the bells
Rang for thee their loud farewells;
And to-day they toll for thee,
Lying dead beyond the sea—
Lying dead among thy books,
The peace of God in all thy looks.

Practical Sympathy.—"A traveller passing over a bad road, the wheel of his carriage stuck in a deep rut. He labored with all his might to extricate it; but in vain. Presently some one passing said to him: 'You are in an awkward situation, sir: pray, how did the accident happen?' Another came up: 'Dear, dear! what is the matter? Well, what a good thing your neck is not broken! but this road ought to be indicted; there are continual accidents of one kind or another.' A third addressed him: 'I'm really sorry to see you so much heated and fatigued, sir; I fear, too, your horse and carriage are injured. I am very sorry.' 'Come, then,' replied the unfortunate traveller, 'if you really are sorry, be so good as to put a shoulder to the wheel; a grain of help is worth a bushel of pity.'"

The Sunday theatrical concerts cannot be too often or too loudly the subject of protest by all Christian speakers and writers. They are becoming a serious menace to the decent observance of the Lord's Day in New York, and are openly appearing in a guise which at first was covered by a flimsy pretence of religion. These so-called sacred concerts, as we have previously urged, are preparing the way for regular Sunday theatrical representations, such as are held in Paris. They are also in themselves a scandal, for the epithet sacred is used in irony by many of the managers. At the Tivoli Theatre the sacred concert lasts until twelve o'clock on Sunday night, when the regular performance of the company at once commences. At another downtown resort the sacred concert comprises comic songs, clog dances, and acrobatic performances; and at Booth's Theatre the concert consists of pieces which no Christian would consider sacred. The citizens of Philadelphia promptly suppressed the innovation in their city, and it must surely be as easy to stop them in New York as in Pennsylvania. They must be denounced as a serious and ominous menace to the morals of the community in their existence and in their tendency.

* In the Hofkirche at Innesbruk.

Dr. Howard Crosby thus summarizes the work of the society of which he is the president, having for its object the prevention of crime and the liquor traffic:

1. Shaping and sharpening public opinion.
2. The vertebrating of officers and judges.
3. The snubbing of the insolent rum power.
4. The shutting up of the lewd theatres.
5. The closing of 1739 groggeries, so that there are in New York City to-day 1739 groggeries less than there were twelve months ago.
6. The laying bare of the source of the trouble; the cause of difficulty in enforcing law, to wit: (a) Weakness of judges inflicting the least penalties; and (b) wickedness of excise commissioners licensing all the dens of infamy as "hotels."
7. The formation of a rallying centre for law and order.

The income of the society last year was $4000. Surely a society which has accomplished so much in the way of social reform deserves the support and the prayers of every Christian.

Journalistic Modesty.—The following paragraph is a cutting from a contemporary, who warns its subscribers of last year of the danger they incur in not renewing their subscriptions.

"Before you shut your door in the face of the great company of worthies which we bring to your house, carefully survey the field. They come for a consideration so small that it would hardly entertain one of them for a single night. Beyond, without these great men of the spiritual church, is darkness. Look before you leap into it."

Surely these shining lights, however brilliant they are, would not leave darkness behind them in the world if they were summoned away. The field has been carefully surveyed in the past, and it has been found that God always raised up men fitted to carry on His work on the earth.

The treatment of habitual drunkards is commented upon by Dr. Bucknill, of London, in a recent treatise. He emphatically condemns the inebriate asylums of this country, and in fact all treatment of the vice as a disease. He says:

"My own impressions of the inebriate asylums of America, and I visited six of them, are most unfavorable, I believe the treatment of habitual drunkards for the cure of their supposed disease to be unsound from top to bottom. I make no exception, for the only institution in which I find good, honest, earnest work being done was the Inebriate Reformatory at Philadelphia, in the management of which the idea of curing a disease is steadfastly put on one side."

Notwithstanding the opinion of so eminent an authority, it is notorious that there are many drunkards who are the victims of a periodical craving, almost uncontrollable, who if at those times could be restrained are convinced they would ultimately gain a mastery over themselves.

On this point Mr. Goodwin relates an incident which shows how the great privilege we possess of access to the throne of grace may be used in this, as in every other trouble. A reformed drunkard experienced a return of his former craving for liquor and turned into his home, which had been for four weeks a home of unusual hope and happiness. When he entered his wife was engaged in her domestic duties, singing from a happy heart one of the revival hymns which had been much used during the meeting. He sat down without saying a word. In an instant the wifely instinct saw that something dreadful was preying upon him, and she started towards him, saying: "John, what is the matter?" "O Mary," said he, "I'm ruined." "What, John, you have not been drinking again, have you?" she said, as the memory of his former lapses rushed upon her. "No, Mary, I have not; but it seems to me that I must or die, and I am sure I must die if I do. That old appetite is upon me; and now, Mary, there is but one thing that can save me, and that is the grace of God. I want you to get down right here and pray God to take away this cursed longing for drink." Mary was a woman of faith, and she did not need one word further. They kneeled together, and prayed together, until, at last, he said: "Mary, I have it—I have the victory. God is giving me strength. He will save me." And they arose and shouted together.

He went back to his shop, told his experience, went to work, and remained a sober and useful man until the day of his death.

Mr. Frank Pocock, whose death in the Stanley expedition was so universally mourned, was, it appears, not unprepared for the sad event that so prematurely ended his days. Mr. Stanley, in his "Dark Continent," relates that the party had been in great danger, and had passed through severe fighting. Frank Pocock, the sunniest of them all, and the best loved, broke into a strain of singing:

"The home-land! I long to meet
Those who have gone before;
The weeping eyes and weary feet
Rest on that happy shore."

Mr. Stanley said, "Frank, you will make every boy cry with such tunes as that. Choose some heroic tune." "All right, sir," he replied, with a bright face, and struck up—

"Brightly gleams our banner,
Pointing to the sky,
Waving wanderers onward
To their home on high."

"Ah! Frank," said Mr. Stanley, "it isn't the heavenward way you mean, is it? I should think you would prefer the homeward way."

"How do you like this, sir?—

"'My God, My Father, while I stray
Far from my home, in life's rough way,
Oh teach me from my heart to say
"Thy will be done!"'"

"Frank, you are thinking too much of the poor fellows we have lately lost. Sing, my dear Frank, your best song." He responded by singing—

"Onward, Christian soldiers,
Marching as to war,
With the cross of Jesus
Going on before."

An Emperor Overcoming Enemies.—A Chinese emperor once heard that his enemies had raised an insurrection in one of the distant provinces. "Come, my friends," said he to those about him, "follow me and I promise you that we shall destroy our enemies." He marched forward and the rebels submitted on his approach. All now thought that he would take the most signal revenge. Instead of this, however, they were surprised to see the captives treated with mildness and humanity. "What!" cried one of his officers, "is this the way in which you fulfil your promise? Your royal word was given that your enemies should be destroyed, and, behold, you have pardoned them all, and even shown special favor to some of them!"

"I promised," replied the emperor, with a generous air, "to destroy my enemies. This I have done. For see, they are enemies no longer; I have made them my friends."

How well might Christian people learn to imitate so noble an example and learn to "overcome evil with good!"

THE IMMOVABILITY OF THE BELIEVER.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever."
—PSALM 125 : 1.

Spiritual Graces the Result of Great Trials—I. A Lowly People—They Trust in the Lord—That is: 1. A Simple Matter—2. A very Right Matter—3. A Wise Course—4. A Matter of Necessity—5. It has a Great Side to it—II. The Security of Believers—Where are Believers—1. In the Place of Justification—2. In the Place of Regeneration—3. In Divine Love—Story of Martin Luther—III The Evident Reason of the Security of Believers—1. They Trust in the Lord—2. Their Trust is Welcomed—3. The Nature of God a Guarantee—4. The Promises are their Pledges.

THIS is the first verse of one of the Songs of degrees. These Songs were probably sung by the pilgrims as they went up to Jerusalem, when they halted at the various stations or passed certain places of interest. It is very possible that this psalm burst forth from joyful lips at the moment when Zion first came into sight, and the worshippers gazed upon the city of their solemnities. Happy pilgrims! They had left behind them many a dreary glen and dangerous wood, and now they saw full in their view their journey's end, and therefore they sang with all the gathered joy of days gone by. They could not so have exulted if they had not previously sorrowed. The same truth may be learned from the use of the term "Song of degrees;" it warns us that this psalm rises out of that which preceded it, one as step of a staircase rises above its fellow.

David had not sung the one hundred and twenty-fifth psalm if he had not first learned to sing the one hundred and twenty-fourth: if he had not been where men threatened to swallow him up quick, and found in such a case that the Lord was on his side, he could not have been quite so sure that "they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed." Our experiences are our instructors even concerning themselves: they shed light upon each other, and we learn enough from one trial to begin to unfold the mysteries of another. The one hundred and twenty-fourth psalm must first to some extent be passed through, so that we see that all our help lies in the Lord, or we shall never reach to the grand positiveness of this one hundred and twenty-fifth, and sing, "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion."

We have heard some of the brave expressions of Christian heroes, and we have thought, "I wish I could speak with that man's faith." Brother, to possess such faith you must take with it its owner's trials. You may rest assured that God never gave a pennyworth of faith to any man that it might be hoarded in a cupboard; faith is sure to be used, and what is more, great faith is not possessed by those who are untrained in its need and use; it is a sword which is not girt upon a man till he hath come to years and strength to use it. I do greatly joy in that utterance of Luther when going to Worms. Some of his friends told him that he would be burned to powder, as Huss had been before him, but he laughed, and said he had no fear. "If," said he, "they shall build a fire between Wittenberg and Worms that should reach to heaven, in the Lord's name I would appear, and step into behemoth's mouth, between his great teeth, and confess Christ, and let him do his pleasure." His joy at that time seems to have been overflowing, though his danger was manifest to all.

Now, this holy boasting sounds well, but it is not to be imitated by every babe in grace; this man had passed through a preparatory process which brought his mind into a triumphant state, in which he was a king of men, a lion among a pack of dogs. It is not to be forgotten that there was a subsequent sinking of his soul, as in the case of Elijah, to prevent his being exalted above measure at the recollection of his own courage. For this, also, he who would have a right royal faith must stand prepared. They that do business in great waters must sail in ships fitted for stormy seas. You and I, perhaps, paddle around the shores of a quiet lake, where our little boat is large enough for most purposes; we are not tested by great storms, neither is our boat held by great anchors; our needs are not of the greatest, and therefore our supplies are not like those of the larger craft, which sail upon greater waters.

Still, one would wish to be among the Lord's most useful servants, and to that end would cheerfully accept the great risk. We would not wish to remain babes, but we desire to become full-grown men, and surely he is one who has drank up the one hundred and twenty-fourth psalm as a somewhat bitter cup, and then feels that he can dine upon the one hundred and twenty-fifth, and rise to bless the Lord, who makes his people to "be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever."

Note that the metaphor which is used in the text was drawn by the pilgrims from the hill before them; or, if the psalm does not belong to pilgrims, but to all Israel, they took the comparison from that mountain with which they were best acquainted. If they might not all see Lebanon, which lay at the northern extremity of the land, if they might not all behold the excellency of Carmel, or gaze upon the heights of Hermon, yet once in the year they must all look upon Zion, "whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel." The emblem was therefore a familiar one, and I wish sometimes that we were more apt at sanctifying to holy uses the common objects which are round about us: these streets and houses, our own country, and our own home.

I am afraid our eyes are open when we seek emblems of sadness and we find them on every hedge and in any garden-plot; but we should also look at home when we want metaphors of thanksgiving with which to set forth our security and our comfort in the Lord. To have a house at all is something. Cold blows the wind, but warm is our own fireside; and even so, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations." All you who love your homes may see in them the figure and representation of your dwelling in God in peace forever.

Faith, when she is active and observant, finds illustrations of her own blessedness all around. Amid the descending snows of this cheerless wintry day she says, "Did He not say that cold and heat, and summer and winter should never cease?" Have we not His covenant with the earth still fulfilled before our eyes, and may we not rest certain therefore that the covenant with His people will not fail? Are not these snowflakes tokens of His word which cometh not forth in vain? Does not this bitter chill assure us of His omnipotence of whom we read, "He casteth forth His ice like morsels: who can stand before His cold?" Open your eyes, my brethren, and look about, and as the believing Israelite saw Zion and began to sing about it, so shall you also "go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing."

Now, to come to the text,—I have merely touched its angles in this rough preface. We have in the verse before us, first of all, a lowly people—"They that trust in the Lord;" one talks a good deal about them, yet they are of no reputation among men: secondly, a singular stability in them—"they shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever;" and then, thirdly, we shall for a while consider the evident reason for this stability of theirs.

I. First, here we read of

A LOWLY PEOPLE.

That which is said of them is nothing very great in the judgment of human reason, they are merely said to "trust in the Lord." This is a very simple thing to do. God gives promises, and they believe them. God is at work in providence, and they trust Him: God invites them to the mercy-seat, and they approach it; God gives them His Son as their salvation, and they believe in Him; God grants His Holy Spirit as their teacher, and they learn of Him and obey Him. To sum up all in one, they "trust in the Lord." "That is a small matter," cries one; "any fool can do that." Just so: perhaps more would do so if the most of men were not foolishly wise. Any child can trust; and more would trust in the Lord if more men were childlike. "Trust in the Lord."

It needs no effort of intellect to trust, and it needs no laborious education to learn the way; trusting in the Lord is simply depending where there is unquestionable reason for reliance, believing what is assuredly true, and acting upon it. Trusting in the Lord is taking at His word one who cannot lie, or change, or fail; and certainly this is no great feat if we look at it from the carnal man's own point of view. These trusters in the Lord cannot plume themselves upon the feat they have performed, for to trust in the Lord would naturally seem to be one of the commonplaces of human thought.

To trust in the Lord we have admitted to be a very simple matter, but at the same time (2) it is very right. Is it not? Poor simpletons that we are, we can appeal even to the wise ones of the earth and let them be judges in this matter. Should not a man trust in his own Creator? Is it possible for us to discover a being more worthy of confidence than our own God? Does he not deserve to be trusted? In what one respect has he ever played us false? Is there a single instance in which the word of the Lord, once given, has been found to fail? When have thirsty mouths resorted to this fountain and found it dry? If there be any thing against the veracity of God, let us hear it. Evidence is invited. The Lord Himself bids any testify against Him who have aught to declare.

Lo, these thousand of years have rolled along, and Jehovah has challenged men to bring forth their strong arguments against Him if they could, but they have found no cause why He should be distrusted, and His word dishonored. If then there be new evidence, O unbelievers! ye are here to declare it. Let us hear it. There is none; ye know that there is none. Surely it is a matter of clear honesty and right to any man to trust Him till he has deceived us or afforded us cause for suspicion. We always say we will trust the bridge that has carried us safely over. Has not the Lord been faithful to those who have trusted Him? What say the trusters of former times, or of this present? Lives there one who will come forward and say, "I have trusted in the Lord and have been confounded; I have stayed myself upon the Eternal and I have found Him false?" No, hell itself contains not one adversary of God who dares to utter such a calumny against His divine faithfulness. Well, brethren, if we be told that our trust is simple, we will be reconciled to the statement by the equally manifest fact that it is right.

(3) Moreover, is it not wise? What can be wiser? Those of us who have tried trusting in God have never found it fail, whereas when we have trusted in men we have been disappointed. You who have been self-reliant must have found self-reliance to be, at certain times, a terrible mistake; but those who are God-reliant have never found an instance in which their rest in the Lord has been a questionable policy. Would it not be an awfully grand fact if a man should make a failure of his life, and could then turn round and truly say, "O God! the cause of my failure was that I trusted alone in Thee, and Thou couldst not, or wouldst not help me?" As there is a terrible grandeur in the infamous wickedness of Milton's Satan, so much of grandeur that sometimes the reader has been made forgetful of the vileness of the fiend in the greatness of the rebel, so there would be a sort of appalling splendor about a being who should have implicitly lived to God and depended upon Him, and then should have failed. The idea is next door to blasphemous, and tremblingly I let it pass before you that you may perceive that it can have no real existence.

Let us speak further about these simple people,—these half fools, as the world thinks them to be. They came to trust in God (4) as they could do no otherwise. Why is it that numbers of people deal with their friends on trust? It is because no other way is open to them. Matthew Henry says, "All that deal with God must deal upon trust, and He will give comfort to those only that give credit to Him." We cannot bring the Lord our merits, but let us give Him our confidence. Because we are poor, let us appeal to His riches; because we cannot help ourselves, let us cast ourselves upon His power. What else can we do? God is to be trusted: let us trust Him with all our hearts. Do other trusts invite us? Let us reject them, for we remember the past heartbreaks which they have caused us. Lord, we trust in Thee, and come to cast ourselves upon Thee! To whom else can we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life.

Oftentimes trust is to a believer his only path: he is shut up to faith; he must believe or die. He is pushed up in a corner, he is bewildered, he can scarce pray, he cannot comprehend himself, nor lift a finger; and now, trusting is the resort of his desperation; it is not his choice, but the fruit of compulsion. Brethren, I feel it a sweet thing to faint away into faith. Did you ever do that? Were you ever so far gone that at last you have melted right away from yourself, and sunk into God? I believe that this swooning faintness is the door of faith to multitudes of souls; they enter into peace, not by strength, but by sheer weakness: they do not run into the arms of God, but they fall there. There are doubtless some who run to Christ, for we read of one who came running unto Him; but there are others who must needs be dropped down before Him upon a bed. It matters not how they come to Jesus, so long as they do come to Him; yet it is worthy of note that faith in many cases is a child of weakness: on its human side it is a Jabez, borne with sorrow, the birth of self's expiring pang.

Yet faith which thus arises out of very weakness, like the phœnix from its own ashes, has (5) a great side to it. It is, in some respects, the sublimest effort of the human mind. If ever the bright spirits which stand before the throne test their own faculties upon the mysteries of providence, foreknowledge, predestination, and the free will of man; if they ever inquire where the agency of the created ends and where the divine is found alone,—if ever, I say, they try the edge of their intellect upon themes like these, they make an end by declaring, "We are lost, our spirits cannot comprehend the infinite, but we believe in God, and are sure that He ordereth all things aright."

They doff their coronets before the throne of their superior King, in reverent confidence in His eternal goodness; this is their grandest worship, their truest adoration,—they do believe. Brethren, faith is not of earth alone, but saints and angels in heaven believe in the Eternal God. It were a crime to suspect them of the contrary. The mystery of Jehovah's dealings still manifests their faith; they remember His unfulfilled promises, and they look for their accomplishment, for they have not as yet seen the Bridegroom coming to His bride, nor the earth subdued unto His sway, nor the full manifestation of the creation, when the sons of God shall be revealed, and the creature itself shall cease from its groaning. Trust is the simplicity of a babe, but it is the glory of a genius; it is grand in seraph or in saint, and while it befits a child it is worthy of an archangel. Poor fools these trusters are, yet are they near akin to nobler beings.

Now, can you tell me why it is that if a man trusts in God he is generally despised by his fellows? If a person were to say, "As for my getting on in the world, I am trusting to a friend of mine who is influential with the government;" or if another said, "My father was born before me and he will see me provided for," nobody would condemn either of such persons as an idiot, but would treat his confidence as quite legitimate ; but if any one of us were to say, "Our confidence, as for our future in this world, is resting in our heavenly Father," there would be a shrugging of the shoulders, a knowing look of the eyes, and when they got far enough away our critics would say, "That man is a fool, or a cant." Alas ! God is nobody to the bulk of mankind, and it seems a ridiculous thing to them to trust in Him.

To trust in God is to the worldly man the next thing to building castles in the air. The unbelieving laugh, because they cannot understand us : but what is the reason why they become angry with us ? Why do they turn again and rend us ? Other simpletons they let alone, but those who trust in God become objects of scorn. The believer finds that a jest is made upon his faith, and mirth is excited by his confidence : what he says is widely retailed, and more than a little distorted, and he is looked upon as little better than a natural fool. This always was so, and always will be so till the Lord cometh. He that is born after the flesh persecuteth him that is born after the Spirit. The man who walks by sight cannot understand the man who walks by faith ; how should he ? And if we get to trust in God, and that trust becomes the great motive-power of our life, as I earnestly hope it may be with each one of us, then the worldly man will not know how to make head or tail of our conduct, and he will first of all ridicule, and then oppose. Care nothing for the opposition ; he who is right has conquered.

Some of you may have been so sweetly taught to trust in the Lord that you can say, "Yes, blessed be His name, I do trust Him, altogether, unreservedly, and without a suspicion." Be you abundantly sure that the text is your portion this day. I hope there are some of us who can now trust our Lord in any case. If we do but see the Lord's word in any teaching, however mysterious or obnoxious to flesh and blood, our questions are at an end. We accept unhesitatingly the hard and the deep things of God. If we see any attribute, or promise, or half a promise of our Lord to be on our side, we feel more than safe.

A GOOD OLD SAINT

who lately lay dying told her pastor that she was resting upon the justice of God. The good divine thought that she had chosen a strange point of the divine character to rest on ; but it was not at all so, for she explained herself. "I rest in His justice to my great Surety and Substitute, that He would not let Him die for me in vain." Thus hard, stern justice becomes a blessed pillow for our confidence, and none can be softer for a dying head. Though justice be as a stone, yet he that can use it as Jacob used the stone at Bethel shall see the ladder which reached to heaven, and angels trooping upon its rounds. Awkward providences, too, like stern attributes, we have learned to use for helps in our trusting.

It happened that Rabbi Joshua was walking up Mount Zion one day with his brother, Rabbi Eliezer, and as they walked along they started a fox, which ran out from among the rubbish. "Alas ! my brother," said Joshua, "this is a sad sign ; does it not show us the anger of the Lord against Israel ? He hath given Zion to be a desolation, and the foxes walk about her." Eliezer replied, "True, my brother ; but doth it not also prove the faithfulness of Jehovah towards Zion, for inasmuch as He said that the foxes should go about her when she sinned, hath He not also said that He will build her walls again ? If He is thus faithful to His threatening, will He not in due time fulfil His promise ?" Brethren, you must trust the Lord wholly and entirely, in every thing and concerning every thing. "Trust in Him at all times." You must trust the dark side of Him, you must trust in the shadow of His wings as well as in the light of His countenance. Some of you have only learned to trust to the smile of His face ; you must learn to trust in the blows of His fist. God bring us to that ! "No," say you, "we can never come to that." Surely we can, for did not one of old say, "Though He slay me yet will I trust in Him ?" That is precisely what we mean.

II. Under our second head we shall consider the grand privilege of the text,

THE SECURITY OF BELIEVERS—

"They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever." Mount Zion had in David's day undergone a great many changes, and it has seen many more since, but it has never been removed. There it was when the Jebusite defied David, there it was when Araunah threshed his wheat, there it was when the Temple gleamed in the sun, there it was when the Roman soldier cast the firebrand into the holy place ; and it is there now : it has never been removed, and it never will be. God's children undergo a variety of experiences. To-day their hearts are a place of sacrifice, and to-morrow a battle-field ; by turns their soul is a temple and a threshing-floor ; but whatever their ups and downs may be, they shall never be removed from their ordained and appointed place : by the grace of God they are where they are, and where they shall be.

They shall never be effectually removed from that place before the Lord in which infinite love has fixed them. Where, then, are believers ? We answer, first, they are in the place of justification. As soon as they believed in the Lord Jesus Christ they were justified by faith. How many years have passed since then ? Never, mind,—"there is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." They have not fallen into the place of condemnation ; they have not been driven from the honorable position of justified men, for "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." The Lord has covered them with the righteousness of Christ, and cast all their sins into the depths of the sea, and therefore they must and they shall stand in His favor as long as Zion's famous rock abides in its place. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life." "He that believeth on Him is not condemned." The sheep of Christ shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of His hand.

2. "The believer is also in the place of regeneration, and out of that condition he shall never be removed. He was born again ; prove that fact, and there is no reversing it. He that is born again is born again. You cannot take from a man his first birth, neither can you take from a man his second birth : the thought is ridiculous, the fact is impossible. Art thou a child of God ? Thou art a child of God, and thou canst never be other than a child of God, either in time or in eternity. Hast thou a child ? Thou mayest disown him, but he is thine none the less. Your child may be rebellious, and his character may make thee sorrowful, but he is thy child for all that. Unchild him thou canst not. Even so, if God be my Father, which I know He is, since He has taught me to trust in Him, then I may not question the perpetuity of my sonship, since it is an abiding thing, and I shall no more be removed from it than Mount Zion from its ancient seat.

3. Thou art also in the place of divine love, dear to the heart of God, for the Father Himself loveth you, and nothing shall make Him cease to love you. He did not love you because of any thing good in you. When He chose you He knew what you would be ; you will never surprise Him whatever evil you fall into, for He has foreseen and provided for it all, and He hath said, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee ; for the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed ; but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."

Beloved, if thou be indeed trusting in God thou art in the stronghold of the covenant. God hath entered into bonds with thee to bless thee. By oath and promise, by two immutable things in which it is impossible for Him to lie, He hath given thee strong consolation concerning everlasting salvation in Christ Jesus ; and thou art like Mount Zion—thou shalt never be removed from thy place in the covenant. Although thy house be not so with God as thou mightest desire, yet hath He made with thee an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure.

"They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which can never be removed, but which abideth forever." This shall not only be a matter of fact as to the believer's actual position with God, but to a large extent this shall be true in his own consciousness as he advances in the life and walk of faith. Believers are too often tossed about in their minds, and suffer great shakings and movings of heart because they do not trust in the Lord as they should. These things ought not to be, for we ought to be steadfast and immovable ; but by reason of infirmity and immaturity many are tossed to and fro as with a tempest. Still, even in these, deep in their soul their faith is earnestly keeping its hold, and does not permit them altogether to drift. At the back of a great deal of grievous unbelief, when we are in a depressed condition, there lives a faith which is not moved, but in secret takes hold as for dear life, biding its time till better days shall come.

I remember another

which may fitly be told in this place. Great-souled Martin Luther could believe and doubt against any man of his time ; in believing he could excel the angels, and in horrible thoughts of doubting he could almost match the devils. Great-hearted men are subject to horrible fits of faintness and despair, unknown to minds of smaller calibre. One day he fell so low in spirit that his friends were frightened at what he might say or do. Things were going ill with the great cause, and the Reformer might in his dreadful condition have upset every thing. So his friends got him out of the way, saying to themselves, "The man must be alone, his brain is overworked ; he must be quiet." He rested a bit, and came back, looking as sour and gloomy as ever. Rest and seclusion had not stilled the winds nor lulled the waves. Luther was still in a storm, and judged that the good cause was shipwrecked. I will now give you my own version of the method adopted for the great man's care.

He went home, but when he came to the door nobody welcomed him. He entered their best room, and there sat Catherine his wife, all dressed in black, weeping as from a death in the house. By her side lay a mourning cloak, such as ladies wear at funerals. "Ah !" says he, "Kate, what matters now, is the child dead ?" She shook her head and said the little ones were alive, but something much worse than that had happened. Luther cried "Oh ! what has befallen us ? Tell me quick ! I am sad enough as it is. Tell me quick !" "Good man," said she, "have you not heard ? Is it possible that the terrible news has not reached you ?" This made the Reformer the more inquisitive and ardent, and he pressed to be immediately told of the cause of sorrow. "Why," said Kate, "have you not been told that our heavenly Father is dead, and His cause in the world is therefore overturned ?" Martin stood and looked at her, and at last burst into such a laugh that he could not possibly contain himself, but cried, "Kate, I read thy riddle,—what a fool I am ! God is not dead ; He ever lives ; but I have acted as if He were. Thou hast taught me a good lesson."

It is only by realizing the everlasting, abiding love of God that they that trust in the Lord shall come to feel steadfast as Mount Zion, which shall never be removed. The man of God may know that he is safe, and yet there may be such a rush and tumult in his experience that he may not be able to understand himself or realize his true position. This may happen even to more advanced believers ; but as we grow in grace the tendency is to reach a more even and equable condition. Experienced believers are not to be put about by every puff of wind ; nay, they come at last to hold on their way in the teeth of all ill weathers, and like hardy mariners, make small account of the lesser storms of life. It is grand to gaze into the face of a patriarch who wears written on his placid brow the words, "He shall not be moved forever. His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord." Such men are the pillars of society, and help poor trembling, doubting hearts to hope that there is something stable yet. Let it be our object and desire to grow into such confirmed and established believers. The promise of God deserves unwavering faith, and why should we not render it, and thus become fixed in our repose of soul.

III. Now I have to finish. In the third place, let us consider for all this. Why is it that they that trust in the Lord shall not be moved?

Why, first, because they are trusting in the truth. They have not believed a lie, and therefore they shall not be swept from their foundation. They are trusting in One who will not deceive them and cannot fail them. They have laid their foundation on a rock, have they not? If they had trusted to man, man would fail or change, but, lo! they are trusting to One who is truth, power, immutability, holiness, justice—why should they be moved? I cannot imagine a reason. I say again, why should they be moved?

2. They are trusting where their reliance is observed and welcomed. God loveth to have many dependents about Him. It is His way of revealing Himself and manifesting His glory. In these later ages, know you not what the Lord has been doing? He dwelt up yonder self-contained—God, Father, Son, Holy Ghost, within His own supreme Person, self-sufficient. He wanted nothing more, and if He willed aught beyond it was that there might be creatures that could trust Him, love Him, hang upon Him, depend upon Him. He went about in creation and in providence and in grace to make dependents. A great nobleman with a big house in a wide country is not content to be all alone ; he needs servants and tenantry ; and if he be of a generous spirit he seeks the poor. He wants poor neighbors to help, and he says, "This Christmas-time I must give something away—is there nobody wanting a round of beef? Is there nobody wanting their chimney set alight with a joint? Is there nobody needing a blanket in this cold season?" Thus God must have dependents ; He must have those about Him who need Him. He loves dependents, and I do not see why He should cast them away. Why should He? If this is what He desireth, if He seeketh such to worship Him, who believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him, why should He reject their suit?

3. It is not the nature of God to cast away any who rely upon Him ; on the contrary, He is very careful that faith should never have less than she has expected. He respects the courage of faith : He never confounds it. If you open your back door, and a robin comes bravely in out of the cold, do you drive him out? No, you are pleased with his assurance, and give him a hearty welcome. Even so doth God deal with poor trembling souls when they come to him. We read of Charles V., the German Emperor, that when a pair of birds had built their nest among the poles and lines of his pavilion he would not allow it to be removed though the time was come for the camp to be on the march. The birds had trusted to him, and they should not be disappointed. The like zealous care doth the Lord exhibit towards the trembling hopes and feeble confidences of poor souls that trust in Him. There is, therefore, no reason why they should be removed, since it is not like the Lord to cast them away.

4. Once more, for a true believer to be suffered to perish would be a violation of all the promises of God. He hath said to such, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." His own word is, "the righteous shall hold on his way," "he that believeth in Him shall not be ashamed nor confounded, world without end." Now then, if these promises could fail, the child of God would be removed ; but it is not possible so long as God is God that he who trusts in the Lord shall ever be removed. As long as there is a God in heaven every believer is safe. Let him go and rejoice in this : because it will bring glory to God to save him, but for him to be lost would put a slur upon the name of the Most High. The Lord bring us to a simple faith in Jesus, and keep us fixed there. Amen.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

MR. HILLIARD turned round as Ned Wright entered the room with Christian's letter in his hand. It was a sad face the boy saw there and one that did not say much for the power of wealth and luxury to confer happiness on their possessor. He looked the very image of misery—that old man sitting in that magnificently furnished room. There stood the boy, poor in the world's estimation, scarcely a coin to call his own, yet his mind was more at ease and he knew more of true happiness than the wealthy sinner he confronted. If the faces of men were indexes of their thoughts, Mr. Hilliard's countenance would have been blazoned with the words "vanity of vanities ; all is vanity. What profit hath a man of all his labor which he taketh under the sun?" (Ecclesiastes 1 : 2.) It seemed to him now a sorry result to end his life with, and as he turned to the boy, young and healthy with all his life and its possibilities before him, and thought of his own miserable position, lonely and bereaved, the contrast smote him painfully, and as if he had received a blow or an affront. At last he said gruffly, almost angrily :

"You have a letter for me."

"Yes, sir," said the lad, nervously twisting his cap. "Mr. Christian he give it Cairns, and Cairns give it me. I was to be sure and give it you myself, sir."

He advanced towards the table as he spoke, and laid the missive down. It was crumpled and dirty, bearing evident signs of salt water.

"How came you all to leave him there to die? Was there not one among you to lift a finger to save him?" said Mr. Hilliard, vainly striving to steady his trembling hands.

"He wouldn't come, sir! Cairns stayed too, when there was room for one in the boat. They wouldn't leave the ship."

"And she went down. You saw her?" came the scarcely audible words.

"We didn't see her sink, sir ; but she was filling fast. We dared not stay another minute.

"That will do ; you may go."

In speechless amazement the boy went out.

"He never asked one question about Mr. Christian!" he exclaimed, finding his voice outside ; "he didn't even look at the letter!"

With an anguish too terrible and strong for utterance, Richard Hilliard stood looking at the silent messenger on the table. Go near it, touch it, he dared not. What did it contain? If he opened it, upon what words, what dreaded sentence, would his eyes rest? In those last hours of life, had some strange, mysterious instinct revealed to his son that one secret? Would he find reproach and bitter scorn within the folded paper? "Open it and know the worst. How could he learn the fatal truth?" urged his stronger will. "What have you to fear?" What had he to fear? He scarcely knew, and yet the dread that was upon him was almost more than he could bear.

Again and again he approached the table, and again and again he turned from it with failing courage. The wish to know what message had come to him from the son who was now lying cold and dead in the depths of the sea became absolute torture in its intensity.

Slowly, wearily dragged on the heavy hours, and still he paced the room with restless steps. Midnight came at last, and the clock chimed out the hour. He stood still and listened till the last sound died away, and then with desperate resolution drew near once more and took up the crumpled envelope.

So saturated had it been with salt water, that it needed scarcely a touch to unfasten, and he held the letter in his hand. For some moments the lines swam and intermingled, and then stood out with sudden and startling clearness.

This is what he read :

"FATHER,—It is probably the last time I shall ever take up my pen to write to you. When you receive this the hand that wrote it will be still forever in the quiet depths of the sea. There is a fierce storm raging around us, and you know what our chances are of weathering it. How can I write to you—what can I say? It has come upon me with an awful force, crushing me to the ground with the bitterest shame!

"No matter how I know. I do know, and can understand now your refusal to show me Grant's letter. 'As a coaster she is safe enough, but she is certainly not fit for a long voyage. Nothing can make her so.' Do you recognize the words? I would rather that you had died than that you should have done this deed!

"My own death I am not speaking of, not thinking of ; it fades into utter insignificance before the fact that you, my father, sent these poor fellows to their doom ; that you let me in my ignorance lead them to their graves! That is the bitter overwhelming thought ; they trusted me, they gave their lives into my keeping, and I brought them here to die.

"O God! it is hard to bear—that you, my father, whom I have loved and honored, should have done this thing! You, whom I looked up to, and trusted as the very soul of honor! You, whom my mother——"

Here the lines were blurred and smeared, rendered unreadable by the running of the ink. Lower down they again became distinct.

"But I do not wish to reproach you ; there is time for only a few words, and I have other things to say. Will you let your son's death be the last ever laid to your account? Will you promise me that never again shall your hand cause the sound of mourning to be heard in the homes of widows and fatherless children?

"I have heard some words about you this nigh that I dare not gainsay, that I cannot repeat Father, it is a fearful thing to live with th curses of drowning men upon your head! It i a fearful thing to die with the memory of thos curses in your heart! God help you"—agai the lines fading into indistinctness—"and f the last time, good-by."

The letter dropped from Richard Hilliard hand, and he sank into his arm-chair, his hea falling on the table. How long he lay in utt insensibility he knew not, and at last came r turning consciousness with its torturing memo ies. Picking up the letter, he folded it, a glancing round with fearful eyes, opened h desk and placed it in a private drawer.

With slow and faltering steps he went upstai to bed, but not to sleep. The wind was howli round the house, now rising, now falling, sha ing the shutters, and dashing the bare boug of the trees outside against the windows. the darkness he lay and listened till his excit imagination called forth voices from the tumu

He heard the plaintive cries of little waili children, calling in vain for the rough hands th would never more be laid in tenderness up their sunny curls. He heard the sobs of chi less mothers, the moans of broken-hearted w ows! Then in a wild burst came passion curses and imprecations from the lips of m struggling for life in the seething sea, and c ing down God's wrath upon the hand that h sent them to their death.

And clear and low through all ran a ceasel undercurrent—"It is a fearful thing to die w the memory of those curses in your heart!"

In vain he got up and paced the floor a tried to think of other things ; nothing co banish the haunting words. At last, wear out, he sank into a fitful, troubled sleep, and in his sleep an unutterable horror fell upon him. Round him, on every hand, gathered the cold dark waters, filling his eyes and mouth and ears, yet letting him hear and see. Long bands of slimy seaweed wound round him from head to oot, almost stifling him in their close embrace; and at his feet lay the bodies of dead men, cold and stiff, with their glassy eyes fixed and open.

He tried to shout, but his voice was choked; he tried to move, but the swathes of seaweed held him fast. In an agony he struggled, while the contact with dead hands chilled his blood with loathing, when suddenly through the silent waters came the sound of a voice he knew full well—"It is a fearful thing to die with the memory of those curses in your heart."

Then the pale lips round him opened, and innumerable voices called upon his name in tones of passionate rage and reproach. Louder and louder they grew, closer and closer gathered the bands of seaweed, dragging him down, down; and with a cry that rang through the house, he awoke.

Bathed in perspiration, and trembling in every limb, he lay and listened to the storm. Stimulated by his dream, his busy imagination pictured his son lying in the stillness of death among the ghastly company of drowned men. He saw the beautiful classic face, with the fair hair washed from its sunburnt forehead, and seaweeds clinging round. He saw the fall of the eyelashes on the bronzed cheek, the quiet grace of the folded hands, the statuesque repose of the stately form!

"O God!" he groaned, in the anguish of his heart. "My punishment is greater than I can bear."

The night passed, giving place to day. Once more he mingled with the busy world; but go where he would there followed that never-ceasing voice from the sea—"It is a fearful thing to die with the memory of those curses in your heart."

In his office and in the streets, in solitude or mixing with the busy throng, an invisible presence seemed to him to be dogging his steps and reminding him of his loss and of his sin. In the early days of the Eglantine's disastrous voyage he had thrust his anxieties from him and had occupied his mind with business, but now business had lost its charm; it had no longer the fascination it once possessed to hold his thoughts, and if they were diverted for a few minutes, they returned to the one enthralling subject as surely as the needle of the compass returns to its position however its course may be temporarily diverted.

The evil was, he felt, beyond remedy, and its very hopelessness weighed on him with crushing severity. Where could he turn for consolation? He had no one to comfort him on earth and he dared not look to God. The heavens seemed to him to reverberate with the curses of those drowning men, and he could ask no mercy or forgiveness there. This was no new crime, nor his first transgression of that nature. Vessels like the Eglantine had gone out at his bidding before her, and been lost, and the sin had been as great then; but now had come the punishment, and it was his punishment under which he groaned. The sin was yet unanswered for, still unrepented of; but, as he had cried in the first hours of his trouble, his punishment was greater than he could bear.

Many a sinner has felt a like grief when smarting under chastisement, who knew nothing of true repentance. The repentance that works salvation accepts the punishment as just and mourns for sin apart from its consequences. To such a soul the balm of consolation is soon administered; it learns that the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth from all sin (1 John 1: 7), and that knowledge, while it does not diminish grief over sin, brings a peace into the soul the world cannot give nor take away—the peace of God, which passes understanding.

But of this peace, as yet, Richard Hilliard had no experience. He lamented over his condition, he grieved over the loss of his son, and in his anguish he cursed his folly. This was his state day and night, and under the mental agony his frame sank. Day by day those about him saw him growing gradually more enfeebled, and the powers of his constitution withering away. It was clear that unless he obtained relief and consolation soon he would speedily pass mourning to a premature grave.

One day he failed to appear at his office, and on sending to his house for instructions, the clerk was told Mr. Hilliard was too ill to transact business. He was stretched on a bed of sickness, suffering from a malady no physician could alleviate — a broken heart. The days passed by, and there was no improvement in his condition; the golden cord was obviously loosed, and the strings of his life were parting. The news of his state was carried to his business haunts. His face, once so familiar in the city, was missed, and his absence noted. It must be no ordinary, no slight ailment, that kept him away from the place where money might be gathered in, and inquiries were made.

"So old Richard Hilliard is dying! They say he cannot get over the loss of his son, who went down with the Eglantine. An unfortunate piece of business that."

So spake the busy crowd, and then the subject was forgotten.

In his lonely chamber he lay reaping the reward of his ill-spent past. Utterly alone—for he would admit no acquaintance, and friend he had none—he lay on what seemed to be his dying bed, uncared for and unloved. All his physical wants were attended to by his servants, but the only one who would have given him the loving service of the heart was no longer there. Day and night the old man lay in what seemed to be a stupor, unheeding all that passed around, and drawing nearer the end of life. The doctor shook his head as he felt the feeble pulse, and tried in vain to rouse him.

"Has he no relative, no friend to care for him?" he asked.

But they looked at each other doubtfully, answering: "No; they had never heard him mention any. Mr. Christian was all he had."

And in his solitude strange visions haunted both waking and sleeping hours. Visions of the past filling him with remorse; visions of the present thrilling his heart with anguish; visions of what might have been, teaching him the bitter lesson of a ruined, wasted life. Vivid memories were ever present of doubtful deeds; and worse—of things done, and things left undone; of words he would fain have recalled. But it was too late! the irrevocable past lay far beyond his reach; he could but lie and look at it with the fruitless repentance of an aching heart.

Every-Day Heroes.—It is a curious and painful thing to think of the tens of thousands of men who start out for their daily toil with the certain knowledge that the trade they are following is dangerous and injurious, and will sooner or later in all probability cause them to die a violent death, or cut them off by premature decay. No man can visit the mining districts, for instance, or dwell in the Black Country, England, without becoming aware that in every house the same kind of skeleton is to be found—the fear that "something may happen." Think of those who go to their trade of lucifer match-making—or rather, who went some years ago, for science has abolished many of the evils attending this and other trades—and were almost certain to be attacked with the most terrible disorder that ever assailed humanity, "necrosis of the jaw;" of artificial flower-makers, almost certain to suffer in health by inhaling the coloring-matter of the flowers, and not unfrequently becoming afflicted with blindness; of metal miners, the average of whose lives throughout the kingdom was not long since only thirty-three years; of glass manufacturers; of cartridge and percussion-cap makers; of paper-stainers; and innumerable other occupations in which the work meant death.

I REMEMBER once I was asked to allow a man to drive me from Stafford, Connecticut, to Wellington, and when I got into the "buggy," as we call it in America, with a silver-mounted harness and a tiptop turn-out—we were going in very fine style—the driver said:

"This is the happiest day in my life. When I found you were going to Wellington to lecture, I asked the committee to give me the privilege of driving you over. That is my native place, and the last day I was there I was carted out of it. I was a poor miserable drunkard then, and everybody discarded me, and I was carted out of it. One man lent me a horse, and such a horse! I never drove such a horse in my life. I could not see its head for a long time. There was I with my wife and my children, every thing I had in the world, in that one-horse cart. Now I am driving you back with a pair of horses. Mine! I own them! A pair of horses; good travellers, ain't they?

"The happiest day in my life, sir. Why, there is my old father, who lives there, and my mother who has prayed for me for years, she lives there, and the people have asked me to bring you." So he was very cheery as he went along. Presently he said, "Mr. Gough, do you think I'm a brute?" "No." "Well, I may not look like a brute, still I was a brute. I was in my house, sir, I had been drinking pretty heavily, I was just ripe for mischief, and a boy of mine opened the door, and as soon as he saw me he turned right off and ran. I said, 'Jack, Jack, come here! come out here!' He knew better than to run when I talked like that. He came back.

"His face was all bruised, and blood was running down from a little cut over the eye. 'What have you been doing?' 'Been fighting.' 'What have you been fighting for?' 'Don't want to tell you, father!' 'Don't want to tell me; come here?' I took him right by the collar of his little jacket. 'Now tell me what you have been fighting for.' 'I don't want to!' 'Tell me, or I will cut the life out of you; tell me what you have been fighting for?' 'I don't want to, father!' I drew my fist and struck him a tremendous blow on the face.

"Wiping away the blood and tears with his hand, 'Don't beat me like that; if you don't beat me, I'll tell you.' 'What is it?' 'There was a boy told me my father was a poor old drunkard and I licked him, and if he says so again I will lick him again, though you beat me for it, father.' Did I not love that boy? I could have worshipped him, and yet for years I cursed him by my drunkenness. The love of the drink was stronger than the love for my child."

This is the reason why we battle it. It is not because it takes a few coppers out of your pocket. It is not because it makes you a little poorer. It is not because it is no use for you physically. It is for the debasing, degrading, damning influence of drink upon all that is noble, and bright, and manly, and beautiful.

What did Canon Farrar tell us the other day, of a man in Manchester drunk and a little creature only two years old was crying—only two years old? "Stop that noise," shouted the father. The little creature did not know it was doing any harm, and continued crying, and what did that father do? Took her up and put her on the fire. Now I say no man but a drunken man or a madman would do such a thing as that.

You know as well as I do of the brutalities caused by the drink, and I could tell you of instances that would make your hair stand on end and your flesh creep. And because of this we fight it.

Another thing is that it gains such a hold upon a man. Now no man intended to become a drunkard. There are young men here, there are boys here, when they take their little drop of beer they do not suppose they are going to become drunkards. They argue in this way—I am not going into the argument—"I can let it alone when I please; I have got a mind of my own, and I can drink a glass of ale without its doing me any particular injury." Well, but you must remember this, that every man who has become an intemperate man has become so in trying to drink moderately, in trying to take a glass with his friends. And when a man finds out it is injuring him, he says he will quit it. But that is the very time when a man will not quit it.

THE DRINK IN SEVEN DIALS.

I went out one Sunday between twelve and one o'clock—half-past twelve and one—down Seven Dials. I went to see what was to be seen there. There were crowds of people—quite a large crowd. One man was telling some pretty strong temperance truths: but I looked at the people. There was one woman, it seemed to me she had but one garment on her, and it was a bitter cold day, as you know. She stood shivering in the cold, but she had threepence in her hand and was watching the door of "The Grapes." I saw men licking their white lips, and their tongues were as white as their lips, waiting for the door to open at one o'clock.

I saw boys and girls of sixteen years of age, in such a wretched state of poverty. Now I do not believe such poverty need exist. My heart bled for them, waiting in crowds for those doors to open at one o'clock with a few pence. And that man who spoke to them said:

"Why some of you have not got a shirt on, and yet you are going to pay money that ought to buy you a shirt into the brewery and into the public-house. The consequence is there is a lot of shirting in the factories, trade is bad, and people cannot get employment because the factories are overstocked. Why don't you go and buy linen and shirting and leather instead of making away with your money in beer, and you get nothing for it."

I stood and looked—I speak my own sentiments, not yours—I looked at the name on that public-house, "Truman, Hanbury & Buxton." I shall answer for what I say in the day of judgment, but, so help me God, in the hour of extremity I would not have my name on such a house as that for all the money spent in drink, and that is 140 million pounds sterling a year. I could not sleep at night; and to me it is the most astounding thing in this country that men should get their living, make money and grow rich out of the pence of the poor squandered in intoxicating drink. It seems to me a fearful business.

Oh, the infatuation of men who love the drink! We sing

"Britons never shall be slaves."

I spoke once to 500 slaves. I suppose there was not a dozen free people in the house. It was in 1847, in Virginia. They were obliged to have a certain number of white persons there to form what they called a legal assembly, because the negroes, the slaves, were not allowed to come together unless they had a certain number of white people to constitute a lawful or legal assembly. Nearly all the audience were slaves. To be sure some of them were as white as you or I. I asked a gentleman sitting by my side why they had so many white girls. I said, "There is a girl with blue eyes and straight hair." "She is a slave," he replied, "and has some taint of the negro." It was an awful sight. I spoke and said something about heaven, and one man got up and commenced a song, and before he had sung two words the whole company joined in chorus—

"I'm bound for the land of Canaan,
Come go along with me:
We'll all pass over Jordan
And sing the jubilee.

"Dar we shall see Jesus,
Come go along with me,
We'll all pass over Jordan
And sing the jubilee."

They sang some fifteen verses with that chorus.

When I got up to speak, a man stepped from the foot of the pulpit, and said, "Before Massa Gough begins, I want you just to look at me, bredren. Bredren, here's a nigger doesn't own hisself. My massa owns me; he bought me in the market-place—paid dollars for me. Yes, bredren, here's a nigger doesn't own hisself, bless the Lord! Ah, yes, bredren, this poor old body of mine, the bones and the sinews of this old body of mine, is massa's slave; but, glory to God, bredren, my soul is the free man of the Lord Jesus.

Ah! there is not a drunkard in England can say that. There is not a drunkard in England can say that he is not a meaner slave than the slave who is bought and sold for dollars. Why? Because he has sold himself. And what does he get? Wretchedness, misery, raggedness, destitution, and poverty. "Who hath woes? who hath contentions? He that tarries long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine."

Therefore, because there is no good in it we wage war against it, and we want to sweep it out of existence. But you say, it's going to be a hard job. Well, we know it is.

And shall we appeal to Christian men to practise self-denial, and shall we appeal to them in vain? Oh! you that have hearts to feel, with heads to plan and hands to work for the good of your fellows—shall we appeal to you in vain? There is not one of you here but if there was

and you should be standing in the crowd, and you should see on looking up at that window something that you thought was a child, but would say, "What is that?" "It is a boy—a boy in the fire." "So it is; it is a child there."

Now, will you hesitate? Will you ask questions concerning the parentage of that child? Will you ask if he belongs to your class in society? Will you talk of the parents being so injudicious as to leave a child there exposed? No! If that was the child of the meanest thief that ever cursed this metropolis, there are very few young men here who would wait a moment. A ladder would be raised; there would be a rivalry; "hand over hand, hand over hand." Some noble fellow would climb. He reaches the threshold.

The child is gone. Does he stop? No, he plunges through the window; and the shower of cinders, and the cloud of smoke, and he sheet of flame tell he is taking a leap. Every eye is fixed on the window; your tongue grows stiff; your lips grow dry; you cling to your next neighbor for support; the crackling of the timbers, and the falling of the beams, and the roaring of the flames, only convey to your minds the horrible idea, "There is a child in that fire!" and you stand looking, and some one cries, "He is coming!" "No, no, it is not him, it is but a cloud of smoke;" and your heart sinks within you, and you feel as if you should faint; and some one cries out again, "He is coming now!" "Yes, I see him; he has got the boy with him." "So he has, so he has! Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! he has got the boy; he has saved the boy!" That is glorious.

Next morning in the newspapers—"Heroic daring of a noble fellow, who at the peril of his own life plunged into the fire to save a child." All this is right. But let me tell you, young men, that if you exert an influence to save one man only from the slavery and bondage of evil passion, that is as much more than the other as the soul is worth more than the body. Yet all this is before the eyes of your fellow-men, and it does not require quite so much moral courage to save a child from the fire as it does quietly aud unostentatiously to deny self on all occasions for the good of others, having faith that the Father that seeth in secret shall, in His own good time, reward you openly, and you must wait for your reward till then.

I speak not in the spirit of dictation, not as a teacher or instructor, but simply for the cause I love, for the cause which I believe to be a good one, for the cause which I maintain to be the cause of Him who loveth the creatures He hath made. Not, oh! not as putting my cause before the Gospel! Oh, no! The Bible, the blessed Bible, first always and every thing else in subservience to it. That is my doctrine—the Bible first. Yes, the Gospel is "the power of God unto salvation," and the principles I advocate are but human principles, human agencies, to do a certain work; and every child in this assembly will know, that if intemperance is produced by the use of an article, the disuse of that article cures intemperance, though it may not cure a man of any other sin under heaven; and if a young man practises the principle of total abstinence he cannot be a drunkard, though he may be a thief, a liar, a Sabbath-breaker, or a profane swearer.

I look upon total abstinence as in numerous cases removing the hindrance to a man's reception of religious truth. Thus I feel that in bringing him up from the ditch and drawing him by a pure human agency to the threshold of the church he is better prepared to understand and appreciate religious truth than when he is a drunkard, and I can ask God to sanctify my cause to a higher end than the mere lifting a man from the ditch—of ruin and degradation; and I pray God that when I die I may die right in the harness, battling against the instrumentalities that have tended so much to keep young men out of the Church of God, to build a barrier between them and the sanctuary, and a hindrance between them and the religious truth which they must receive through the understanding that is darkened by the power of this fearful habit.

And I say, then, I believe our movement has claims upon your sympathy, upon your co-operation—at any rate upon your careful, prayerful investigation. I know very well that the movement I advocate is in advance of public sentiment; and the truest men, the freest men that ever lived, men that were their own masters, that were serving God, and rendering Hin swift obedience—these have been men who hav been in advance of the public sentiment of thei age, and have labored for others.

Count me over the chosen heroes of this earth and I will show you men who stood alone—wh came out like glorious iconoclasts, to beat dow the Dagon worshipped by their fathers. They wer persecuted, they were hooted, they were maltreated but they stood firm. They looked into the futur and they saw the golden beam inclining to the sid of perfect justice; they believed in the future; the had faith in God, and they worked, and this gener tion is rejoicing in the fruits of their labors, and honoring the men that were despised, because the were in advance of the public sentiment of the ag And this movement is in advance of public sent ment; but I thank God it is a progressive mov ment.

Yes, I remember reading the first constitution the first temperance society formed in Americ This movement was born in the Church of Chri and that which is born there will never die—neve They were men of God that first raised the barri They were persecuted; their cattle were mutilate their fruit-trees were injured; their houses we blackened; they were hooted and pelted throu the streets; strings were passed across the pav ment, and when they came by, the strings we stretched, and they were thrown down. Th suffered, and suffered what no man suffers to-d for this cause at any rate, But it was like remo ing the first turf to prepare a bed on which to l the corner-stone; and it was laid by men of fa and prayer, and the building has been in progr till now, each stone being cemented to its fellow love, and truth, and sympathy, and good-will.

Ah, it is a glorious superstructure to-day! Pil after pillar, tower after tower, column after colun, with the capitals emblazoned with emblems of lo truth, sympathy, good-will to man. It rises bef us. Old men gaze upon it; their hearts swell in ticipation of the day when the capstone shall be upon it, though they will not live to see it. Me eyed women weep as it grows in beauty; children strew the pathway of the workmen with flowers, and bind wreaths around their brows. We do not see its beauty, we do not see its magnificence yet. Why! Because it is in course of erection. The scaffolding is all around it; ropes, and poles, and ladders, and workmen, ascending and descending, mar the beauty of the superstructure.

But by and by the heads of those who have labored shall come up over a thousand battle-fields, waving with bright grain, never to be crushed in the accursed distillery—through vineyards, under trellis-vines, with grapes hanging in all their purple glory, never to be pressed into that which shall debase a man—shall come up through orchards, under trees hanging thick with their golden pulpy fruit, never to be turned into that which can injure and degrade humanity—shall come to the last fire in the last distillery and put it out; to the last stream of liquid death, and seal it up forever; to the last weeping wife, and wipe her tears gently away; to the last little child, and lift him up to stand where the Creator meant he should stand; to the last drunkard, and nerve him to burst his burning fetters and make a glorious accompaniment to the song of freedom by the clanking of his broken chains.

Then, then, the capstone will be set upon the building; the pale horse, with death for his rider, shall receive a check upon his bridle that shall bring him back on his haunches; the last shout shall be heard; the last drunkard shall go into the building, leaving his broken fetters behind him; and rejoicing shall be heard in heaven, when the triumphs of this and every great moral enterprise shall usher in the day of the triumphs of the cross of Christ.

I believe it, on my soul I believe it! For this I am laboring. Will you, my hearers, individually give your influence to this movement, in the spirit of self-denial, showing yourselves to be true men, who seek others' and not your own good altogether? And remember that in this fleeting world of change, with its fashion passing away, you may be privileged to exert an influence that can never die. In the language of Thomas Knox, of Edinburgh,—

> "Though scoffers ask, where is your gain?
> And mocking say your work is vain,
> Such scoffers die, and are forgot,
> Work done for God, it dieth not.
>
> "Press on! press on! nor doubt, nor fear,
> From age to age this voice shall cheer,
> Whate'er may die and be forgot,
> Work done for God, it dieth not."

Miss Weston, who is doing such a great work amongst the sailors of the English navy, not long ago at the close of a meeting, when some men were being urged to give their hearts to Christ and become total abstainers, was accosted by a sweep, a man of notoriously drunken habits. She was persuading him to sign the pledge. He took the pen in his hand, placed his hand on the book, and as he was about to write his name he looked up: "Please, miss, be you a teetotaler?" "Well," she said, "no, not exactly, but I take it in moderation." "Then," said he, throwing down the pen, "I'll do as the lady does; I'll take it in moderation." Nothing would make that man sign. Back he went! This decided her to become a total abstainer.

Suits of mourning and expensive funerals are often a serious tax entailed by custom on bereaved families, and many a widow and her fatherless children have increased the privations of their condition by an effort in this way to express their reverence for the deceased. The Rev. Mr. McLeod, of Philadephia, in the course of an able and vigorous protest against this waste of resources, suggests that in place of full mourning a bit of black ribbon on coat or cloak should be worn, which would effect the desired object as well as the most expensive and complete suit. He quaintly suggests that if it is necessary to spend the sum of money usually devoted to these habiliments of woe they might be sent to the heathen, "who in their sorrow at the grave have no hope."

THE READING OF THE LAW.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 2d.—Neh. 8. Golden Text, Ps. 119:130. By Mrs. M Baxter.

THE building of the wall of Jerusalem was finished, in spite of all the hindrances which the enemies of God and His people had placed in the way. Nehemiah had appointed a man over Jerusalem who was "a faithful man, and feared God above many." He appointed watches also in the city, "every one to be over against his house" (chap. 7 : 2, 3). Oh that we might learn also this lesson! How many Christian parents forget to keep a watch over their own households for the Lord! and thus it happens that many earnest Christians have unconverted and even worldly children, which bring scandal and distrust upon the name of Christian.

Just at this time it would seem that a thirst for Bible knowledge broke out among the people. They "gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate [for the feast of the seventh month (Lev. 23 : 24–36)]; and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel." This is blessed. The demand came from the people, and it was not the vain, hopeless effort of the priest to force attention upon an unwilling people. And the real thirst for the Word of God exists much more widely than we are aware of, but few are honest enough to speak to their ministers what they think about it.

Ezra the priest was ready enough to comply with such a request, and he gave them such a Bible reading as had not been known in Jerusalem since the time of Josiah. There stood the congregation in the open street, where no traffic took place, for the people were all at the Bible reading; and Ezra began as soon as it was light in the morning, and read straight on till midday.

And it was done with great solemnity. Ezra stood upon a pulpit of wood, and beside him were the Levites, and he "opened the book in the sight of all the people; . . . and when he opened it all the people stood up: and Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands; and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground." Thus they listened with intense reverence to God's Word, and as those who knew they stood in His presence. We may learn a lesson from them. The people were there with bowed heads, and it is both unbecoming and useless for us to read God's Word otherwise than with understanding and will bowed before Him to be instructed and directed. If we come to God's Word as critics, we forget ourselves and who it is that speaks to us; if we come to the Word as those who understand it all beforehand, we are not come to learn, and the Book will be closed to our understanding.

Ezra was not alone; the Levites caused the people to understand the law. Probably there was a large after-meeting, in which the Levites had plenty of work with individual inquirers—for it is not said they explained the law: they went a step further, and made them understand it. It is the marvel of all who work in after-meetings how very little the people have understood of what was said. For instance, perhaps the preacher has proved with the utmost clearness that by the works of the law no flesh is justified before God, and nevertheless the first answer we receive in the after-meeting is, "I do try all I can." Again, perhaps he has been saying that it is by faith and not by feeling that we are saved and assured of our salvation, and that God's written Word is enough for us to rest upon without any emotion. To every believer present it is so clear that he could almost wish he were unconverted that he might accept so easy a salvation, but you will hear again and again in the after-meeting, "I cannot feel I believe."

"So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly"—this is a great and important point, and well would it be for every young minister to lay stress upon it and do likewise—"and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." When the Bible is thus read, it is not human, it is all divine. Oh! how true is our golden text, "The entrance of Thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple."

Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites were exceedingly happy, and they said unto all the people, "This day is holy unto the Lord your God; mourn not, nor weep. For all the people wept, when they heard the words of the law. Then he [Nehemiah] said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength." No doubt they had seen their great responsibility as a people called to be holy unto the Lord, and they felt it was impossible, but Nehemiah pointed them to the source of strength which should still all their doubts and fears. Not their own joy, but the joy of the Lord. In hearing His word and seeking to take it fully in they were giving joy to the heart of God, and His joy in them was their strength. Our strength is the assurance that we please God. Without such an assurance it is impossible to be strong in Him. "So the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace, for the day is holy; neither be ye grieved."

It would seem that they were all comforted. Doubtless many have been unforgiven sinners up to this time, and God gave them His peace; others had sins of omission or commission upon their consciences, and it may be, and probably was so, that the Levites showed them the way of return by confession and by faith in Him who had said many years before (Job 33 : 24), "I have found a ransom." In both cases there would be the question, But how about the future? How can I break through long-formed habits of sin and unfaithfulness? And they learned the blessed truth, "I will trust, and not be afraid: for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song" (Isaiah 12 : 2).

"And all the people went their way to eat and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them." "The entrance of Thy words giveth light," not the mere hearing of them. "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you" (John 15 : 7). The long reading of the first day had not tired the people, and on the second day there they were, ready again, and the heads of the people especially, to understand the words of the law. Then they discovered a long-neglected command, that they should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh month. They were well prepared to do any thing which they should find to be the will of God, and without any reasoning, because the habit had been so long in disuse, they set to work immediately to go forth into the woods to bring olive-branches and pine-branches, and they made themselves booths wherever they had an available space. This would seem a small matter to rejoice about, but nevertheless they did rejoice. And it is ever so. When a willing heart discovers the smallest thing to be the will of God, and does it, then a sweetness, a sense of understanding between him and God creeps over him. "And there was very great gladness."

"Also day by day, from the first day unto the last day, he read in the book of the law of God." This was the wellspring of their joy: God was speaking to them through His word. Moses, speaking of the words of God's law, said, "For it is not a vain thing for you, for it is your life." No knowledge is so precious as the knowledge of what God hath said. Oh, how deeply may we pity those who have not this sure foundation! The wretched uncertainty of mere ideas and opinions, with no certain guarantee as to their truth—how different from the Word which the eternal God has given to us to unveil His mind and heart, and to lead us in His ways!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Queen of England has published a letter saying she desires to "express publicly her heartfelt thanks for the universal and most touching sympathy shown to her by all classes of her loyal and faithful subjects on the present occasion, when it has pleased God to call away from this world her dearly-beloved daughter, the Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse. Overwhelmed with grief at the loss of a dear child, who was a bright example of loving tenderness, courageous devtion, and self-sacrifice to duty, it is most soothing to the Queen's feelings to see how entirely her grief is shared by her people.

"Seventeen years ago, at this very time, when a similar bereavement crushed the Queen's happiness, and this beloved and lamented daughter was her great comfort and support, the nation evinced the same touching sympathy, as well as when, in December, 1871, the Prince of Wales was at the point of death. Such an exhibition of true and tender feeling will ever remain engraven on the Queen's heart, and is the more to be valued at this moment of great distress in the country, which no one more deeply deplores than the Queen herself."

A Pentecost in Southern India.—The Rev. J. E. Clough, of the American Baptist Mission among the Teloogoos of Southern India, writes that in six weeks he and his assistants have baptized 8691 converts. These are the men and women who dug the three and a half miles of the Buckingham Canal during the late famine, thereby earning the means to save their families from great suffering, and even from death. At least one half of all the baptized date their conversion or conviction to that time and place. There are many candidates for baptism waiting to be examined, and Mr. Clough believes that 5000 more converts will be brought in by the end of the year. Mr. Williams writes that he found Mr. Clough and helpers "literally crowded upon by the people who were pressing into the kingdom of God. I saw what few missionaries have seen. More than a thousand people from one of the Ongole Pallums came into the compound and gave up their idols. They showed how they had worshipped them in former times with music and dancing around the idols, and then said that henceforth they would worship the living God, who had helped them in time of trouble. They declared that they believed in Christ, the only Saviour of the world."

Bismarck's latest action has caused widespread consternation in Germany. He has prepared a bill which, under his auspices, will probably become law, nominally to enforce order in the Reichstag, but really designed as a check on the right of free speech. It empowers a committee of two vice-presidents and ten members of the House to punish any member who may use "unbecoming language" in the course of the debates. The phrase defining the offence is so vague and elastic that it will form a dangerous element in political life, and may, in unscrupulous hands, be used for the purpose of crushing out free speech and honest criticism in the representative houses. It is doubtless very convenient for a minister to have the opposition put to silence; but this method of performing the operation is more "high-handed" than safe. It is very much like fastening down the safety valve of an engine and sitting on it; if it were tried in some countries we know of it would have a similar result. Germany must have become very tame if she suffers so tight a muzzle to be quietly affixed.

A British merchant, who had taken his passage in a Turkish vessel on the Levant, had his attention directed during the voyage to an interesting slave, a Mussulman, with whom he soon fell into conversation. He found him intelligent, quick, and of strong, lively affections. He drew from him some particulars of his history, and found that he had been free-born, but had been made captive in war. His misfortunes fell heavily on his spirit; and he felt the weight of the miserable yoke he was doomed to bear.

The merchant was touched with sympathy for this helpless captive. The more he knew of him the deeper was the interest he felt in his welfare; and he actually began to entertain the thought of effecting his release. Cautiously inquiring as to the sum requisite for this purpose, he found that it was considerably greater than the mercantile profits of his entire voyage. Still he could not abandon the thought. He spoke to the captain, to whom this interesting Mussulman belonged, and offered him a price for his ransom. His offer was accepted; but the slave having overheard part of the conversation between the captain and the merchant, and mistaking the design of the latter, supposing, in fact, that he was purchasing him to retain him in slavery for his own use, he sprang forward, his eyes gleaming with indignation, and cried out, "And do you call yourself a free-born Briton, and an enemy to slavery wherever it exists, and yet purchase me!"

He was proceeding on in a strain of burning, indignant invective, when the merchant turned his eyes affectionately upon him, and said: "I have bought you to set you free." Instantly the storm of passion was hushed; the slave burst into tears; and, falling at the feet of his deliverer, he exclaimed, "You have taken my heart captive! I am your slave forever."

A new missionary field is opened in Central Africa, to which our missionary societies cannot too promptly give their attention. The discoveries of Livingstone and Stanley must be utilized for Christ and that great unknown land claimed for Him, as a part of His spiritual kingdom. Preparations are already being made to sow the seeds of error there, as is shown by the news from Rome that the Pope has sent ten Jesuits to Central Africa to evangelize the countries comprised in that vast continent. The mission will cost $40,000.

Those who know the earnestness and self-denying energies of the Society of Jesus will recognize the danger menaced by their expedition.

Lord Beaconsfield has always made a boast of his Jewish origin, and has, in season and out of season, proclaimed the superiority of the Jewish race to all others. It is he who said, "The Jews might well be satisfied with their position in the Christian world, for one half of that world worshipped a Jew and the other half a Jewess;" and in a passage recently quoted by a London paper he says: "In this enlightened age the pupil of Moses may ask himself whether all the princes of the house of David have done so much for the Jews as that Prince who was crucified on Calvary. Had it not been for Him the Jews would have been comparatively unknown. Has not He made their history the most famous of the world? What successes did they anticipate from their Messiah? The wildest dreams of their rabbins have been far exceeded. Has not Jesus conquered Europe, and changed its name into Christendom? All countries that refuse the Cross wither, while the whole of the New World is devoted to the Semitic principle and its most glorious offspring, the Jewish faith; and the time will come when the vast communities and countless myriads of America and Australia, looking upon Europe as Europe now looks upon Greece, and wondering how so small a space could have achieved such great deeds, will still find music in the songs of Zion, and still seek solace in the parables of Galilee."

Begging Nuns in England.—The action taken by Mr. Rayner Wood in recently arresting two "Sisters of Charity" on a charge of begging has been made the subject of severe criticism. The Manchester magistrates discharged these sisters on the ground that they were connected with a charitable institution. But the magistrates of Derby, in a similar case (reported in the Derby Mercury of September 1st, 1875), came to a different conclusion. The sisters arrested by the chief constable were only discharged upon the understanding that they would discontinue the practice within the jurisdiction of that district. If the decision of the Manchester magistrates is to be upheld, it would countenance the solicitation of alms by beggars on the plea that it is for their starving families at home; and what is to prevent a house-to-house visitation by the emissaries of the several bodies who may "ask alms" for fictitious benefit societies or clubs? These begging nuns are themselves a nuisance; no house, no office is free from them, and their solicitations are preferred with so great importunity and persistency, that many are induced to yield to their requests in order to free themselves of their intrusions. It is evident, from the report in the Derby Mercury, that large sums of money are obtained in this way, and the distribution of these sums must prove influential for purposes of proselytism to Popery.

Anecdotes of Princess Alice.—The Rev. C. Keen, Baptist minister of Redhill, in a memorial sermon for the Princess Alice, related the following instance of the Princess's geniality of heart and sympathy with the suffering. One of the members of his church, who was for a short time during last summer an inmate of the Convalescent Home at Eastbourne, told him,—"The late Princess Alice visited the Home while I was there, and won all our hearts. She came into the room, and spoke so kindly to every one. No other visitor ever came inside the sitting-room door. There was a poor child, a cripple, in the room, whose cushions she moved with her own hands to make her more comfortable; and of every one who seemed to be suffering she asked so kindly what was the matter, and if they had been long ill. On the bed of a poor Irishwoman she sat and read to her. I saw much of her, and was much impressed with her simplicity of manner, additionally shown at a school treat to which she and her whole party went, and joined in the recreations of the children." "Truly," said the preacher, "the late Princess rests from her labors, and her works do follow her."

Cinchona Rubra is asserted, by Dr. D'Unger, to be a specific for drunkenness. Its action is defended on the alleged fact that alcohol and sugar, or, what is the same, alcohol and any food containing starch, produces in the human system something akin to yeast germs or spores, which spores are the inciting stimuli of the appetite for alcohol. The Cinchona destroys these spores, and thus eradicates the cause of the appetite. The remedy is worthy trying. Numerous cures are claimed for it, some of them certified by eminent names. Moreover, if the effect of Cinchona Rubra thus demonstrates that alcoholism is an organic poison, we shall have gained more than the benefit of the antidote. We shall have the fact that liquor-sellers are public-poisoners, scattering the spores of organic disease. This view places liquor-prohibitory laws in the category of laws protective of public health, such as sanitary legislation.

Nihilism in Russia.—By the accounts which are published in the Russian papers it is evident, says the Evening Standard, that Nihilism is spreading with great rapidity, and that the authorities are becoming exceedingly alarmed at its threatening aspects. It manifests itself in all classes of society, and has its agents among the secret police and in the court itself; the army is permeated with it; and the students and the younger professional men appear to be Nihilist to a man, and, with the fervor and enthusiasm of youth, are reckless in the betrayal of thei sentiments. In some of the universities all discipline appears to be at an end; the professor are hissed and hooted, and are altogether powerless to keep order. Assassinations continue threatening letters are the terror abroad, inflammatory pamphlets are circulated broadcast, an authority appears to be helpless against this recent and ubiquitous enemy. There can be n doubt that Russia is approaching an intern crisis of the most serious kind.

MR. HENRY VARLEY, the Evangelist.

MR. HENRY VARLEY.

HENRY VARLEY is a native of Lincolnshire, England, having been born at Tattershall in 1835, and is therefore now forty-four years old. His earliest religious impressions were the result of a pious mother's watchful care. His parents were both well educated, but his mother especially so, and for some years she was at the head of a large ladies' boarding-school in Lincoln. She died while he was a boy; but amongst the most precious memories of his life are the hours when he would sit by her bedside and read her favorite hymns to her, especially Toplady's "Rock of Ages." Her influence over her boy had been so sweet and holy, and his young life was so bound up in hers, that when death called her home he felt for the time as if life in this world had lost all its attraction for him.

His school-days were spent in Tattershall, under the tuition of an able mathematical scholar, Mr. Boole. He made his mark in the school in two directions: he was sharp at figures, and was a capital elocutionist. Leaving school at about thirteen years of age, he entered his father's business in Lincoln, and a year later came to London at pursue the same trade. One Sunday afternoon when he was out for a walk he happened to pass through Trafalgar Square when Mr. Kirton was engaged in distributing tracts in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Kirton, placing a tract in the youth's hand, kindly asked him whether he would accompany him to Mr. Baptist Noel's Chapel in John Street, Bedford Row. He needed no pressing to comply with the invitation, and his acceptance of it was the beginning of his devoting himself to the service of his Redeemer.

At John Street Chapel he had the privilege of becoming a member of the class conducted by the well-known John Roberts, who has but recently exchanged earth for heaven. Over Henry Varley his influence, perhaps, can hardly be estimated at too high a value, he was so deep and thorough, so elevating and sanctifying. This is Henry Varley's description of him when, as a boy of fifteen, he first became a member of Mr. Roberts's class in Calthorpe Street Schools: "There, upon the slightly raised stool, sat this man of God, surrounded by about one hundred and thirty members and visitors. To see him at once secured attention; you felt that that class had a centre and a head of no mean order. He might have been a descendant of one of the old Puritans, such massive firmness couched in the quiet of the placid face, and yet so tender that at times the voice seemed almost inadequate to express the exquisite gentleness that the sympathy and love of Christ had imparted to him. Somehow he possessed our hearts, heads, and lives, and shaped them to a divine fashioning."

It was to the instructions of this friend and teacher that Mr. Varley attributed his conversion, and in 1853 he was baptized by Mr. Baptist Noel, and admitted as a member of the church at John Street. His business as a vendor of meat soon afterwards took him to Australia; but he retained his membership with the church where he had received such spiritual profit until he returned in 1857. It was, at his return, his fixed resolve to prepare for the work of the ministry, and to go back to settle in Australia; but the providence of God had ordered otherwise. He was now a married man—married, we may say in passing, to one who has been his true helpmeet in all godly work, and but for whom, as his friends have often heard him say, he never could have accomplished what he has been enabled to do.

He relinquished all thoughts of leaving England, and set up in business in Holland Park, Notting Hill. Meeting his old teacher, Mr. Roberts, in those days, he said to him, "Notting Hill seems so dark, and everybody so strange; I am not sure I have not made a mistake in going there."—"Dark, is it?" characteristically replied his old friend. "Well, as London increases westward, the authorities don't multiply the lamps in Oxford Street, but they carry the main pipes down the principal roads, and extend the lamps. Go, my young friend, down there, and shine for Christ."

He had not been there more than twelve months before it became evident that, notwithstanding his business success, he had a higher calling, to which he was devoting himself heart and soul. He never regretted being engaged in business, because it gave him a position of unquestionable disinterestedness from which to speak to men of business of the importance of seeking, first of all, "the kingdom of God and His righteousness." Often as we have heard our friend address large gatherings, we think he has never been more truly at home than when he has been speaking faithful and loving words to the journeymen butchers of London.

Perhaps his first regular preaching efforts began in 1860, when he became superintendent of the Kensington Potteries' School. Certain it was that these efforts eventually resulted in the erection of the West London Tabernacle, St. James's Square, Notting Hill. It should be known that the cost of this building, capable of holding two thousand persons, was met by Mr. Varley and his father-in-law. It should also be understood that he chooses to be known as a "Lay Evangelist," and used to be absent from Notting Hill several times during a month, engaged in evangelistic labors in various parts of England. He would sometimes have in one week between forty and fifty applications to conduct services in neighborhoods where a harvest of precious souls might be reaped; and we are glad to know that during his absence the services of his son, a youth of great promise, have been highly valued.

As regards his characteristics as a preacher, which are so well known to many, he has a remarkable gift in the expounding of Holy Scripture, and ever aims to understand, and clearly to make known, what the mind of the Spirit is. He is also a fervent believer in and it is the deep impression which this truth has made upon his mind that has led him almost to deem "the world as his parish." No one can be in his company long without feeling that his belief in the speedy Advent of Christ is one of the deepest convictions of his nature, and the effect of this belief upon him is that it gives a solemn, yet gladsome, glow of feeling to all his words upon any subject. His preaching abounds in illustrations and pithy anecdotes, which are always introduced at the right moment, not for the mere embellishment of a discourse, but to carry it home to heart and conscience with more telling and more convincing power.

A West of England paper, speaking of some meetings at Plymouth, when the Guildhall was crowded by an immense congregation, expressed itself somewhat to this effect: "Mr. Varley is more polished than Mr. Moody; almost as solid, if not as smartly epigrammatic, as Mr. Spurgeon, and free from the gloominess that sometimes hung about the discourses of the Rev. William Taylor." In the Christian wholeness of the man, in the godly vitality of all his powers, may be found one of the causes of his growing popularity and usefulness.

What Dr. Tyng said of Mr. Varley's addresses in the city of New York can with equal propriety be applied to his sermons in the West London Tabernacle and throughout England. "I have no room," said Dr. Tyng, "to speak in terms befitting the cordial interest awakened in the minds of those ministerial brethren of various denominations who shared with me the opportunity of hearing him. The simplicity and directness of his expositions of Scripture, the vividness of his illustrations, the vigor of his personal appeals, may be judged of somewhat by the printed reports of his sermons; but no reader can supply the impressions made by voice and manner, by emphasis and tone, and it was these impressions that gave insight as to his calm resting upon God for strength and guidance, and noble longing for success as a servant of Jesus Christ."

To gain even an inkling of the stirring character of the circumstances under which Mr. Varley's sermons were given in New York, we have to read the newspapers of 1875. It was not at all unusual to see twenty thousand people filling every seat in the Hippodrome on a Sunday evening. On one of these occasions, when the Hippodrome was so densely packed as scarcely to leave standing room, he preached a solemn sermon on the parable of the five foolish virgins who took no oil in their lamps. Taking as his text the words, "And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," he said:

"The doctrine that the present dispensation is to continue until all nations are converted t the kingdom of Christ has long been given up b thousands of the most thoughtful students o the Word of God, and now the speedy end c this economy is anticipated as a period of mos solemn judgment. I believe that final crisis i near at hand. As it was in the days of Noah so shall it be in the coming of the Son of Man they were eating and drinking, marrying an giving in marriage, and knew not till the floo came and destroyed them all. Look at the citi over which the Dead Sea flows to-day—a testi mony of the literal fulfilment of God's proph ecies and warnings. Mark, too, that the proph ecies require that the Lord Jesus shall com before the world is converted; and so close believe, is that coming, that I should not be su prised to see Him before my hair grows gray."

In the Association Hall in New York M Varley's addresses attracted immense au ences, while drawing-room meetings gather together the upper class of society. The eff of his preaching was to kindle an enthusiasm the breasts of Christians generally, which hundreds of them seeking out their friends a relatives, and urging them to come and hear t Gospel. About a hundred ministers met h at the close of the month which he had engag to spend in the city, and begged him to rem at least another month, while at the same ti from Boston and Philadelphia the cry ca "Come over and help us."

Immense audiences everywhere atten throughout the country, at his various addr es, which the Rev. Theodore Cuyler said w delivered "in familiar, John-Bunyan-like E lish, and which held the large congregation tight as in a vice." It is believed that imme good resulted from his unceasing efforts, esp ally in New York and in Boston. For s weeks in New York he held continuous m ings six days of each week, always twice a and often three times. Those who watched work the most closely could not but say tha last discourses were the most powerful and pressive of all. In the course of these m ings he addressed audiences aggregating al 200,000 souls, hundreds of whom were verted; while thousands of professing Christians were edified, and lifted up to a life of sweeter restfulness in Christ than they had ever enjoyed before.

His tour in Canada in 1875 also must not be forgotten. During his visit to Toronto, where he went as a stranger, comparatively speaking, his friends at home were cheered from time to time by hearing of the city becoming a scene of wondrous working power. A correspondent wrote at the time: "Our brother Henry Varley and his dear wife have come to us in the fulness of the Gospel of Jesus, having been greatly blessed at Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, and Belleville, to the salvation of many souls. Already this country has beheld what God can do by a man 'wholly surrendered.' He has witnessed to thousands daily of an adorable Lord. Aldermen, professors, merchants, drunkards, young and old, educated, unlearned are daily testifying of the wondrous love of Jesus. Christians have been led to realize the riches of their inheritance, and awake out of the h-like sleep growing out of mere formalism ceremonialism.'' glancing once more at his English work, it be confidently affirmed that, during the last years, about one thousand persons have brought annually to religious decision as result of his labors. In connection with West London Tabernacle we may also state in addition to the several institutions usu- found in connection with a Christian rch, Mr. Varley opened, in September, 1876, 'Industrial Home for the Blind,'' where a iderable number of this afflicted class are dy engaged, and which promises to be a blessing to many of the poor blind and children.

r Mr. Varley's ''Annual Butchers' Festi- Mr. Spurgeon usually lends the Metropoli- Tabernacle, and it is a social gathering of al interest. At the first meeting of the held in 1864, it was attended by twenty- journeymen butchers, employed chiefly in Metropolitan Meat Market; but in last s gathering there were no less than 1550, es 250 visitors and friends.

is shows that although ''market-men'' are upposed to care very much about social re- s of such a character, they do care about Varley, and accept with pleasure the an- invitation which he and his good wife—his uable helper in all Christian work—kindly them.

will be ready to say that to undertake work large a scale Mr. Varley must be a man o ordinary physical strength. Perhaps, ver, the true secret of his getting through ich is the intense enjoyment he finds in his utmost ''while it is called to-day.'' rinks from no toil which promises to be l, and in a very noble sense will compass nd land to win souls for Christ. He has ar greater encouragements in his work many who have enjoyed much higher edu- al advantages, but we do not know any nore ready very cordially to rejoice in the ss of others.

Varley has recently announced his inten- f residing permanently in Australia, where e building is being prepared for evangeli- rvices. He is still in the vigor of his age; hat he may, in his new home be increasing- ful will, we trust, be the earnest prayer of reader of these lines.

aar at the Metropolitan Tabernacle.— Rev. C. H. Spurgeon having completed the y-fifth year of his pastorate, it has for time past been contemplated by the con- tion to present him with a testimonial on ccasion of what they term his ''pastoral wedding.'' Subscriptions have been re- d for this object, and a bazaar was held in cture-hall and school-room of the Taberna- Dec. 31st to Jan. 3d. Mr. Spurgeon hav- eclined to receive any thing for himself, it ecided that the proceeds should be devoted endowment of the almshouses in connec- with the Tabernacle. It was originally pro- to present Mr. Spurgeon with £5000 ,00), of which about £3000 ($14,580) has subscribed or promised. There were thirty among the contributors of which were the ns, who themselves supplied four or five, ders, the ministers and students of the Col- the Sunday-school, the Orphanage, the rtage, the College Evangelists, the Flower on, the Bible Classes, the Mothers' Meet- ass, the Evangelists' Association, the Evan- Choir, the Mansfield Street Sunday-school, utchers' Festival Committee, etc. The r was formally opened at two o'clock by ev. J. A. Spurgeon, brother of the Rev. Spurgeon, whose illness precluded his ice. The hymn, ''Let us with a gladsome '' was sung, and prayer was offered by the J. P. Chown, of Bloomsbury Chapel. The r was crowded, and was very successful. eceipts on each of the four days averaged en £600 and £700.

CHRISTMAS AT MR. SPURGEON'S ORPHANAGE AT STOCKWELL.

On the morning of Christmas Day, when the severe frost reached its acme of intensity, the sentiment uppermost in the minds of Londoners, whose enjoyments were not curtailed by cold and gloom, was that of ''seasonable weather.'' In the main thoroughfares the signs were few indeed that told of the hard times which have come upon the country. The dense fog of the preceding night having risen, large numbers of people were early abroad making their way into the suburbs, and the tramway cars, as well as the omnibuses, commanded a traffic all the more brisk because the trains were running ''as on Sundays.''

At the Stockwell Orphanage the preparations for the festive season were in keeping with the precedents of former years. When, in the early morning, the boys rose from their beds to peep at the frost-bound garden, and the mantle of crisp snow covering the housetops, they did so with a delightful consciousness that they had not been forgotten by their generous friend the Public.

The tables were spread for a feast; and in addition to an unstinted supply of beef and pudding, there were placed at every seat a box of figs an ornamental box of sweets, an orange, a costume cracker, and a new shilling. In honor of the friends who provided these special gifts the boys gave several hearty cheers. The chief source of regret was the absence of the President, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, who, notwithstanding a marked improvement in health on Christmas Eve, was confined to his room with a return of pain.

At half-past one o'clock, shortly before the dinner was brought into the hall, Mr. Thomas Olney told the boys that he was sorry Mr. Spurgeon would be unable to be present; but the pastor had sent a message, and hoped all would enjoy themselves. In return, the orphans sent their best love to the President, and hoped he would soon be well again.

The dinner was now served out by various friends who had come for that purpose, and, to judge from appearances, no repast in the wide area of London on the great festive day was more heartily enjoyed. After the boys had departed to the play-hall with their dessert, the working staff, with a number of friends and ''old boys,'' dined together, the joint chairmen of the day being Messrs. C. and T. Spurgeon, the twin sons of the President. The former brought a message from his father, who was sometimes afraid that he would never again be among his friends at the Orphanage on Christmas Day. This was a source of grief, and particularly so because others were grieved. Mr. C. Spurgeon closed by proposing ''The Health of the Visitors,'' which he hoped would be drunk in water, coupling with the toast the name of his brother Thomas.

Mr. T. Spurgeon said he was glad to be among the visitors; but even last year, on Christmas Day, he was with his friends at the Orphanage in spirit while rambling about a strawberry-garden in Australia. He had found that the people in the colonies were much interested in the Stockwell Orphans. On one occasion a congregation who had cleared their chapel of debt made a collection for Mr. Spurgeon's institution, and that large sum he (the speaker) had had the pleasure of bringing home. This showed the interest of the colonists, for they had plenty of similar institutions of their own to look after.

Some touching allusions were made to the illness of both Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon. The pastor was grieved on account of his sick wife, grieved to be himself laid aside when so much needed to be done, and yet he was happy in spirit, knowing that all things were working together for good. While glad to have such able substitutes for the absent President, Mr. Charlesworth, the master of the Orphanage, said that Mr. Spurgeon's empty chair was an eloquent speaker; for he who should have filled it was enshrined in the hearts' affection of the staff, and of all the ''old boys.'' It was something to be thankful for that there were two sons who could so ably assist their father in the pastoral office.

It should be stated that one of the speeches was made by Mr. Latymer, a former scholar, and now pastor of the Baptist church at Willingham, in Cambridgeshire. The young men who have passed through the institution are now rapidly increasing in number, and as all are welcomed to the feast on Christmas Day, the second dinner promises in the course of a few years to become as extensive as that of the boys. An additional large table—three in all—was required on the last occasion.

Mr. Spurgeon will proceed to Mentone directly he has sufficiently regained his strength to permit of his travelling, and will, it is expected, be absent for at least three months. During his absence—probably during the month of February—a repetition of the special evangelistic services held at the beginning of last year, and conducted by Messrs. Clarke and Smith, will take place for a period of about four weeks.

THE DYING BOY'S BORROWED SHILLING.

On December 28th, Dean Stanley addressed a number of children in Westminster Abbey, and in the course of his remarks he told the following story: Not long ago, in Edinburgh, two gentlemen were standing at the door of an hotel one very cold day, when a little boy, with a poor thin blue face, his feet bare and red with the cold, and with nothing to cover him but a bundle of rags, came and said, ''Please, sir, buy some matches.'' ''No; don't want any,'' the gentleman said. ''But they are only a penny a box,'' the poor little fellow pleaded. ''Yes, but you see we don't want a box,'' the gentleman said again. ''Then I will gie ye twa boxes for a penny,'' the boy said at last, and so to get rid of him, the gentleman who tells the story says—

''I bought a box; but then I found I had no change, so I said, 'I will buy a box to-morrow.' 'Oh, do buy them to-night, if you please!' the boy pleaded again; 'I will run and get ye the change, for I am verra hungry.' So I gave him the shilling, and he started away. I waited for him, but no boy came. Then I thought I had lost my shilling; still there was that in the boy's face I trusted, and I did not like to think bad of him. Late in the evening I was told a little boy wanted to see me; when he was brought in I found it was a smaller brother of the boy that got my shilling, but if possible still more ragged and poor and thin.

''He stood a moment, diving into his rags as if he was seeking something, and then said, 'Are you the gentleman that bought the matches frae Sandie?' 'Yes.' 'Weel, then, here's fourpence out o' yer shilling; Sandie cannot come; he's very ill; a cart ran ower him and knocked him down, and he lost his bonnet and his matches and your sevenpence, and both his legs are broken, and the doctor says he'll die; and that's a'.' And then, putting the fourpence on the table, the child broke down into great sobs. So I fed the little man, and I went with him to see Sandie. I found that the two little things lived alone, their father and mother being dead.

''Poor Sandie was lying on a bundle of shavings; he knew me as soon as I came in, and said, 'I got the change, sir, and was coming back; and then the horse knocked me down, and both my legs were broken; and, O Reuby! little Reuby! I am sure I am dying, and who will take care of you when I am gone? What will ye do, Reuby?' Then I took his hand, and said I would always take care of Reuby. He understood me, and had just strength to look up at me as if to thank me; the light went out of his blue eyes. In a moment

''He lay within the light of God,
Like a babe upon the breast,
Where the wicked cease from troubling,
And the weary are at rest.' ''

WHAT THE CITIES TEACH.

An Exploration Sermon by Dr. Talmage preached January 26, 1879.

"My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad."—ZECHARIAH 1 : 17.

Cities are not More Corrupt than Villages—Cities are Influenced by the Character of their Founders—The Cities should Form a Confraternity—The Lessons of the Cities—The World is a Scene of Toil and Struggle—The Best Places to Study Man—City Life is the Scene of Pretension and Double Dealing—There are Many Fields for Christian Work—Poverty and Squalor Intensified in the Cities—"God Don't Want me to Read and Write"—City Life is Full of Temptations—Getting Over Puritanical Notions—Charity does not Consecrate Unlawful Gains—The Temptations of a Political Character—Bad Literature at Work in Our Cities—No Man Safe without the Grace of God—God has put Warnings over all the Places of Temptation—Two Pillars of Light.

THE city is no worse than the country. The vices of the metropolis are more evident than the vices of the rural districts, because there are more people to be bad, if they wish to be. The merchant is as good as the farmer. There is no more cheating in town than out of town—no worse cheating; it is only on a larger scale. The countryman sometimes prevaricates about the age of the horse that he sells, about the size of the bushel with which he measures the grain, about the peaches at the bottom of the basket as being as large as those at the top, about the quarter of beef as being tender when it is tough; and to as bad an extent as the citizen, the merchant, ever prevaricates about calicoes, or silks, or hardware.

And as to villages, I think that in some respects they are worse than the cities, because they copy the vices of the cities in the meanest shape; and as to gossip, its heaven is a country village! Everybody knows everybody's business better than he knows it himself. The grocery store or the blacksmith shop by day and night is the grand depot for masculine tittle-tattle; and there are always in the village a half dozen women who have their sun-bonnets hanging near so that at the first item of news derogatory they can fly out and cackle it all over the town. Countrymen must not be too hard in their criticisms of the citizen, nor must the plough run too sharply against the yardstick.

Cain was the founder of the first city, and I suppose it took after him in morals. It takes a city a long while to escape from the character of a founder. Where the founders of a city are criminal exiles, the filth, the vice, the prisons, are the shadow of those founders. It will take centuries for New York to get over the good influence of the pious founders of that city—the founders whose prayers went up in the streets where now banks discount and brokers shave, and companies declare dividends, and smugglers swear Custom House lies; and above the roar of the wheels and the crack of the auctioneer's mallet ascends the ascription, "We worship thee, O thou almighty dollar!"

The old church that used to stand on Wall Street is to this day throwing its blessing on the scene of traffic, and on all the ships folding their white wings in the harbor. In other days people gathered in cities for defence—none but the poor, who had nothing to be stolen, lived in the country; but in these times, when through civilization and Christianity it is safe to live anywhere, people gather in the cities for purposes of rapid gain.

Cities are not evil necessarily, as some have argued. They have been the birthplace of civilization. In them, popular liberty has lifted its voice. Witness Genoa and Pisa and Venice. After the death of Alexander the Great, among his papers were found extensive plans of cities, some to be built in Europe, some to be built in Asia. The cities in Europe were to be occupied by Asiatics; the cities in Asia were to be occupied, according to his plans, by Europeans, and so there should be a commingling and a fraternity, and a kindness and a good will between the continents and between the cities. So there always ought to be. The strangest thing in my comprehension is that there should be bickerings and rivalries among our American cities. New York must stop caricaturing Philadelphia, and Philadelphia must stop picking at New York; and certainly the continent is large enough for St. Louis and Chicago. What is good for one city is good for all the cities. Here is the great highway of our national prosperity. On that highway of national prosperity walk the cities.

A city with large forehead and great brain—that is Boston; a city with deliberate step and calm manner—that is Philadelphia; a city with its pocket full of change—that is New York; two cities going with a rush that astounds the continent—they are St. Louis and Chicago; a city that takes its wife and children along with it—that is Brooklyn. Cincinnati, Louisville, Pittsburg, all the cities of the North, and all the cities of the South, some distinguished for one thing, some for another, one for professional ability, another for affluence, another for fashion, but not one to be spared. What advantages one, advantages all. What damages Boston Common damages Washington Square. Laurel Hill, Mount Auburn, Greenwood, weep over the same grief. New York helping to pay for the obsequies of plague-stricken New Orleans. The fires of Chicago and Boston a sore burn on the whole land. The statue of Benjamin Franklin in New York greeting the bronze statue of Edward Everett in Boston. All the cities a confraternity.

I cannot understand how there should go on bickerings and rivalries. I plead this morning for a higher style of brotherhood or sisterhood among the cities of this country. But while there are great differences in some respects, I have to tell you this morning that all these cities impress upon me, and ought to impress upon you, three or four very important lessons, all of them agreeing in the same thing. It does not make any difference in what part of the country we walk the streets of a great city, there is one lesson I think which ought to strike every intelligent Christian man, and that is, that the world is

A SCENE OF TOIL AND STRUGGLE.

Here and there you find a man in the street who has his arms folded and who seems to have no particular errand; but if you will stand at the corner of the street and watch the countenances of these who go by, you will see in most instances there is an intimation that they are on an errand which must be executed at the earliest moment possible; so you are jostled hither and thither by business men, up this ladder with a hod of bricks, out of this bank with a roll of bills, digging a cellar, shingling a roof, binding a book, mending a watch. Work, with its thousand eyes and thousand feet and thousand arms, goes on singing its song: "Work! work! work!" while the drums of the mill beat it, and the steam whistles fife it; the music of a groan, as you choose to call it, ever going on.

In the carpeted aisles of the forest, in the woods from which the eternal shadow is never lifted, on the shore of the sea over whose iron coast tosses the tangled foam, sprinkling the cracked cliffs with a baptism of whirlwind and tempest, is the best place to study God; but in the rushing, swarming, raving street is the best place to study man.

Going down to your place of business and coming home again, I charge you look about: see these signs of poverty, of wretchedness, of hunger, of sin, of bereavement; and as you go through the streets, and come back through the streets, gather up in the arms of your prayer all the sorrow, all the losses, all the sufferings, all the bereavements of those whom you pass, and present them in prayer before an all-sympathetic God. In the great day of eternity there will be thousands of persons with whom you in this world never exchanged one word, will rise up and call you blessed; and there will be a thousand fingers pointed at you in heaven, saying, "That is the man, that is the woman, who helped me when I was hungry, and sick, and wandering, and lost, and heart-broken. That is the man, that is the woman;" and the blessing will come down upon you as Christ shall say: "I was hungry and ye fed me, I was naked and ye clothed me, I was sick and in prison and ye visited me inasmuch as ye did it to these poor waifs of th streets, ye did it to me."

Again, in all these cities I am impressed wit the fact that all classes and conditions of societ must commingle. We sometimes culture wicked exclusiveness. Intellect despises igno ance. Refinement will have nothing to do wit boorishness. Gloves hate the sunburned hand and the high forehead despises the flat head and the trim hedgerow will have nothing to d with the wild copsewood; and the Athens hat Nazareth. This ought not so to be.

I like this democratic principle of the Gospel Jesus Christ which recognizes the fact that stand before God on one and the same platfor Do not take on any airs. Whatever positio you have gained in society, you are nothi but a man, born of the same parent, regenerat by the same spirit, cleansed in the same blood, lie down in the same dust, to get up in the san resurrection. It is high time that we all a knowledged not only the Fatherhood of Go but the brotherhood of man.

Again in all these cities I am impressed wi the fact that it is a very hard thing for a m to keep his heart right and to get to heave Infinite temptations spring upon us from pl ces of public concourse. Amid so much aff ence, how much temptation to covetousness a to be discontented with our humble lot! Am so many opportunities for over-reaching, wh temptation to extortion! Amid so much d play, what temptation to vanity! Amid many saloons of strong drink, what allurem to dissipation! In the maelstroms and h gates of the street, how many make quick a eternal shipwreck.

If a man-of-war comes back from a battle, a is towed into the navy-yard, we go down to lo at the splintered spars and count the bull holes, and look with patriotic admiration on t flag that floated in victory from the masthe But that man is more of a curiosity who h gone through thirty years of the sharpshoot of business life, and yet sails on, victor over temptations of the street. Oh! how many h gone down under the pressure, leaving not much as the patch of canvas to tell where th perished. They never had any peace. Their honesties kept tolling in their ears. If I had axe, and could split open the beams of that house, perhaps I would find in the very heart it a skeleton. In his very best wine there smack of poor man's sweat.

Oh! is it strange that when a man has voured widows' houses he is disturbed with i gestion. All the forces of nature are agai him. The floods are ready to drown him, the earthquake to swallow him, and the fire consume him, and the lightning to smite h Aye, all the armies of God are on the str and in the day when the crowns of heaven distributed some of the brightest of them be given to those men who were faithful to and faithful to the souls of others amid marts of business, proving themselves the he of the street. Mighty were their temptati mighty was their deliverance, and mighty s be their triumph.

Again, in all these cities I am impressed the fact that life is full of

PRETENSION AND SHAM.

What subterfuge, what double-dealing, two-facedness! Do all people who wish good-morning really hope for you a happy Do all the people who shake hands love other? Are all those anxious about your he who inquire concerning it? Do all want to you who ask you to call? Does all the w know half as much as it pretends to know there not many a wretched stock of goods a brilliant store window? Passing up and d these streets to your business and your work you not impressed with the fact that socie hollow, and that there are subterfuges and tensions? Oh! how many there are who s ger and strut, and how few people who are ral and walk. While fops simper, and cackle, and simpletons giggle, how few people natural and laugh! The courtesan and the ertine go down the street in beautiful apparel, ile within he heart there are volcanoes of ssion consuming their life away. I say these ngs not to create in you incredulity or misan-opy, nor do I forget there are thousands of ople a great deal better than they seem; but I not think any man so prepared for the con-t of this life until he knows this particular il. Ehud comes pretending to pay his tax to ng Eglon, and, while he stands in front of the ng, stabs him through with a dagger until the ft went in after the blade. Judas Iscariot sed Christ.

Again, in all these cities I am impressed with e fact that there is ere are hunger and suffering and want and etchedness in the country; but these evils efly congregate in our great cities. On every eet crime prowls, and drunkenness staggers, d shame winks, and pauperism thrusts out its nd asking for alms. Here want is most ualid and hunger is most lean.

A Christian man going along a street in New rk saw a poor lad, and he stopped and said: "My boy, do you know how to read and write?" e boy made no answer. The man asked the estion twice and thrice: "Can you read and ite?" and then the boy answered, with a tear ushing on the back of his hand. He said in de-nce: "No, sir; I can't read, nor write neither. od, sir, don't want me to read and write. Didn't e take away my father so long ago I never re-ember to have seen him? And haven't I had go along the streets to get something to ch home to eat for the folks? And didn't I, soon as I could carry a basket, have to go out d pick up cinders, and never have no school-g, sir? God don't want me to read, sir. I n't read nor write neither."

Oh! these poor wanderers. They have no ance. Born in degradation, as they get up om their hands and knees to walk they take eir first step on the road to despair. Let us forth, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, rescue them. Let us ministers not be afraid soiling our black clothes while we go down on at mission. While we are tying an elaborate ot in our cravat, or while we are in the study unding off some period rhetorically, we might saving a soul from death, and hiding a multi-de of sins. O Christmas laymen! go out on is work. If you are not willing to go forth urself, then give of your means; and if you e too lazy to go, and if you are too stingy to lp, then get out of the way and hide yourself the dens and caves of the earth.

In all our cities, East, West, North, South, I otice

REAT TEMPTATIONS TO COMMERCIAL FRAUD.

Here is a man who starts in business. He ys, "I'm going to be honest;" but on the me street, on the same block, in the same busi-ss are Shylocks. Those men, to get the pat-nage of any one, will break all understandings th other merchants, and will sell at ruinous st, putting their neighbors at great disadvan-ge, expecting to make up the deficit in some-ing else. If an honest principle could creep to that man's soul it would die of sheer loneli-ss! The man twists about, trying to escape e penalty of the law, and despises God while is just a little anxious about the sheriff. The nest man looks about him and says: "Well, is rivalry is awful. Perhaps I am more scrup-ous than I need be. This little bargain I am out to enter is a little doubtful; but then I all only do as the rest." And so ho started in commercial life, and as a book erchant, with a high resolve. He said: "In y store there shall be no books that I would t have my family read." Time passed on, and e day I went into his store and found some in-uitous books on the shelf, and I said to him, How is it possible that you can consent to sell ch books as these?" "Oh!" he replied, "I have got over those puritanical notions. A man cannot do business in this day unless he does it in the way other people do it." To make a long story short, he lost his hope of heaven, and in a little while he lost his morality, and then he went into a madhouse. In other words, when a man casts off God, God casts him off.

I HAD A FRIEND

One of the mightiest temptations in commercial life in all our cities to-day is in the fact that many professed Christian men are not square in their bargains. Such men are in Baptist and Methodist and Congregational churches, and our own denomination is as largely represented as any of them. Our good merchants are foremost in Christian enterprises; they are patronizers of art, philanthropic, and patriotic. God will attend to them in the day of His coronation. I am not speaking of them, but of those in commercial life who are setting a ruinous example to our young merchants. Go through all the stores and offices in our cities, and tell me in how many of those stores and offices are the principles of Christ's religion dominant. In three fourths of them? No. In half of them? No. In one tenth of them? No. Decide for yourself.

The impression is abroad somehow that charity can consecrate iniquitous gains, and that if a man give to God a portion of an unrighteous bargain then the Lord will forgive him the rest. The secretary of a benevolent society came to me and said: "Mr. So-and-So has given a large amount of money to the missionary cause," mentioning the sum. I said: "I can't believe it." He said: "It is so." Well, I went home, staggered and confounded. I never knew the man to give any thing. But after a while I found out that he had been engaged in the most infamous kind of a swindle, and then he promised to compromise the matter with the Lord, saying: "Now, here is so much for Thee, Lord. Please to let me off!"

I want to tell you that the Church of God is not a shop for receiving stolen goods, and that, if you have taken any thing from your fellows, you had better return it to the men to whom it belongs.

IN A DRUG-STORE IN PHILADELPHIA

a young man was told that he must sell blacking on the Lord's Day. He said to the head man of the firm: "I can't possibly do that. I am willing to sell medicines on the Lord's Day, for I think that is right and necessary; but I can't sell this patent blacking." He was discharged from the place. A Christian man hearing of it took him into his employ, and he went on from one success to another until he was known all over the land for his faith in God and his good works as for his worldly success. When a man has sacrificed any temporal, financial good for the sake of his spiritual interests the Lord is on his side, and one with God is a majority.

But if you have been much among the cities you have also noticed that they are full of

TEMPTATIONS OF A POLITICAL CHARACTER.

It is not so more in one city than in all the cities. Hundreds of men going down in our cities every year, through the pressure of politics. Once in a while a man will come out in a sort of missionary spirit and say: "I am going into politics now to reform them, and I am going to reform the ballot-box, and I am going to reform all the people I come in contact with." That man in the fear and love of God goes into politics with that idea, and with a resolution that he will come out uncontaminated, and as good as when he went in. But generally the case is, when a man steps into politics, many of the newspapers try to blacken his character, and to distort all his past history, and after a little while has gone by, instead of considering himself an honorable citizen, he is lost in contemplation and in admiration of the fact that he has so long been kept out of jail! If a man shall go into politics to reform politics and with the right spirit, he will come out with the right spirit, and unhurt. That was Theodore Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey. That was George Briggs, of Massachusetts. That was John McLean, of Ohio.

Then look around and see the allurements to dissipated life. Bad books, unknown to father and mother, vile as the lice of Egypt, creeping into some of the best of families of the community; and boys read them while the teacher is looking the other way, or at recess, or on the corner of the street when the groups are gathered. These books are read late at night. Satan finds them a smooth plank on which he can slide down into perdition some of your sons and daughters. Reading bad books—one never gets over it. The books may be burned, but there is not enough power in all the apothecary's preparations to wash out the stain from the soul. Fathers' hands, mothers' hands, sisters' hands will not wash it out; none but the hand of the Lord can wash it out.

And what is more perilous in regard to these temptations we may not mention them. While God in His Bible from chapter to chapter thunders his denunciations against these crimes, people expect the pulpit and the printing-press to be silent on the subject, and just in proportion as people are impure are they fastidious on the theme. They are so full of decay and death they do not want their sepulchres opened. But I shall not be hindered by them. I shall go on in the name of the Lord Almighty, before whom you and I must at last come in judgment, and I shall pursue that vile sin and thrust it with the two-edged sword of God's truth, though I find it sheltered under the chandeliers of some of your beautiful parlors. God will turn into destruction all the unclean, and no splendors of surrounding can make decent that which He has smitten. God will not excuse sin merely because it has costly array and beautiful tapestry, and palatial residence, any more than He will excuse that which crawls, a blotch of sores, through the lowest cellar.

Ever and anon through some lawsuit there flashes upon the people of our great cities what is transpiring in seemingly respectable circles. You call it "High Life," you call it "Fast Living," you call it "People's Eccentricity." And while we kick off the sidewalk the poor wretch who has not the means to garnish his iniquity, these lords and ladies, wrapped in purple and linen, go unwhipped of public justice. Ah! the most dreadful part of the whole thing is, that there are persons abroad whose whole business it is to despoil the young.

Ah! what an eternity such a man will have! As the door opens to receive him, thousands of voices will cry out: "See here what you have done;" and the wretch will wrap himself with fiercer flame and leap into deeper darkness, and the multitude he has destroyed will pursue him and hurl at him the long, bitter, relentless, everlasting curse of their own anguish. If there be one cup of eternal darkness more bitter than another, they will have to drink it to the dregs. If, in all the ocean of the lost world that comes billowing up there be one wave more fierce than another, it will dash over them.

I stood one day at Niagara Falls, and I saw what you may have seen there—six rainbows bending over that tremendous plunge. I never saw any thing like it before or since. Six beautiful rainbows arching that great cataract! And so over the rapids and angry precipices of sin, where so many have been dashed down, God's beautiful admonitions hover, a warning arching each peril—six of them, fifty of them—a thousand of them. Beware! beware! beware!

This afternoon, young men, while you have time to reflect upon these things, and before the duties of the office and the store and the shop come upon you again, look over this whole subject, and after the day has passed, and you hear in the nightfall the voices and footsteps of the city dying from your ear, and it gets so silent that you can hear distinctly your watch under your pillow going "tick, tick," then open your eyes and look out upon the darkness and see two pillars of light, one horizontal, the other perpendicular, but changing their direction until they come together, and your enraptured vision beholds it—the cross.

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

Who sailed in her—and why.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

WHEN the boat containing the sailors of the Eglantine left the sinking ship on that fatal day, Christian Hilliard and his two brave companions stood calmly together on the deck, prepared to meet death as brave men and Christians alone can do. There was no repining; they felt, and felt bitterly, that their death was cruel, and that they were the victims of a cowardly murder; yet they knew this was no fit time for indignation nor for vain regrets: there might still be a chance of life, and they consulted what they should do.

Precious as the moments were, for every minute the vessel seemed to get nearer the water's edge, they willingly agreed to Christian's suggestion that they should kneel down, then and there, and supplicate God for help in their extremity. So they knelt down, and Christian prayed to Him who is Lord of the sea as well as of the land. It was a sight for a painter to make immortal on his canvas: the wide expanse of the sea around them; the waves rolling and seething like hungry monsters thirsting for their prey; the heavens above them almost black, with only an angry lurid glare on the horizon; and on the ill-fated ship three devoted men on their knees praying, as it seemed, for their last time.

An earnest beseeching prayer was that which Christian put up, crying as men cry when pleading for life, and concluding with a petition that if the cup of death should not pass from them without they drank it, that He would be with them in the valley of death, would prepare them by His grace for the mighty change, and receive them into the mansions prepared above.

As he rose from his knees, his mind soothed and calmed by communion with God, he felt he could die peacefully if the will of God had so ordained it, relying on Him who is able to keep what we commit unto Him against that day. He was strengthened and purified by the exercise, and felt an inward conviction that his prayer had been heard.

He turned and looked around; no sign of help was near; the winds still raged, but now they seemed to his spiritual ear to bring him a message, and as he listened to their moaning he believed he heard the words he had read in the grand old Book that contains a message for men in all conditions, but for none so many as for those in trouble and with none to help; "they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and He bringeth them out of their distresses. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad because they be quiet; so He bringeth them unto their desired haven" (Psalm 107 : 28). As he listened hope revived within him and he spoke cheerfully to the brave men at his side. They too were cheered, and Captain Thorpe told them a plan he had in his mind that had occurred to him as Christian prayed.

He knew there was no hope of keeping the vessel afloat long, but he thought she might be kept up long enough for them to make a raft. He and Cairns found a spare sail to which they fastened heavy weights and lowered it over the side of the ship so that the force of the water jammed it tightly against the place where the leak had been sprung, and so checked the inflow of water into the vessel. Meanwhile, Christian under his directions was busy tearing up, with all his might, planks from the deck, and soon all were working—as men do when their lives are at stake, lashing these securely together and binding them with cross pieces into a raft, on which when the vessel went down they might float for days, and so prolong their chances of meeting with help from some passing ship.

Soon all was finished, the final instructions given, and the three watched for the moment when it should be necessary to venture on the raft.

"She will not hold up another half hour," said the captain; "we have no timeto spare;" and then one by one they slid down on to the raft and cut loose from the wretched Eglantine.

They had not drifted more than half a mile away when they saw how well timed had been their departure. The doomed ship rolled heavily to leeward and sank under the waves; had they waited but a short time they would certainly have been sucked into the whirlpool made by the wreck.

Their position now was perilous in the extreme. They had neither rudder nor oar, and only drifted with the tide. They had collected all the food and water they were able to get out of the ship, but with the utmost care it could not last them more than a week; and as they well knew they might float unseen by any ship until they died of starvation; but they placed their trust in God and calmly awaited events.

Three weary days and nights they lay there, and no signs of succor. On the morning of the fourth day Cairns complained of illness, and on Christian looking at him he was alarmed to notice the deadly pallor of his face. With all the tenderness of a woman, Christian nursed him through that day and the following night, doing all it was possible in such a position to do to relieve his suffering and to ease his pain. On the fourth morning Christian and the captain both saw that Cairns' brave life was near its close. As he lay in uneasy slumber, the daybreak resting on his face, it was easy to see the signs of approaching death written there.

Nearly all that day he slumbered fitfully, and when he was awake seemed to understand nothing of his surroundings. Sometimes he fancied he was on the Eglantine and nearing home; again he was on land and speaking to Christian about going on the Eglantine; then he was wishing his little girl good-bye and cheering her with promises of a speedy return. Towards evening he awoke, and looking up at Christian, on whose lap his head rested, while from the other end of the raft Captain Thorpe looked on in moody silence, he said faintly:

"It's getting very dark, Mr. Christian. About what time may it be, do you think, sir?"

"Nearly four, by the light, I should say. Do you feel a little stronger, Cairns?"

"Nearly four," he repeated dreamily, not heeding the question. "I wonder what my little maid is doing now. She thinks I'm dead; no, no, not yet. They haven't got home to tell. Poor little maid! I wonder what she'll say!"

"Cheer up, Cairns," said Thorpe, huskily; "you'll see the child again soon, please God."

Cairns shook his head faintly. "I shall never see old England again, captain. My time's up."

They made no reply, for they felt the words were true. Gradually the deepening darkness gathered round, and the clouds overhead grew thick and black.

"Mr. Christian," said Cairns, suddenly; "what did the little maid mean about the gate?"

"What gate?" said Christian, starting.

"In the west; she said, 'When sunset's in the west." It was all gold and rose color, with little flaky clouds."

"I know; she was quoting a hymn; 'Jerusalem the Golden.' Do you know what that means, Cairns?"

"Aye, aye, sir: the city with the golden streets. What about—the gate—sir?"

His voice was failing fast, and Christian bent low to listen.

"'When sunset's in the west, it seems thy gate of glory, thou city of the blest.' That is what Nannie meant, Cairns."

"She wanted to know if father would go far enough to see the gate. Bless her! I'm far enough for that already. It ain't a very long way off, Mr. Christian."

"Are you going through, Cairns?" asked Christian, gently.

"Aye, sir. He'll take me through. He's stood my friend—this many a long year. I've been weak and often—sinful, Mr. Christian, but —I always——"

His voice was lost in the low roll of the thunder, and a few heavy drops of rain began to fal Christian drew the coat closely up round the d ing man's throat.

"Never mind, sir; I don't feel the col Was that thunder?"

"Yes; a storm is coming on. Is there a thing you would like me to do if——"

"If you get safe—to land, you mean, s Only the little maid."

"She shall be my especial care all my life said Christian, hastily. "She shall want f nothing."

The cold wind rose higher and higher, tossi the raft to and fro. Suddenly Cairns began talk, and Christian again bent low; but he w not speaking to him.

"Father's going right out into the lig Nannie; maybe his little maid won't be long coming after. Out into the gold, Nannie; ri through the gate."

"What's that he's saying, sir?" asl Thorpe.

"Hush! he's talking to the child," answe Christian, a mist gathering before his eyes.

"Father always loved his little maid! H bring her home something pretty from—the g —no, Quebec; which is it? Where's Mr. Ch tian?"

"I'm here, Cairns."

"Sir, don't fret about it: it weren't your ing. It'll all come right in the—West. Wh that?"

A vivid lightning flash, followed by a crasl thunder, lighted up the dark scene.

"A bit of the gold, Nannie, shining to l me through. Did you hear the gate roll bac

"Is it peace, Cairns?" asked Christian, s ing to steady his voice.

"It's all light in the West, sir. Bright a beautiful light! I'm going home through storm!"

Another flash, and then a roar of thunder the rain came down in torrents.

"Cairns!" said Christian, laying his han the cold forehead; "Cairns, speak!"

But there was no answer, for the spirit passed away, 'mid the noise of the storm, the Golden West. They laid him silently d covering the still dead face, and then waite the morn. It came at last, and Thorpe spo a low, subdued tone:

"Mr. Christian, won't you say somet over the poor fellow?"

They knelt down by the motionless form bowed their heads in prayer. Then, 'mi the tumult of the waves, rose the words of the l ial service:

"I am the resurrection and the life, sait the Lord: he that believeth on Me, though he ere dead, yet shall he live."

And down into the deep water sank the form, there to await a sure and certain res tion unto eternal life.

Very gloomy were the two remaining co ions that day, for both had learned to lil the strong and cheerful man who had gone them. A brave man, faithful to his post unto death, he was worthy their admiratic their love. On their own account too the abundant reason for desponding. They had been now five days exposed to the col winds, and the waves, not knowing any m but their frail support might become a hc wreck. Their provisions were getting lo their hopes of relief apparently no nearer ment.

As the night closed in upon them, bot looked gloomily at the horizon, doubting would ever see it illumined by the sun Christian spent the next hour in prayer, had now more than ever become his sola support. He prayed for himself, for hi panion—for Maud: he shed tears at her and he prayed very earnestly that st might be given her to support her under t row he knew his untimely death would o her. Then his thoughts flew to his father, had a severe struggle with himself. But he prayed for him too, and besought God to give him; for had not his Saviour with His ng breath prayed for His murderers, "Father, give them." He raised his head at last, the ter for the struggle and the victory. He ked, as he always did now, all round the hori-, but all seemed dark and hopeless. Watch- a short time after, he thought he detected away, so far as scarcely to be perceptible, a t glimmer of light. Instantly, with a cry of , he called to the captain, whose more practis- eye would settle the doubt he had whether it ant hope.

Yes, Mr. Christian," said Thorpe confidently, at is a vessel, sure enough; but it may mean hope for us. She is far away, and in the rning may be out of sight altogether. But re is of course hope that we may cross her h and be rescued at last."

hat a night of anxiety that was! But the t became more and more distinct, and they w she was nearing them. How the two erable men longed for morning, now that they the light would bring them relief.

t last the day broke, and to their delight they within a very short distance of them an erican brig. It was clear, too, that they were n from her deck; for Captain Thorpe told ristian they were lowering a boat, which was doubt being sent for them.

n another hour they were safe on board the g, and most hospitably welcomed by her cap- n and his crew. She was on her way to Eng- d, and with grateful hearts the two men nked God for His wonderful mercy and loving- dness.

A short and pleasant voyage brought them hin sight of the familiar shores they had de- ired of ever gazing on again. As Christian d Captain Thorpe walked up and down the k on that last day of their voyage, Christian d:

'We shall seem like ghosts to our friends, shall not, captain?"

'Yes," said the captain, "but very welcome osts, I trust. At any rate your presence will ng joy into some eyes, and your father will be erjoyed to see you; he does not deserve to ve that pleasure. No more rotten ships will sent out from that office, I think, Mr. Chris- n."

"No," said Christian, "there shall be an end that. I am afraid I neglected my duty before. vill, with the help of God, stop that for the ure."

The next evening the two men, after render- heartfelt thanks to their preservers, stepped hore, looking, as Christian had said, more like osts than men. No one noticed them as they ssed quickly through the busy yard, and they ther shunned than courted observation. At e entrance of a quiet by-street they paused, d Captain Thorpe pointed to a house a few rds down.

"That's where he lived, Mr. Christian," he id, in the low, subdued tone with which men- on is always made of those who are gone.

"I suppose the child is still there?"

Hesitating for one moment, Christian Hilliard rang up the steps and knocked at the door. A ean, tidy-looking woman in a widow's cap ened it, and looked at him in some astonish- ent. It was not often they had such a visitor.

"Is this where Edward Cairns used to live?"

"Yes, sir; he used to lodge here."

"Is his little girl still here?"

"Little Nannie! Lor, sir, she's dead this six eeks or more!"

"Dead!" cried Christian, sharply; "what as the matter with her? What did she die ?"

"She'd been ailing a long time, sir," an- ered the woman, wondering what interest he uld possibly have in the child. "The doctor id she was in a decline."

"Did she have every thing that was needful? id she want for any thing?"

She shook her head.

"No, sir; that she didn't want for any thing. Cairns, he was a good father, and left me plenty of money to buy things for her. She had wine and grapes—hot-house grapes, sir; not many, you know; she never eat much, didn't Nannie."

"When did she die?"

"Let me see; six, no, seven weeks ago come Friday."

"Next Friday!" echoed Thorpe, with a sudden start. "Why, that was the very night he died, Mr. Christian."

"The very night," repeated Christian, quietly. "Perhaps he knew."

(To be concluded.)

A GYPSY RECLAIMED THROUGH HIS CHILD.

By Miss E. R. Cotton.

ONE Sunday afternoon some gypsy boys came into the mission school that I conducted. After singing the hymn, "Oh! come to Jesus now—Jesus is here," the subject that followed was "Tell me some of the kind things that Jesus Christ did when He was upon earth." The answers were bright and lively, and full of interest, as some of the other boys, once so ignorant, seemed to vie with each other in relating incidents of the Saviour's life and death.

The gypsy boys seemed charmed; the tears stood in their eyes as we concluded with prayer and another hymn. At the end I asked,

"Which of you will do me a kindness today?" All hands went up.

"Will you take this message to your fathers and mothers—'Father, Jesus loves you. Mother, Jesus loves you?'"

"Yes, miss!" cried every voice; and the little crowd dispersed, but not before the gypsy boys had asked, "When may we come again?"

They now attended every class regularly, and showed the greatest interest in learning.

Some weeks passed, when one Saturday evening, as I was sitting writing at home, a man of the name of Stephen F—— was announced. He was not an unfrequent visitor, and generally came for a Scripture lesson; but on this occasion he introduced himself thus—"You know Master B——, don't you, Miss?"

"No," I replied, "I never heard of him."

"Well, he knows you; he owns the vans in the O——, and has been a travelling man in these parts for more than thirty years. He always was a public-house man, drinking, and swearing, and that. But he is a changed man now; yes, I think he is quite a changed man; and he says it is through something you said to him."

"No, there is some mistake," I said; "but I am very glad to hear this good news."

"No! there is no mistake," said my visitor most eagerly. "He wants to see you."

"To-morrow I could see him at the room, when the boys' class is over," was my reply.

To-morrow came, and at the appointed hour, the boys having been dismissed, a man dressed in a smock-frock, with a walking-stick in his hand, stood in the doorway. On being invited to enter, he bowed very low, taking off his hat, and saying as he did so, "Thank God for this room!"

"This is very strange," I said, "you surely never were in this room before."

"No, miss, I never was here. But I wanted to come and tell you about myself to-day. A wicked sinner I am. Oh! yes, a wicked sinner all my days—fifty years!—but, thank God, I have now become a little child. He has forgiven all my sins—all the past! Shall I tell you about it?" Looking round the room, he repeated more than once, "Thank God for this room!"

He then proceeded with the following story, most of which I can give in his own words:

"A few Sundays ago, my boys was out playing on this road. When they came in for their tea, they said, 'We've been to a school, such a pretty school; and we sang hymns, and a young lady talked to us.' Then my little Freddy—he isn't but four year old, you know, Miss—he climbed up on my knee, and he said, 'Father, the lady sent you a message: she said, 'Jesus loves you, father.'

"'Sent me a message,' I said. "'Yes,' she said, 'Father, Jesus loves you.'

"I was just going to push the child off my knee. What! that name! I knowed nothin' about it, except to take it in vain. Now, to hear it like this from the child: when he put his little arm round my neck, and he began to sing—'Oh, come to Jesus now,—Jesus is here.' . . . . I went straight out of the van. I walked about. I could eat no food. I could get no rest. All my sins came straight before me. I could think of nothing else. I could get no relief. Fifty years of sin! FIFTY YEARS OF SIN! Just think of that! I couldn't go to the public-house to forget it: I went to every church and chapel in the place, but I got no comfort: every thing I heard made me worse. Yes! I was miserable.

"But last Thursday, as I was travelling to G——, to get my hawking license, my load was very heavy, Miss, very heavy—my sins, I mean. . . . I kept saying to myself, 'Twelve miles I am walking to get my earthly bread, but I have never yet tasted one crumb of the "Bread of Life" (referring to a sermon he had heard the night before on that text). Oh! where shall I go to get life for my poor soul? I'd walk furder than this, to get that life, indeed I would; but I don't know where to go'—when all of a sudden Freddy's hymn came into my mind, 'Jesus is here, Jesus is HERE.'

"Take on the vans, I cried, never mind me; and I went right off the road, away into the common—there I knelt down for a long time. Jesus here! Jesus HERE!' that was all I could think of. Jesus says, 'I am the Bread of Life,' and 'Jesus is here.' When I got up from my knees, I was shouting with joy—yets, I was praising God with all my heart! I went after the vans, and we all came back from G—— together; but I was shouting and singing all the way—couldn't help it. My missus, and all they, said, 'He's gone mad; B——, you have gone mad.' When I came home I went straight to Steve, and told him all about it. 'Steve,' I said, 'will this go off?' 'Go off, man!' he said, 'no; you have got Christ, and He will never go away from you.'"

This dear old man has ever since—a period of about four years—continued a bright and happy Christian. For some time he continued to "travel" every summer, always returning in winter to his "home," as he called the green plot in the O——, where in his van he first received the message of a Saviour's love. "It is my birth-place, you see!" he would say, "so I love it." But this year he has given up his roaming life, rented a cottage, placed his boys at the parish school, attending the church regularly himself, and bringing his grown-up sons regularly to the night-school.

Immediately after his conversion he took up msisionary work, saying, "You see I have such lots of opportunities of speaking for the Master when I am going about. I ought to be very thankful, for there's not many that have such chances as I have;" and it is quite true—he glorifies his beloved Master in every step of his pilgrim life. While selling his wares, he will speak of Christ to the buyer; while in the train, to the passengers; by the road-side, to the children, or the aimless lounger at the corner; and in the small prayer-meetings held among the working-men he will, with an overflowing heart, raise his humble testimony to the happiness "laid up" in store for "them that believe."

Mr. George C. Needham, the well-known evangelist, whose labors through the country have been so signally blessed, is now at Indianapolis, where he has been holding very successful services. Early in February he hopes to visit St. Louis.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ANNOUNCEMENT.

In commencing the publication of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times in America, it was impossible to form an accurate or even an approximate idea of the extent to which it would enjoy the favor of the Religious Public. The price was therefore fixed at four cents per single copy, that being the lowest sum deemed prudent under the circumstances.

Now, however, after the issue of only a few numbers, the journal has attained a circulation which, in connection with the numbers of commendatory letters daily received, justifies a

REDUCTION IN PRICE.

We have accordingly much pleasure in announcing that the price of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now reduced to

for single copies. Annual subscription, postage paid, $1.50. Remittances should be by check or post-office order or registered letter, and be made payable to Joseph Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, New York.

Though but a few weeks have elapsed since the issue of the first number of the American edition of The Christian Herald, we feel constrained thus early to express our grateful thanks for the numerous friendly greetings and kind expressions of appreciation that have reached us from every quarter.

While thankful to all who have aided us, we have at this time especially to acknowledge the aid and sympathy of hundreds of ministers from all parts of the country, and of every denomination.

It has been the occasion of surprise that while we have received hundreds of letters commendatory of the appearance and character of the paper in detail, there has been not one objection, either to particular articles or to the general course of the paper.

We ask a continuance of the sympathy and co-operation of our brethren of every name. We greatly desire that The Christian Herald shall reach every family in the United States, and believe that the above reduction in price ought to effect that object.

The Christian Herald is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Committee on Commerce, as previously foreshadowed, voted unanimously to report adversely on the New York Custom-House nominations. The three Democratic members of the Committee refrained from voting, but it was understood that they agreed with their Republican colleagues. Their report will at once be sent to the Senate and an effort made to remove the pledge of secrecy, and allow the charges against Messrs. Arthur and Cornell, and their answers thereto, to be made public. If the seal of secrecy should be removed, the action of the Committee will undoubtedly meet with general approval.

The Cipher Telegram Inquiry in Congress seems likely to produce considerable disquietude in both Democratic and Republican parties. The production by General Butler of a bundle of 641 of these ingenious documents has excited great curiosity as to which of the political parties they implicate. The gentlemen who deciphered those published in the Tribune will examine these, and communicate the result to the Potter Committee. General Butler advised that the matter be allowed to drop, as the inquiry might result in disclosures inconvenient to both parties; but his advice was not taken. The general feeling is, that whatever fraudulent proceedings were taken, or attempted, in the presidential election shall see the light of day. It is most devoutly hoped that the result, no matter who suffers, will lead to a purification of the moral atmosphere of politics, which those who know most about it aver is in a most immoral condition. "Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people."

In Salt Lake City the Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Methodist churches have just closed a series of union meetings during the Week of Prayer. These meetings were so pleasant and so profitable that they have decided to continue them, hoping that God will hear their prayers, and pour out His Spirit upon them. The city has never witnessed a true revival. There are many earnest Christian people in the evangelical churches, and many earnest prayers have gone up continually that God would come by His power and be honored in that city of blasphemy. The late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is in favor of right and morality, but without the aid of the Holy Spirit this system of error can never be permanently checked. The brethren ask for prayer for the twenty evangelical ministers and twenty-five Christian teachers who are, amid great toil and discouragements, earnestly laboring to fight the battle of Christian truth in that mountain land.

Messrs. Pentecost and Stebbins have begun a series of meetings at the First Congregational Church, Chicago, where they will be held in the afternoon and evening. The noon prayer-meetings in Farwell Hall are conducted by them, the procedure being in all respects similar to that of Messrs. Moody and Sankey when they were in charge of those meetings. A number of the ministers of the city take an active interest in the noon meetings.

"The Infidel attack on Property" is the designation under which Mr. Joseph Cook discoursed on Socialism recently to a large audience in New York. His remarks deserve the careful attention of every citizen of this great country, for they describe a very dangerous element which is rapidly developing in our midst. "Socialism," he said, "must be tracked back to its lair in Europe, if we wished to see its legitimate manifestations. Communism is nothing but a development of Socialism, and what that is may be seen in Paris, where the Tuileries lies in ruins; in Berlin, and St. Petersburg, whose streets echo with the shots of the assassin." Fichte, he said, was the apostle of the diabolical creed; and Fichte has said "the right to labor is property: if society cannot guard that right, then all who are injured by its weakness must make reprisals, and theft becomes a duty." The early English economists of this century strengthened this heresy by their see-saw theory that, as wages rose, profit fell, and that there was a diametrical antagonism between capital and labor. Ferdinand Lascelle fanned the flame by preaching that religion was used as opium for the people, and that there was in man no divin spark. Karl Marx during his exile in Londo resuscitated the defunct "International" Society, which gave birth to the Paris Commune.

It is, Mr. Cook argued, a serious matter fo this country, that all these incendiary elements all these germs of social plague and ruin, ar being steadily blown across the Atlantic into th United States. Already New York contains a organized Commune led by Frenchmen staine with an Archbishop's blood and Germans hol ing pernicious doctrines, ready to cry "bread lead"—only another form of the alternative o fered by the highwaymen of by-gone days, "Yo money or your life." There are leagues whos members dub themselves "knights of labor; societies of Socialists, political liberals, and lab reformers. And these are all explosive el ments.

Those men who plot against the stability
American society should be warned in time le they deceive themselves. Our land is held fr sea to sea by hardy agriculturists, who, if t need arose, would drive back Socialism at t cannon's mouth. American history has ne yet seen a day so red with blood as that d will be on which spoliation is attempted. Pr erty has already caught the alarm, and has co menced to arm. The United States will be t battle-field for the world, on which the strug between Communism and society will be fou out, and New York will be the battle-field of United States. On all sides are heard the r blings of the coming storm. May God save from the maelstrom!

Inebriate Asylums have been stigmatized failures in some influential quarters lately.
connection with the question, an extract fro letter by Dr. Willard Parker, one of the hig authorities in this country on the subject, be of interest. Dr. Parker says: "I have hesitation in avowing my belief, based on most accurate statistics obtainable, that full per cent of the inebriates scientifically tre are permanently restored."

An important religious awakening is ported from the City of Mexico. It origin in the Presbyterian mission, and all the Pr tant churches in the city are stated to be listed in earnest work. A number of promi citizens are among the converts.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond, the evangelist, has been engaged for a series of meetings to be held jointly with the pastors of the Walton M. E. Church, Southside, Pittsburg, Pa., Rev. W. K. Brown, and of the First Presbyterian Church, Rev. C. Ely. The congregations of these two churches are harmonious in the union. Meetings have been in progress in both churches, and much spiritual interest manifested in the Walton Church for several weeks. This evangelist will be supported in his labors by various pastors of other churches, and Chancellor Wood, of the Pittsburg University, besides earnest laymen, as Wm. Thaw and Florence Kramer, together with a number of earnest women ever ready to work for Christ's cause. Prayer and faith is ripe with expectation that a great revival will result.

Captain Crossby's prayer answered. Some years since, during one voyage, his ship was for days enveloped in mist, and he became rather anxious respecting her safety. He went down to his cabin and prayed. The thought suddenly entered his mind, if he had with confidence committed his soul to God he might certainly commit his ship to Him: and so, accordingly, he gave all into the hands of God, and felt at perfect peace; but still he prayed that if He would be pleased to give a cloudless sky at twelve o'clock he should like to take an observation to ascertain their real position, and whether they were on the right course.

He came on deck at eleven o'clock, with the quadrant under his coat. As it was thick and drizzling the men looked at him with amazement. He went down to his cabin, prayed, and came up. There seemed still to be no hope. Again he went down and prayed, and again he appeared on deck with his quadrant in his hand. It was now ten minutes to twelve o'clock, and still there was no sign of a change; but he stood on the deck, waiting upon the Lord, when, suddenly, the mist seemed to be folded up and rolled away as by an omnipotent and invisible hand; the sun shone clearly from the blue vault of heaven, and there stood the man of prayer with the quadrant in his hand; but so awe-struck did he feel, and so "dreadful" was that place, that he could scarcely take advantage of the answer to his prayer. He however succeeded, although with trembling hands, and found to his comfort that all was well. There were no doubt natural reasons to account for the sudden dispersion of the mist, but the true theory of prayer is that in answering it God works by natural means.

Bible Society Statistics.—During the past year the American and British and Foreign Bible Societies have issued 3,850,376 copies of the Scriptures, an increase of nearly 300,000 over the previous year. The two societies also sent out the Bible, in whole or in part, in 64 new translations. In Russia 740,023 volumes, in 60 different languages, were distributed; and in Turkey 64,508 volumes, in nine languages. Following are the figures of the distribution carried on by the two societies in Roman Catholic countries and heathen lands: India, 343,616 volumes; China, 159,103; Japan, 61,398; Italy, 52,828; France, 133,160; Servia and Roumania, 128,170; Spain, 68,393; Austria, 274,362; Germany, 468,108; South America, 35,348; Mexico, about 30,000.

The value of a tract is shown in the following incident: A lady belonging to the Society of Friends was travelling by railroad, when a man in a state of intoxication came into the carriage and threw himself on the seat immediately in front of her. After some pitiable displays of folly he dropped asleep. Her heart was drawn out in pity for the wretched man, and lifting up a silent prayer to Him who giveth the increase, she gently slipped a Gospel tract into the pocket of his overcoat. Years after she paid a visit to a friend at a village in a Western State, and, as was her custom, she took a handful of tracts and went out one evening to walk, with a design of scattering the truth as she had opportunity. In the outskirts of the village she saw a man seated at the door of a small farmhouse reading a tract. She went up to him and asked if he would accept one of those she was distributing. "Gladly," he said, "for under God I owe my salvation to a tract which told me of the grace of God in Christ. This is the tract," he added, presenting that which he had been reading. "It is very precious to me, and once in a while I take it out of my desk and read it over again." As she took the tract out of his hand she read her own name upon it. "Where did you get this tract?" she asked. "I might well be ashamed to tell you," he said; "and yet I am willing to take shame to myself that my Lord may be glorified." And then he related to her what his manner of life had been, and how when returning from a visit, he had become so intoxicated as to be oblivious of all that passed on the way. His wife, in attending to his soiled clothes, had found that tract in the pocket of his overcoat. How it came there he could not tell. But, mortified and filled with remorse at the thought of his folly, he had read the tract, which made known to him the faithful saying, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. "And," said he, "He has saved me, the chief of them."

The Cobb murder trial, in which Mrs. K. M. Cobb was tried for the murder of her husband, has ended in a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree. Such an issue is incomprehensible, except on the supposition that the jurymen were influenced by the fact of the accused being a woman, and being desirous of saving her from the death penalty. The object of making different degrees in the crime was to discriminate between homicides committed in a moment of ungovernable frenzy and under circumstances of extreme provocation, from those done deliberately with premeditation, either from motives of gain or some other mean incentive. It is difficult to see, if the jury believed Mrs. Cobb to be guilty of the crime with which she was charged, what extenuating circumstances they discerned justifying a verdict of murder in the second degree. If the slow and deliberate poisoning to death of a husband by his wife constitutes murder in the second degree, it may well be asked what are the peculiarities of the horrible crime which can constitute a murder in the first degree.

Erena, the Russian Maid-servant.—While the Rev. Richard Knill resided in Russia he engaged a Russian young woman named Erena as servant; and the following is the account he gives of her: "When she first came to us she could read a little, and my wife encouraged her to persevere, and for this purpose a Psalter and Testament were given to her. She seemed to take great delight in reading, and we were gratified to perceive how she improved every spare moment for this sacred employ. The first time she evinced any emotion was one evening when she had been reading the history of Cornelius. She came to my wife with an anxious and inquiring look, and said, 'Please to explain this to me: Cornelius fasted, prayed to God always, and gave much alms to the people; yet he was commanded to send for Peter to obtain information what he ought to do. Pray how is this? What could he do more? Is any more required of us than to pray, give alms, and keep the fast?'

"Mrs. Knill answered, 'If something more had not been necessary, the angel would not have commanded it; therefore proceed with the narrative, and mark what Peter said.' She proceeded; and when she read these words, 'To Him gave all the prophets witness, that through His name, whosoever believeth on Him shall receive remission of sins,' the young woman was overcome. She burst into a flood of tears, and soon exclaimed, 'Now I see it! it is by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ that we obtain forgiveness of sins.' From that day to this her delight was in the Scriptures. Her diligence in business, and her zeal for the salvation of her relatives, made her very highly esteemed by us; and, as far as we can judge, she adorned the doctrine of God her Saviour in all things. She proved a great treasure in the family."

THE COVENANT PLEADED.

A Sermon delivered by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Have respect unto the covenant."—PSALM 74:20.

Successful Prayer Based on the Science of Pleading—The Strongest Plea is the Covenant of Grace—I. What is Meant by Pleading the Covenant—1. That it may be Fulfilled—2. That its Promises may be Fulfilled—3. That Nothing may Intervene to Thwart Them—4. That the Means may be Arranged and made Subservient—II. Whence the Plea derives its Force—1. From the Veracity of God—2. From His Sacred Jealousy—3. From the Venerable Character of the Covenant—4. From the Solemn Indorsement it Bears—5. From its Seal of Blood—6. From its Record of Invariable Fulfilment—7. From the Believer's God-given Confidence—III. When the Covenant may be Pleaded—1. When Oppressed with a Sense of Sin—2. When Struggling to Overcome Inward Corruption—3. When Assailed by Temptation—4. Practical Inferences—The Covenant should be Held in Grateful Respect—In Believing Respect—In Joyful Respect—In Jealous Respect—In Practical Respect.

HE will succeed in prayer who understands the science of pleading with God. "Put me in remembrance: let us plead together," is a divine command. "Come now, let us reason together" is a sacred invitation. "Bring forth your strong reasons, saith the Lord," is a condescending direction as to the way of becoming victorious in supplication. Pleading is wrestling: arguments are the grips, the feints, the throes, the struggles with which we hold and vanquish the covenant angel. The humble statement of our wants is not without its value, but to be able to give reasons and arguments why God should hear us is to offer potent, prevalent prayer.

Among all the arguments that can be used in pleading with God, perhaps there is none stronger than this—"Have respect unto the covenant." Like Goliath's sword, we may say of it, "There is none like it." If we have God's word for a thing we may well pray, "Do as thou hast said, for as a good man only needs to be reminded of his own word in order to be brought to keep it, even so is it with our faithful God; He only needs that for these things we put Him in remembrance to do them for us." If He has given us more than His word, namely, His covenant, His solemn compact, we may then with the greatest composure of spirit cry to Him, "Have respect unto the covenant," and then we may both hope and quietly wait for his salvation.

I need not tell you, for you are, I trust, well-grounded in that matter, that the covenant here spoken of is the covenant of grace. There is a covenant which we could not plead in prayer, the covenant of works, a covenant which destroys us, for we have broken it. Our first father sinned, and the covenant was broken; we have continued in his perverseness, and that covenant condemns us. By the covenant of works can none of us be justified, for we continue still to break our portion of it, and to bring upon ourselves wrath to the uttermost.

The Lord hath made a new covenant with the second Adam, our federal head, Jesus Christ our Lord,—a covenant without conditions, except such conditions as Christ has already fulfilled, a covenant, ordered in all things and sure, which now consists of promises only, which run after this fashion—"I will be to them a God, and they shall be to Me a people;" "A new heart also will I give them, and a right spirit will I put within them;" "From all their transgressions will I cleanse them;"—a covenant, I say, which had once conditions in it, all of which our Lord Jesus fulfilled when He finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness; and now the covenant is all of promise, and consists of infallible and eternal shalls and wills, which shall abide the same forever.

We shall talk of the text thus, What is meant by the plea before us—"Have respect unto the covenant?" Then we will think a little of whence it derives its force; thirdly, we will consider how and when we may plead it; and we will close by noticing what are the practical inferences from it.

I. Let us begin by this—

WHAT IS MEANT BY THE PLEA

"Have respect unto the covenant?"

1. It means this, does it not? "Fulfil thy cove- nant. O God! let it not be a dead letter. Thou hast said this and that; now do as Thou hast said. Thou hast been pleased by solemn sanction of oath and blood to make this covenant with Thy people. Now be pleased to keep it. Hast Thou said, and wilt Thou not do it? We are persuaded of Thy faithfulness, let our eyes behold Thy covenant engagements fulfilled.

2. It means again, "Fulfil all the promises of Thy covenant," for indeed all the promises are now in the covenant. They are all yea and amen in Christ Jesus, to the glory of God by us; and I may say without being unscriptural that the covenant contains within its sacred charter every gracious word that has come from the Most High, either by the mouth of prophets or apostles, or by the lips of Jesus Christ Himself. The meaning in this case would be: "Lord, keep Thy promises concerning Thy people. We are in want: now, O Lord! fulfil Thy promise that we shall not want any good thing.

"Here is another of Thy promises: 'When Thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee.' We are in rivers of trouble. Be with us now. Redeem thy promises to Thy servants. Let them not stand on the book as letters that mock us, but prove that Thou didst mean what Thou didst write and say, and let us see that Thou hast power and will to make every jot and tittle good of all Thou hast spoken. For hast Thou not said, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my world shall not pass away'? Oh then have respect unto the promises of Thy covenant."

3. In the connection of our text there is no doubt that the suppliant meant, "O Lord! prevent any thing from turning aside Thy promises." The church was then in a very terrible state. The temple was burnt, and the assemblage broken up, the worship of God had ceased, and idolatrous emblems stood even in the holy place where once the glory of God shone forth. The plea is, "Do not suffer the power of the enemy to be so great as to frustrate thy purposes, or to make Thy promises void." So may we pray, "O Lord! do not suffer me to endure such temptation that I shall fall. Do not suffer such affliction to come upon me that I shall be destroyed; for hast Thou not promised that no temptation shall happen to us but such as we are able to bear, and that with the temptation there shall be a way of escape? Now have respect unto Thy covenant, and so order Thy providence that nothing shall happen to us contrary to that divine agreement."

4. And it means also, "So order every thing around us that the covenant may be fulfilled. Is Thy church low? Raise up again in her midst men who preach the Gospel with power, who shall be the means of her uplifting. Creator of men, Master of human hearts, Thou who canst circumcise human lips to speak Thy word with power, do this, and let Thy covenant with Thy church that Thou wilt never leave her be fulfilled. The kings of the earth are in Thy hand. All events are controlled by Thee. Thou orderest all things, from the minute to the immense. Nothing, however small, is too small for Thy purpose: nothing, however great, is too great for Thy rule. Manage every thing so that in the end each promise of Thy covenant shall be fulfilled to all Thy chosen people."

That, I think, is the meaning of the plea, "Have respect unto the covenant." Keep it and see it kept. Fulfil the promise, and prevent Thy foes from doing evil to Thy children. Precious plea, assuredly.

II. And now let us see

WHENCE THE PLEA DERIVES ITS FORCE.

"Have respect unto the covenant."

1. It derives its force, first, from the veracity of God. If it be a covenant of man's making we expect a man to keep it; and a man who does not keep his covenant is not esteemed amongst his fellows. If a man has given his word, that word is his bond. If a thing be solemnly signed and sealed it becomes even more binding, and he that would run back from a covenant would be thought to have forfeited his character among men. God forbid that we should ever think the Most High could be false to His word. It is not possible. He can do all things except this—He cannot lie; it is not possible that He should ever be untrue. He cannot even change: the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. He will not alter the thing that hath gone out of His lips.

When then we come before God in prayer for a covenant mercy we have His truthfulness to support us. "O God! Thou must do this. Thou art a sovereign: Thou canst do as Thou wilt, but Thou hast bound Thyself by bonds that hold Thy majesty; Thou hast said it, and it is not possible that Thou shouldst go back from Thine own word." How strong our faith ought to be when we have God's truth to lean upon. What dishonor we do to our God by our weak faith; for it is virtually a suspicion of the fidelity of our covenant God.

2. Next, to support us in using this plea we have God's sacred jealousy for His honor. He has told us himself that He is a jealous God; His name is jealousy; He has great respect unto His honor among the sons of men. Hence this was Moses' plea—"What will the enemy say? And what wilt Thou do unto Thy great name?" Now, if God's covenant could be trifled with, and if it could be proved that He had not kept the promise that He made to His creatures, it would not only be a dreadful thing for us, but it would brings grievous dishonor upon His name; and that shall never be. God is too pure and holy, and He is withal too honorable ever to run back from the word that He has given to His servants.

If I feel that my feet have almost gone, I may still be assured that He will not suffer me wholly to perish, else were His honor stained, for He hath said, "They shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of My hand." He might give me up to mine enemies so far as my deserts are concerned, for I deserve to be destroyed by them—but then His honor is engaged to save the meanest of His people, and He has said, "I give unto them eternal life." He will not, therefore, for His honor's sake, suffer me to be the prey of the adversary; but will preserve me, even me, unto the day of His appearing. Here is good foothold for faith.

3. The next reflection that should greatly strengthen us is the venerable character of the covenant. This covenant was no transaction of yesterday: or ever the earth was, this covenant was made. We may not speak of first or last with God, but speaking after the manner of men the covenant of grace is God's first thought. Though we usually put the covenant of works first in order of time as revealed, yet in very deed the covenant of grace is the older of the two. God's people were not chosen yesterday, but before the foundations of the world; and the Lamb slain to ratify that covenant, though slain eighteen hundred years ago, was in the divine purpose slain from before the foundations of the world. It is an ancient covenant: there is nothing so ancient. It is to God a covenant which He holds in high esteem.

It is not one of His light thoughts, not one of those thoughts which lead Him to create the morning dew that melts ere the day has run its course, or to make the clouds that light up the setting sun with glory but which soon have lost their radiance; but it is one of His great thoughts, yea, it is His eternal thought, the thought out of His own inmost soul—this covenant of grace. And because it is so ancient, and to God a matter so important, when we come to Him with this plea in our mouths we must not think of being staggered by unbelief, but may open our mouths wide, for he will assuredly fill them. Here is Thy covenant, O God! which of Thy own spontaneous sovereign will Thou didst ordain of old, a covenant in which Thy very heart is laid bare, and Thy love which is Thyself is manifested. O God! have respect unto it, and do as Thou hast said, and fulfil Thy promise to Thy people.

4. Nor is this all. It is but the beginning. In one sermon I should not have time to show you all the reasons that give force to the plea; but here is one. The covenant has upon it a solemn indorsement. There was the stamp of God's own word—that is enough. The very word that created the universe is the word that spake the covenant. But as if that were not sufficient, seeing we are unbelieving, God has added to it His oath, and because He could swear by no greater, He has sworn by Himself. It were blasphemy to dream that the Eternal could be perjured, and He has set His oath to His covenant, in order that, by two immutable things wherein it is impossible for God to lie, he might give to the heirs of grace strong consolation.

5. But more, that venerable covenant thus confirmed by oath was sealed with blood. Jesus died to ratify it. His heart's blood bedewed that Magna Charta of the grace of God to His people. It is a covenant now which God the just must keep. Jesus has fulfilled our side of it—has executed to the letter all the demands of God upon man. Our Surety and our Substitute has at once kept the law and suffered all that was due by His people on account of their breach of it; and now shall not the Lord be true and the everlasting Father be faithful to His own Son? How can He refuse to His Son the joy which He set before Him and the reward which He promised Him? "He shall see His seed: He shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied."

My soul, the faithfulness of God to His covenant is not so much a matter between Thee and God as between Christ and God, for now it so stands—Christ as their representative puts in His claim before the throne of infinite justice for the salvation of every soul for whom He shed His blood, and He must have what He has purchased. Oh what confidence is here! The rights of the Son, blended with the love and the veracity of the Father, makes the covenant to be ordered in all things and sure.

6. Moreover, remember, and I will not detain you much longer with this, that up till now nothing in the covenant has ever failed. The Lord has been tried by ten thousand times ten thousand of His people, and they have been in trying emergencies and serious difficulties; but it has never been reported in the gates of Zion that the promise has become naught, neither have any said that the covenant is null and void. Ask ye those before you who passed through deeper waters than yourselves. Ask the martyrs who gave their lives up for thei Master, "Was He with them to the end?" Th placid smiles upon their countenances while en during the most painful death were evident testi monies that God is true. Their joyous songs the clapping of their hands amidst the fire, an their exultation even on the rack, or when rot ting in some loathsome dungeon—all these hav proved how faithful the Lord has been.

And have you not heard with your own ear the testimony of God's dying people? The were in conditions in which they could not hav been sustained by mere imagination, nor buoye up by frenzy, and yet they have been as joyful a if their dying day had been their wedding da Death is too solemn a matter for a man to pla a masquerade there. But what did your wi say in death? or your mother now with God? c what your child, who had learnt the Saviour love? Can you not recall their testimonies eve now? I think I hear some of them, and among the things of earth that are like to the joys heaven, I think this is one of the foremost,—t joy of departed saints when they already hear t voices of angels hovering near, and turn roun and tell us in broken language of the joys that a bursting in upon them—their sight blinded the excess of brightness, and their hearts ra ished with the bliss that floods them. Oh it h been sweet to see the saints depart!

I mention these things now, not merely to r fresh your memories, but to establish your faith God. He has been true so many times and fa never, and shall we now experience any difficul in resting on His covenant? No, by all the many years in which the faithfulness of God h been put to the test, and has never failed, us be confident that He will still regard us, a let us pray boldly, "Have respect unto the covenant." For, mark you, as it has been in the beginning, it is now, and ever shall be, world without end. It shall be to the last saint as it was with the first. The testimony of the last soldier of the host shall be, "Not one good thing hath failed of all that the Lord God hath promised."

7. Only one more reflection here. Our God has taught many of us to trust in His name. We were long in learning the lesson, and nothing but Omnipotence could have made us willing to walk by faith, and not by sight; but with much patience the Lord has brought us at last to have no reliance but on Himself, and now we are depending on His faithfulness and His truth. Is that thy case, brother? What then? Thinkest thou that God has given thee this faith to mock thee? Believest thou that He has taught thee to trust in His name, and thus far has brought thee to put thee to shame? Has His Holy Spirit given thee confidence in a lie; and has He brought in thee faith in a fiction? God forbid! Our God is no demon who would delight in the misery which a groundless confidence would be sure to bring to us. If thou hast faith, He gave it to thee, and He that gave it to thee knows His own gift, and will honor it.

He was never false yet, even to the feeblest faith, and if thy faith is great, thou shalt find him greater than thy faith, even when thy faith is at its greatest; therefore be of good cheer. The fact that thou believest should encourage thee to say, "Now, O Lord, I have come to rest upon Thee, canst Thou fail me? I, a poor worm, know no confidence but Thy dear name, wilt Thou forsake me? I have no refuge but Thy wounds, O Jesus! no hope but in Thy atoning sacrifice, no light but in Thy light: canst Thou cast me off? It is not possible that the Lord should cast off one who thus trusts Him. Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Can any of us forget our children when they fondly trust us in the days of their weakness? No, the Lord is no monster: He is tender and full of compassion, faithful and true; and Jesus is a friend which sticketh closer than a brother. The very fact that he has given us faith in His covenant should help us to plead, "Have respect unto the covenant."

III. Having thus shown you, dear friends, the meaning of the plea, and whence it derives its force, we will now pause a minute and observe

WHEN THAT COVENANT MAY BE PLEADED.

1. First, it may be pleaded under a sense of sin—when the soul feels its guiltiness. Let me read to you the words of our apostle, in the eighth chapter of the Hebrews, where He is speaking of this covenant at the tenth verse. "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people. And they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."

Now, dear hearer, suppose that thou art under a sense of sin; something has revived in thee a recollection of past guilt, or it may be that Thou hast sadly stumbled this very day, and Satan whispers, "Thou wilt surely be destroyed, for thou hast sinned." Now go to the great Father, and open this page, putting thy finger on that twelfth verse, and say, "Lord, Thou hast in infinite, boundless, inconceivable mercy entered into covenant with me, a poor sinner, seeing I believe in the name of Jesus, and now I beseech Thee have respect unto Thy covenant. Thou hast said, I will be merciful to their unrighteousness: O God be merciful to mine. Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more: Lord, remember no more my sins; forget forever my iniquity." That is the way to use the covenant: when under a sense of sin, run to that clause which meets your case.

2. But suppose, beloved brother or sister, you are laboring to overcome inward corruption, with intense desire that holiness should be wrought in you. Then read the covenant again as you find it in the thirty-first chapter of Jeremiah at the thirty-third verse. It is the same covenant, only we are reading another version of it. "This shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; after those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts." Now, can you not plead that and say, "Lord, Thy commandments upon stone are holy, but I forget them, and break them; but, O my God! write them on the fleshly tablets of my heart. Come now and make me holy; transform me; write Thy will upon my very soul, that I may live it out, and from the warm impulses of my heart serve Thee as Thou wouldst be served. Have respect unto Thy covenant and sanctify Thy servant."

3. Or suppose you desire to be upheld under strong temptation, lest you should go back and return to your old ways. Take the covenant as you find it in Jeremiah at the thirty-second chapter at the fortieth verse. Note these verses and learn them by heart, for they may be a great help to you some of these days. Read the fortieth verse of the thirty-second chapter of Jeremiah. "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from Me." Now go and say, "O Lord, I am almost gone, and they tell me I shall finally fall, but, O my Lord and Master, there stands Thy word. Put Thy fear in my heart and fulfil Thy promise, that I shall not depart from Thee." This is the sure road to final perseverance.

Thus I might take you through all the various needs of God's people, and show that in seeking to have them supplied they may fitly cry, "Have respect unto the covenant." For instance, suppose you were in great distress of mind and needed comfort, you could go to Him with that covenant promise, "As a mother comforteth her children, even so will I comfort thee,—out of Zion will I comfort thee." Go to Him with that and say, "Lord, comfort Thy servant." Or if there should happen to be a trouble upon us, not for yourselves, but for the church; how sweet it is to go to the Lord and say, "Thy covenant runs thus—'the gates of hell shall not prevail against her.' O Lord! it seems as though they would prevail. Interpose thy strength and save Thy church."

If it ever should happen that you are looking for the conversion of the ungodly, and desiring to see sinners saved, and the world seems so dark, look at our text again—the whole verse: "Have respect unto the covenant, for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty," to which you may add, "but Thou hast said that Thy glory shall cover the earth, and that all flesh shall see the salvation of God. Lord, have respect unto Thy covenant. Help our missionaries, speed Thy Gospel, bid the mighty angel fly through the midst of heaven to preach the everlasting Gospel to every creature. Why, it is a grand missionary prayer. "Have respect unto the covenant." Beloved, it is a two-edged sword, to be used in all conditions of strife, and it is a holy balm of Gilead, that will heal in all conditions of suffering.

IV. And so I close with this last question, WHAT ARE THE

PRACTICAL INFERENCES

FROM ALL THIS? "Have respect unto the covenant. Why, that if we ask God to have respect unto it we ought to have respect unto it ourselves, and in this way.

Have a grateful respect for it. Bless the Lord that He ever condescended to enter into covenant with you. What could He see in you even to give you a promise, much more to make a covenant with you? Blessed be His dear name, this is the sweet theme of our hymns on earth, and shall be the subject of our songs in heaven.

Next, have a believing respect for it. If it is God's covenant do not dishonor it. It stands sure. Why do you stagger at it through unbelief?

"His every work of grace is strong
As that which built the skies;
The voice that rolls the stars along Speaks all the promises."

Next, have a joyful respect for it. Wake your harps, and join in praise with David: "Although my house be not so with God, yet hath He made with me an everlasting covenant." Here is enough to make a heaven in our hearts while yet we are below—the Lord hath entered into a covenant of grace and peace with us, and He will bless us forever,

Then have a jealous respect for it. Never suffer the covenant of works to be mixed with it. Hate that preaching—I say not less than that—hate that preaching which does not discriminate between the covenant of works and the covenant of grace, for it is deadly preaching and damning preaching. You must always have a straight, clear line here between what is of man and what is of God, for cursed is he that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm; and if you have begun with the Spirit under this covenant do not think of being made perfect in the flesh under another covenant. Be ye holy under the precepts of the heavenly Father; but be ye not legal under the taskmaster's lash. Return not to the bondage of the law, for ye are not under law, but under grace.

Lastly, have a practical respect for it. Let all see that the covenant of grace, while it is your reliance, is also your delight. Be ready to speak of it to others. Be ready to show that the effect of its grace upon you is one that is worthy of God, since it has a purifying effect upon your life. He that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as He is pure. Have respect unto the covenant by walking as such people should who can say that God is to them a God; and they are to Him a people. The covenant says, "From all their idols will I cleanse them." Don't love idols then. The covenant says, "I will sprinkle pure water upon them, and they shall be clean." Be ye clean then, ye covenanted ones, and may the Lord preserve you and make His covenant to be your boast on earth and your song forever in heaven. Oh that the Lord may bring us into the bonds of His coveuant, and give us a simple faith in His dear Son, for that is the mark of the covenanted ones. Amen and Amen.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS PUBLISHED IN THIS JOURNAL ARE INSERTED WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND ARE REVISED BY HIMSELF.

The Value of Dr. Barnardo's Homes in London is shown in the instance of an orphan. His father, a sailor, was drowned at sea about nine years ago, and his mother, a charwoman, died of consumption nearly six years ago. At this time he was about ten years old, and was left in the charge of an aunt. This woman treated the poor lad so heartlessly as to drive him out upon the streets, much to the indignation of the neighbors. For some years he led a miserable life, picking up a few halfpence for running errands, carrying parcels, washing pewter-pots for a publican, etc. At night he slept out as a rule, but sometimes in a lodging-house. He applied to get into a Boys' Home, but was refused admission, as he had no relative or friend to vouch for his story, or any subscriber's letter to recommend his case. At length he got to London on board a schooner, but seems to have fared very poorly for a year. He earned a very scanty livelihood by pushing costermongers' barrows, and carrying boxes of fish at Billingsgate Market, sometimes sleeping out, or walking about the streets all night, for three or four nights consecutively. At last he was accidentally directed to Dr. Barnardo's Homes, where, after battling with so many hardships, he will be safely sheltered, till he is better fitted to launch out into the ocean of life.

WAS LOST AND IS FOUND, OR THE STORY OF FELICIA CUFFE.

An Original Story by Mr. Henry Martin.

An Eventful Walk—Felicia's Disappearance—A Mother's Agony—Maternal Suspicions—The Visit to the Convents—The Watcher in the Chapel—Aunt Barbara's Treachery—Tempted by Flowers—The Capture Effected—The Living Dead—A Convent Prison.

WHEN the ninth summer of her childhood was come, and her widowed mother had in some measure recovered from the shock and stupor of her terrible bereavement, little Felicia Cuffe was sent for a walk upon a bright sunny day under the care of the same nurse who had watched her in infancy. Though a devotee and ignorant, the Irish domestic was of a kind and affectionate nature.

Their walk, one often taken by them before, was along a road which leads to one of the entrances of that finest of all public demesnes, the Phœnix Park. What really occurred upon the way can now never be completely ascertained. Perhaps the nurse's tale was substantially true. She stated that upon a wide and grass-bordered part of the road she had permitted her darlin' young mistress to lag behind to gather wild flowers, while she herself sauntered on, speaking to a companion (the companion, it afterwards transpired, was a sweetheart). She did not thus leave her charge alone, she averred, for more than a minute (but under the circumstances could she be supposed to exactly measure time?). "Not for more than a single little minute," she reiterated, "had she her eyes off her," when, upon looking round, "Miss Felicia" was gone; and she ran back with all haste to see what had become of her, but searching on every hand nowhere could either she or her companion find trace of the child—"only far on, upon a by-road that turned off the main one, a vehicle was seen driving on fast in the distance."

When Peggy, out of breath and distracted, and with face ghastly pale and almost convulsed, brought this tidings to her mistress, the distress it wrought may be imagined. Mrs. Cuffe swooned! her bloodless face was as of one that was dead, and consciousness only returned to be lost again in unconsciousness.

Her Protestant relatives hastened to her side upon the report of the calamity, and aided her all in their power, and, for the matter of that, her Roman Catholic connections did likewise; but it was observed that the late Mr. Cuffe's sisters only made their appearance among the last to come, and that the attentions which they offered seemed more forced than natural.

It was suspected that they had some, if not the principal, part in the affair, and that the child had been ensconced in some nunnery. An order from the Lord Chancellor would have enforced a search, but where was it to be made? Several so-called religious houses both were in and around the city. To which of them the child had been borne was all a secret, and no legal authority would be granted to explore in turn each nunnery of the entire district. It would be a severe and impracticable measure, and would outrage the religious sentiments of the Roman Catholic population of the city. Besides, it was not altogether certain that the child had been secreted in a nunnery, and the law is rightfully cautious of acting upon mere suspicion. All which, under the circumstances, could be done was to make every possible inquiry.

With frenzied entreaty the widowed and now bereft mother besought her connections and neighbors to assist her in the search for her child. Unable herself for bodily exertion, as paralyzed with grief she urged the sympathizing group around her, some of them in tears, to hasten to the locality where the kidnapping act had been perpetrated, and to gather up any hint that might furnish a clue to the place where the treasure of her heart, now, she doubted not, as wretched as herself, was kept hidden. "Offer any reward; all I am worth," she cried; "I will give it freely to him that brings me back my child. Oh you that can pity the greatest trial of a human heart, in God's name help me!"

Turning to her Roman Catholic relatives, she wildly exclaimed, "Take me, bind me, torture me, if ye will, but if you know the place of her concealment get me back my child. No agony of rack or screw can equal that which her loss wrings from me." These, and such expressions as would be spoken by a mother in such a bereavement, were, with infinite pathos, uttered. In that home "there was a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning; Rachel weeping for her child, and would not be comforted, because she was not."

Every attempt at discovery of little Felicia Cuffe's hiding-place proved, however, fruitless. All the scraps of information which could be gathered of her involuntary flight it was found would lead to nothing; few persons were on the road at the time of her disappearance. Indeed it was not a much-frequented thoroughfare, at least at the hour of the child's walk. Those who had been near declared they had observed nothing. It was as though the little girl had been spirited away, and had vanished from the earth, as a golden gleam of sunlight from the darkness of heaven.

Mr. Cuffe's connections could bring themselves, though reluctantly, to make this circumstance a ground for abandoning all further effort; but it was not thus with that lady herself. Her mother's heart could not settle down to the dull rest of hopelessness; her child lived, she doubted not, and so long as that was the case restoration was possible. She resolved to visit personally every convent in and around the city, and to demand from each Lady Superior, until she demanded from the right one, her beloved child. It was a weary and unpromising pilgrimage. Women who themselves had never known the rapture of a mother could be little expected to enter into the feelings of a mother bereaved.

She was, for the most part, coldly received. In many cases her inquiry was declared to be an insult, as involving the indictment of a cheat "Your child, madam, is not here," it would be replied; "it has not that good-fortune. But if she had you would do it eternal wrong to take it from the shelter of our roof. You talk of a mother's right and fostering care, but what mother has greater right than holy Mother Church, and whose maternal care can equal hers? Let it be that what you suppose is the truth—that in some such religious house as this she has the happiness to live—should you wish to take her from salvation and blast her eternal hopes? Widow and doubly mourning though you be, it is my duty to tell you, madam, that you are without the Church, and until you enter it should not have the training of your child."

All this and the like would be said with a cold and bitter calmness and a dreadful self-possession, that gave the desolate seeker to feel that, as a rule, the so-called sister before her, as tamed by a severe regimen, worn by fast and vigil, narrowed by a superstitious and fanatical belief, and with a bosom eliminated of all natural affection, had a heart chill as frost and insensible as steel.

When direct inquiry led to nothing the mother's hungering heart cast itself upon another method—she would frequent each convent chapel of the city and environs open to the public. Peradventure she might, through screen or veil, catch a glimpse some day of her lost one, or the lost one of her; recognition on either side would be sure to issue in audible announcement—demonstration could not be suppressed. The very mothers in the chapel would come to her help, she believed, and, in spite of probable opposition from the celibate sisterhood present would aid her to the rescue of her child.

Month after month was this project put in execution. Every Sabbath, and often on the weekday, two human eyes, gleaming from a sad, pale, and earnest face, might be seen fixed, long and steadily, upon some one of those large, close, and mysterious-looking lattices which are to be seen in the side wall, toward the altar end, of every convent chapel. The owner of those ardent and mournful, yet beautiful, eyes seemed to take no part in the religious service. The human figure, draped in black, never changed its posture, bowed not when others bowed, nor kneeled when others prayed. Even the tinkle of the service bell at the so-called elevation of the host did not for a moment distract the piercing gaze of the mother in quest of her child. What to her was Latin chant or deep-toned recitation, wreathing smoke of incense or dramatic ritual? What she wanted, and with an unspeakable yearning, was her child, and, right or wrong, she could not put aside the thought that those who postured on the altar steps as ministers of God were in a dark and cruel conspiracy to rob her of her child.

We shall not pursue to any greater length this portion of our narrative. Let it be sufficient to say that as with the former expedient so with this, it failed in its object. To recover the vanished one appeared impossible. And yet Felicia Cuffe was in a nunnery and near the city, as transpired in years long after, and from the lips of Felicia Cuffe herself. She could relate that upon the day the warm-hearted Irish nurse Peggy missed her, she had hastened up a portion of the by-road already mentioned in the confused recital of that distracted domestic. The alluring object was a cluster of bright flowers glowing on one of its banks. The finest of these gathered and in her possession, she was led to a further advance up the road to carry out the same delightful act of innocent plunder upon a yet more tempting bunch of fairy blossoms.

While thus engaged, lost in childish glee, her hand was seized and her name was called, and upon looking up she saw it was her aunt, who, as she could afterwards remember, appeared excited, flurried. Her aunt had never been a favorite of hers, but yet she could not exactly say why. Aunt Barbara had ever spoken kindly to her, had made her many presents, and had sought to win her regard. But still her child's quick perception ever seemed to see something sinister behind all these friendly demonstrations. They did not seem to spring from a true love to herself, but from some indirect motive. It was an effort, she felt, to gain her love, not for the joy of having it, but that i might put into the hands of the aunt a power t be used over the actions of the niece.

"Come, dear," said Aunt Barbara, "come with me to where there are far more beautifu flowers than these."

"But, auntie," said the child, "nurse is on the high-road out of sight. Let me go and tell her or she will be awfully frightened."

"Oh! never mind, my love," was the answer "It's all right; I have made it so with Peggy' (which, as we have seen, was not true). "Jus take my hand, dear, and see what a lovely plac I will take you to. Those blossoms in you hand. Throw them away. They're not wort keeping compared with the beauties I'll put yo in possession of."

"I hesitated to follow this advice," said Felici Cuffe afterwards, when giving her account; "bu my auntie smiled at me, and cajoled me, an gently yet eagerly pressed me. So that at last consented to walk by her side, my hand in hers We moved farther away from the main highwa and up the pretty, high-banked country road o which my aunt had found me. Alas! in so d ing I was passing away from liberty and a m ther's loving voice and tender care, to be immured for years among those whose natural affe tion was dead in a veritable prison.

"When we had advanced some distance a v hicle drove up, into which I was lifted, and the my aunt took her seat beside me. There seeme something a little strange about all this, and n mind glanced towards home and my mothe but, kept in chat by my aunt, I made neither r mark upon it nor resistance. A bunch of bea tiful flowers lay upon the carriage seat, opposi to us. Taking it up, my aunt said, 'Look, Felici at these. There is something worth looking hey grew, my love, in the garden which I am aking you to see.' And then, perceiving how uch I admired them, she added, 'You may ave them. I'll give you them in payment for hose which, at my bidding, you threw away.'

"This was all the compensation I ever got om my aunt, not only for my bunch of wild-owers (who cares to speak of them ?), but for my eedom—my natural rights as a thinking and oral being, and for all the love and happiness om which she so cruelly tore me that fatal our. O ye wild flowers! how often in after ays did I think of you and of your God-given eedom! How often have I craved, and with a asping heart, to share your outside sunshine, athed in the free air of the open heaven.

"The convent my aunt had me taken to was the environs of the city. We passed through a uge wooden gate, which had to be unbarred to s, and up a fine avenue of trees, and then the arriage stopped at a large, white-colored build-g. The outer door was closed, but upon nocking it was speedily opened. I had never all my previous childhood seen a nun. The rst my eyes ever beheld was she who, as servitor r the day, now stood before us in the spacious nd bare-looking hall into which we had entered; p to that same time, also, I had never seen a orpse. My poor dead father had been brought ome in his screwed-down coffin. The costume f the grave is certainly, as a piece of rueful art, ell devised for ghastliness; it gives an added rimness to the ugliness of death; but grave-loths are the type and pattern of a nun's attire. hink, then, how my child's heart recoiled and hrunk from the pale face, half covered with hite bands, and the sable-robed apparition hich flitted before us.

"After a short time my aunt was shown into n inner room. I wished to follow her, but she old me to remain for a little with the lady in the all, and that she would soon come back to me. alse words," relates Miss Cuffe; "I have never een her from that hour, for before my resurrec-ion from this living tomb she had passed away to nother world.

"Lonely and nervous in the presence of my pectral companion, my eyes often turned to the oor within which my aunt had vanished, and y ears keenly listened for any sound of her re-urn; but I looked and waited in vain. I began o weep, and my friend in white and black, it ust be said, kindly sought to comfort me. She aid, 'Don't cry, dear; your aunt, no doubt, will oon be here; something has detained her lon-er than she expected.' It may be she knew her ords were false. Who can tell? But let us in harity believe she spoke in ignorance.

"My aunt did not appear, but another nun ame from the door which my eyes were intent pon. She was more aged than the servitor un, which nun, it was plain, stood in great awe f her. Gravely speaking to me, the senior nun ade me follow her, for she was about to take ne, she said, to the beautiful place my aunt had romised me. I obeyed, and, after walking down ome passages, we entered the nunnery garden. n it there were some long beds of flowers, and rom end to end four paths stretched without a urve, on each of which a nun paced up and own, with sober step and upright mien, and ands crossed upon the bosom. Not one of them urned head to right or left, not even to see ho had entered the garden. Silent as the grave, nd emotionless—ghosts, not of the night, but f the day—they moved up and down before us. describe it now, for I took it all in at the time; t struck my young mind as altogether unearth-y, strange, and unassuring. I observed, too, hat a great high wall had been built quite round he garden, shutting out of view the branch-tops f even the highest trees; the only thing to be een from the inclosure was a patch of the over-anging sky. How often did I look up at it in fter days, to see the snowy cloudlets passing y, and oh! how I envied their freedom as they assed from vision beyond the convent garden all into the azure sea of the outer heaven!"

THE KEEPING OF THE SABBATH.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 9th.—Neh. 13:10-22. Golden Text, Ex. 20:8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day consists of the fourth commandment, "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." In our day, when men are questioning the authenticity of God's Word, and seeking to overthrow the authority of His commandments, it behoves believers to look well to the Scripture ground for the observance of them, and at the same time to search out the effects of disobedience to them.

With regard to the Sabbath, it was in the first instance a gift to man before the institution of the law. Gen. 2: 3, "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it: because that in it He had rested from all His work which God created and made." And again (Ex. 16: 28, 29), when some of the people of Israel went out to gather manna on the Sabbath-day (before the giving of the law), the Lord said unto Moses, "How long refuse ye to keep My commandments and My laws? See for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore He giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days; abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh-day."

In the second place it was to be to the children of Israel a remembrance of creation and of redemption. Of creation (Ex. 20: 11): "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." Of redemption (Deut. 5: 15): "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence, through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath-day."

In the third place, the Sabbath was to be the special sign between God and His people Israel. The last charge God gave to Moses when he was with Him on Mount Sinai was concerning the Sabbath. "Speak thou also into the children of Israel, saying, Verily my sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations.

In Ezek. 20: 12, 20, the Lord speaks of two reasons why the Sabbath is to be a sign, "that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them," and "that ye may know that I am the Lord your God."

In Isaiah 58: 13, 14, a special blessing is promised to the observance of the Sabbath. "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on My holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

With all this solemn teaching before them, of which the priests and Levites at any rate were aware, the children of Israel in Nehemiah's time were guilty of breaking the Sabbath. Nehemiah saw "in Judah some treading wine-presses on the Sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and loading asses; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day." Only about a century and a half previous to this time, the prophet Jeremiah was sent of God to "stand in the gate of the children of the people, whereby the kings of Judah come in, and by the which they go out, and in all the gates of Jerusalem," to say, "Thus saith the Lord: Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath-day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the Sabbath-day, neither "do ye any work, but hallow ye the Sabbath-day, as I commanded your fathers" (Jer. 17: 20–22). It is probable that the old men of Nehemiah's time had heard their fathers tell how the old, sorrowful, weeping man of God went forth with his warning words from one gate to another, and may be they followed him as children, and so the constant repetition was stamped upon the memory.

How came it, then, that they were doing now in Jerusalem the very identical thing which they had been commanded not to do? No doubt these Jews said, "Others do it, and we only do it in self-defence. Others will get their wheat and their wine into the market before ours, and so secure a better price, and we cannot afford thus to lose." This is how men speak nowadays. But how few say, "I cannot afford to lose my soul eternally!" Men live as though they had no souls. The practical unbelief in an eternity is awful. This bad example told upon the heathen; the latitude with which the Jews regarded the Sabbath emboldened the fishermen of Tyre and other heathen costermongers to come and drive their traffic in Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day.

But Nehemiah had God's cause at heart, and he was not to be daunted by the spectre of common custom or the necessities of commerce. He knew that when God had given a command there was a way of obeying that command, and he went straight to the nobles, as being the responsible party, and said to them, "What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the Sabbath-day?"

This man of God took the matter in hand energetically, and he carried it through. He knew that His people had been chastised for this very sin. So on the eve of the Sabbath he commanded that the city gates should be shut until the Sabbath was over. The costermongers came as usual, but they found the city gates closed against them. Then, with an obstinate persistency, they lodged without the gates. And Nehemiah went and addressed them, threatening to lay hands on them if they continued to do so. He was known well to be a man of his word, and so they discontinued the practice. And he "commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to sanctify the Sabbath-day." Would that there were Nehemiahs amongst us now!

But there are some who profess and call themselves Christians, and who argue that the Sabbath is not binding upon us because we are not under the law, because the day with us is changed from the seventh to the first day of the week, and because Jesus so often healed on the Sabbath-day, and His disciples plucked the ears of corn and did eat on the Sabbath-day. To which the Lord answers in His Word, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets; I amnot come to destroy, but to fulfil. . . . Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven, etc." (Matt. 5: 17–19). The change of day is not commanded in Scripture, but in Acts 20: 7, 1 Cor. 16: 2, Rev. 1: 10, it would seem as though the first day of the week were already in use as the day of rest, instead of the seventh, and the great matter is surely giving the seventh part of our time as holy and as set apart for God.

One other objection is often made, that with God's children, who seek His glory, every day is a Sabbath, and every work is holy. This is one of a class of objections which faithfully discovers the shallowness of the conceptions of God's truth in so many. We are not little units, for whom the world was created, and for whom God exists. We were created for Him, and not He for us, and the Sabbath, given before the law, is a sign between us and God which the unconverted can read and understand. Every infidel knows that a Christian believes so fully in the God that he denies, that he thinks it worth his while to spend a seventh part of his time in the service of that God, and this is a sign that he cannot forget during an endless eternity. Let us not also forget that there remaineth, when Jesus comes, a "keeping of a Sabbath for the people of God" (Heb. 4: 9, margin).

THE PROPHECY IN THE GREAT PYRAMID ABOUT THE COMING YEARS 1881-2.

By Thomas W. Greenwell, M.R.S.L., Author of "The Death and Resurrection of the Witnesses, a Future Event," etc.

Views about the Great Pyramid—Is its Architecture on a Divine Plan?—Professor Piazzi Smyth's great Book upon it—The Length of its Galleries in "Inches" represents the Length of the Jewish, Christian, and Millennial Dispensations in "Years"—The First Gallery—The Second or Grand Gallery—The Revolutionary Era of 1815 A.D.—Was Melchisedec the Architect?

It seems to be the intention of Providence, in these latter days when men are beginning to doubt, and even deny, the interference of Divine guidance in human affairs, that fresh light shall gradually dawn on mankind; that, in fact, to those that have, more shall be given. We take this view of the extraordinary discoveries that have recently been made in connection with the Great Pyramid of Upper Egypt, by which some light is thrown on unfulfilled prophecy. As every one knows, there has been much discussion about this subject for the last two centuries. The generally accepted idea has been that it (the Pyramid) was built as a mausoleum. The abortive attempt, however, of Al Mamoum (A.D. 820) to find the remains or treasures of Cheops has lately done much to dissipate this delusion.

Sir Isaac Newton, whose subtle and capacious intellect seems to have penetrated many diverse subjects, may be said to have originated the modern theory of the Great Pyramid being a sort of storehouse or repository of science and scientific truths; but within the last twenty or thirty years Pyramidal research may be said to have taken an entirely new departure, through the discoveries of the late Mr. John Taylor and

PROFESSOR PIAZZI SMYTH

(Astronomer Royal of Scotland). The last-mentioned writer has enunciated his views with singular clearness in his well-known work, "Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid." Briefly they may be summed up as follows:

(1) The Great Pyramid is a mathematical structure and in the land-centre of the earth. It is of supernatural origin.

(2) It is a standard of creation and astronomical science;

(3) Of weights and measures;

(4) Of time and heat;

(5) Of squaring the circle.

To the foregoing may also be added the remark that certain proportions of the Pyramid represent the world's mean distance from the sun. The pyramid inch is 1.001 of that at present in use, and the profane measures of heathen Egypt are in no way represented in the structure.

The strangest part, however, yet remains to be told. Some twenty years ago it was given to Mr. John Taylor, author of "The Great Pyramid: Why was it Built and Wha Built It?" to suggest that the interior architecture was carried out on a Divine plan, and intended to be confirmatory of certain Biblical and prophetic periods. The world, of course, laughed at this, as indeed it always does laugh when any thing out of the common appears.

But it yet remains to be seen whether that publisher of Gower Street, London, was, or was not, the pioneer of one of the most startling truths of modern times. Fortunately he had an able coadjutor in Professor Smyth; and it is to that gentleman's exertions in 1864–5 in Egypt that we owe the three volumes entitled "Life and Work at the Great Pyramid."

Since that time the theory has been taken up by writers all over the world. Amongst them we may mention Professor Hamilton L. Smith, in America; the Rev. F. Glover, India; S. Russell, Canada; Archdeacon Stock, New Zealand; J. Pitcher, South Australia; the Abbé Moigno, France; Dr. Grant, Cairo; and besides many others in England, Vincent Day, Mackenzie, Taylor Goodin, Alexander Mackay, Osburn, Casey, Tracy, Habershon, etc.

THIS "SACRED THEORY," as it is now called, is also advocated by some periodicals.

The view is briefly this: that the Pyramid was Divinely constructed; perhaps by Melchisedec as its architect. The length of the interior galleries of the Pyramid measure out continuously in inches the length of the Jewish, Christian, and millennial dispensations in years. Thus, the first gallery, which is 2528 inches long, represents the 2528 years from the dispersion of mankind at the Tower of Babel, to the first advent of Christ. Then the second, or Grand Gallery, 1881–2 inches long, represents the 1882 years of the Christian dispensation; then the third gallery symbolizes the subsequent millennial dispensation.

THE FIRST GALLERY REPRESENTING THE JEWISH DISPENSATION..

According to the Pyramid astronomy the Flood took place B.C. 2790. The first entrance-passage or gallery commences with the symbolic date answering to B.C. 2528—the era of the first dispersion of mankind. On the scale of an inch to a year, the passage gradually descends to a point B.C. 2170, which was the date of the erection of the Pyramid. This is singularly marked by two fine lines ruled on the stone on the east and west sides of the gallery. The descent then continues 628 inches (representing, of course 628 years), to what is called "the granite portcullis" (B.C. 1542); this is a junction or new departure in the Pyramid's symbolism.

This "granite portcullis" is very important; it indicates the separation of a "peculiar people" to the service of God. The Hebrew passage, or gallery, consequently commences B.C. 1542 (the exodus from Egypt under Moses), and, of course, extends to the birth of Christ. The various phases of Hebrew history are, it appears, in some manner symbolized on the stone facings of this passage, and its height is only 53 inches. This is apparently in contradistinction to the commanding proportions of the following Grand Gallery, or Christian dispensation (28 feet high).

THE SECOND OR GRAND GALLERY, SYMBOLIZING THE CHRISTIAN DISPENSATION.

We are further told by Professor Smyth that thirty-three inches (signifying years) after the commencement of this Grand Gallery there is a "well," or dark aperture, leading to a subterranean chamber in the rock, and ultimately into a profound depth called the "bottomless pit." The stone which once covered the aperture has long since been torn away.

This seems intended to be a startling symbolism of the death and descent into the grave of our Lord, prefigured by the descent into the Hades Chamber.

As we are merely giving an outline of the theory, we pass on to notice that the length of the Grand Gallery is 1881 Pyramid inches and a fraction; this has been ascertained by the most careful measurements. There is nothing particular in its whole course until a remarkable change takes place at the point of 1815 inches from its commencement, corresponding, of course, with the year A.D. 1815. It will, perhaps, be best to give this in the Professor's own words:

"' We had traced up that gallery's remarkable course from where it begins at its north end with the date of the birth of the Saviour of mankind; and, excepting only certain limited features in that neighborhood already alluded to, had met with no break or interruption to our continued ascent along the enormous length of its sloping floor, until, at the rate of a Pyramid inch to a year, we had arrived at the point indicating A.D. 1813–14.

"At that point, however, begins the grand step of the end, a step crossing all the breadth of the gallery, and rising from its floor almost exactly a British yard in vertical height, yet forming from there a continued level right on to the very end.

"That end, nevertheless, we had not actually reached, even by going on to the 1875 date point, though it comes very soon afterwards, viz., in A.D. 1881–2; for there, in all its solidity and overhanging imminence, is the southern wall or practical termination of the Grand Gallery. Whatever, therefore, that feature symbolizes, terminates there too—viz., in A.D. 1881–2."

THE ERA OF 1815 A.D. PREFIGURED.

This elevation in the floor-level, corresponding to the date 1815, is a very remarkable feature. It is admitted that the events occurring from A.D. 1800 to 1815, ushered in, as it were, a new era in the history of mankind.

At that era France, the leading nation of Europe, shook off religion for a season, and endeavored to introduce new creeds, new times, laws, seasons, and even measures (the metric system). It is now supposed that the future Antichrist will do these things on a more extended scale in the future.

After the end of the Grand Gallery, at the distance of 1881 inches, we find that a very low passage, forty-four inches in height and fifty-three in length, commences. This evidently indicates the period of antichristian troubles. Then comes the Antechamber, or Millennium, where the previous limestone floor is changed for more enduring granite.

The concluding portion of the pyramid's interior is taken up with another passage (the Final Judgment), and the mystic King's Chamber (or Heavenly State). In this King's Chamber there is the "coffer," the proportions of which exactly answer to the Ark of the Covenant.

If, therefore, all this symbolism be correctly interpreted, there exists in Upper Egypt at the present day a complete record in stone of the world's history, from shortly after the Flood to the end of all time.

It is further to be added that at the end of the Grand Gallery, denoting the Christian Dispensation, there is what is termed a way of escape—a sort of trap-door, twenty-eight feet high, and only to be approached by a select body. Strange to say, the Book of Revelation constantly points to the "elect" who will escape the antichristian troubles by being translated to meet Christ in the air at His second coming.

It will be as well, however, to return to some of the facts and arguments on which these extraordinary hypotheses are based. The question must naturally occur to many minds, What data are there for all this? What proofs that the Great Pyramid is supernatural in its origin, or that its building was Divinely inspired?

The theory advanced is that no less a personage than Melchisedec was the architect—the mysterious Being of whom it is said in Hebrews that he being "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually."

It is thought that Philition or Philitis, the shepherd-prince mentioned in Herodotus' ancient history as having presided over the building of the Great Pyramid, is one and the sam with the High Priest so graphically described i Hebrews.

After a careful examination of the various theories propounded, we would much rather suppose that Melchisedec was an angelic being, o other supernatural personage, than, as has latel been advanced, the actual "Son of God." Bu even this latter hypothesis would seem to be no impossible, as there are several "appearances" in the Old Testament which would imply tha the Second Person of the Trinity has actuall taken human or semi-human form for especia reasons—as, for example, the fourth figure i Nebuchadnezzar's furnace.

The following passage from the prophet Isaiah is, together with many similar statements frequently quoted as containing a prophecy o the Great Pyramid. It runs: "In that day shal there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of th land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign an for a witness unto the Lord of Hosts in the lan of Egypt" (Isaiah 19: 19, 20).

Altogether the subject may be said to be extremely important, and it is evident that muc remains to be cleared up before even the religious world can receive the SACRED PYRAMIDA THEORY. In the meantime, in the words of ou author, "The Biblical evidence touching thi mighty and most unique monument of sacred an prophetic purport is deserving of more intimate and peculiar study than we have yet bestowed upon it.”

The thoughtful mind cannot but see in the portentous aspect of the modern world—in the way every thing shifts and changes—in the wars and rumors of wars—in the strifes of Church and State—in the incipient outbreaks of revolution—n the famines, earthquakes, and pestilences—hat convulsions of an unparalleled nature are not only approaching, but actually in our midst. Professor Smyth, in his work, is of opinion that t the close of the dispensation some other instiution of an entirely opposite character, having ntered into Christianity, and, as it were, eaten out it very vitals, will suddenly overpower it. He further leads us to expect a military antihrist or antichrist of “Cæsarism.” We, on he contrary, have always looked for a spiritualstic one; but this question on which great diergence of opinion exists, will be treated of in a uture article on unfulfilled prophecy.

SPIRITUALISM AND THE FUTURE ANTICHRIST.

Rationalism and Socialism are ripening the world for a climax. Recent writers assure us hat in Protestant Germany “reason proudly its in the chair of faith, and the natural powers of man are endued with the attributes of Divinty.” What does this point to but the elevaion or pantheising of our race? “Ye are as ods,” says Satan, as preparatory to placing one man above every god. What more common han to hear such expressions as the following: “The divine ideality of man;” “the exploded dea of God;” “the coming new development;” “the higher theology of the future;” “Chrisianity is doomed,” etc.?

It is perhaps no wonder that, taking advanage of such sentiments as these, a well-known writer in the Westminster Review should reently have asserted that Spiritualism, or the “new revelation,” is the only religion of the fuure. This brings us to the consideration of this ast sign of the times, as it affects the question of unfulfilled prophecy. The apostle distinctly mentions that at the close of the age, or dispenation, there shall be a revival of what in all ages of the world has been termed necromancy, or dealing with familiar spirits. “Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times ome shall depart from the faith, giving heed to educing spirits, and doctrines of devils or eachings of demons” (1 Tim. 4).

The fact cannot be too distinctly insisted upon, that Spiritualism contains in itself the germ of the Antichristian system. The slow and tealthy strides by which it has crept into the world have been the ruin of thousands; and if o-day the “new delusion” counts its votaries by tens of thousands, we have only ourselves to blame. Rightly or wrongly, the majority of people have hitherto mocked and underrated its laims to attention.

The future Antichrist will arise on the world as he apostle of progress—the prophet of humanity; he will appeal to all classes and to all religions. Moreover, it is probable that a distracted and chaotic world will be found ripe and ready to bow down to his claims and worship him as the Saviour of mankind. For this supreme moment Satan has apparently been long preparing. The Spiritualists boldly assert that, in the “coming egeneration,” the present state of society, and all existing creeds and religions, will be swept away by a personage whom they call the “Comorter,” who is shortly to appear in order to heal he wounds of our afflicted race.

In proportion as men are able and willing to bear it, the thin edge of the wedge of this new evelation is being introduced into various places and circles. A Spiritualistic medium, speaking under supernatural, or rather infranatural, influences said:

“There will be great and astounding manifestations within the next few years; innumerable sorrows are in reserve for earth's inhabitants; but beyond is the prospect of a brighter day, when among the blessings not the least shall be communion with the spirits of the pure and the good. Some years will pass before a great change; but another century will not commence before this great change will be wrought. I may not reveal more now. The spirit manifestations will astound the world. Day after day spirits continually watch the progress of the new light—then will the great day of jubilee come, and all the sorrows of the past be done away. These things presage the coming of a glorious future—the coming of a ‘new Messiah.’” (!)

The reason why the religious world has been so slow to recognize the fearful nature and origin of modern Spiritualism is because the phenomena have been kept, for the most part, confined to certain strict and select circles. In this may be seen the manifest finger of the Evil One. Under cover of silly and profane phenomena (table.turnings, rappings, levitations, and the like), this last—and most accursed—delusion has been foisted on mankind. It has silently but surely crept into the remotest villages and hamlets; and there is not a considerable town in this country where the “cause,” as it is termed, has not its adherents, its circles, and its seance-chambers. Not long ago it was heard of in the Azores.

The most distant colonies have their organs, their lyceums, and their travelling Spiritualistic missionaries. In fact, there is a constant machinery at work advocating the novel doctrines which the world as yet little dreams of.

We affirm that this hideous mockery of a new religion is gathering together its forces, unknown to the multitude, for a world-wide upheaval—a gigantic confederacy—the excesses and blasphemies of which what tongue can tell, what pen describe, but which will be an accompaniment of the latter-day Great Tribulation foretold in Daniel 12: 1, and Matthew 24: 21, to be associated with the Second Advent of Christ and the millennium.

“Commercial Dishonesty results from the growth of our large cities,” said Mr. Joseph Cook in his lecture in New York on January 23d. “Society in those great centres usually loses the master's whip of small cords, and the loss is felt in political, commercial, and in religious matters. In politics the influence of the cities has prevented the passing of an effective bankruptcy law. In commerce, cities easily forget how to hiss vice. It is true the laws of trade are understood in the cities better than in the country side; but so many dishonest things are done in the great towns that the tone of public discussion is relaxed. When honesty is unexacting, there comes into existence what I call a flabby commercial liberalism, the most costly mood that commerce can put on. We are suspicious of each other in proportion to the number of frauds and dishonest bankruptcies: distrust makes necessary a higher rate of interest. ‘The costliest unclean beast,’ Thorold Rogers says, ‘that society can keep in its menagerie is an unpunished commercial rogue.’

In religious circles this extravagance of ours in ecclesiastical palaces, this feeling of ours that social prestige is more to be regarded in certain churches than right standing before Almighty God, this using our houses of God as social preserves to keep families in good position, and this tendency of cities to give to the church itself commercial measuring tapes, that the churches that set the fashions for the land are more often in cities than elsewhere—all these are circumstances pointing to peril in time to come, and already big with disaster!” It is a sad fact that a lax code of morality is every day becoming more prevalent, and in pointing out the evil and suggesting its possible source Mr. Cook does a valuable service to the community.

THE HEROIC LIGHT-HOUSE KEEPER.

THE New York World relates an incident in the life of a humble man worthy of being written in the annals of fame alongside of deeds which have shed a lustre on names familiar in our mouths as household words.

In August, 1865, the family of Edward Pope, keeper of the Ellis Bay light-house, was stricken down by typhoid fever, and, to add to his misfortunes, the revolving apparatus of his light broke. The government steamer had gone, and Pope had no means of communicating with the Marine Department at Quebec or elsewhere.

The light revolved, or flashed, as the technical phrase, is every minute and a half; and if it flashed no more it would probably be mistaken by passing vessels in that region of fog for the stationary light at the west point of the island, and thus lead to dire loss of life. Pope found that, with a little exertion, he could turn it and make it flash, and at once determined to fill the place of the automatic gear. Accordingly, this humble hero sat in the turret, with his watch by his side, turning the light regularly at the allotted time every night, from 7 P.M. until 7 A.M., from the middle of August until the 1st of December, and from the 1st of April until the end of June, when the government steamer came to his relief with a new apparatus.

All through the first season Pope's daughter and grandchildren were ill unto death, with nobody save him to nurse them. He waited on them tenderly during the day, but as night fell on the iron-bound coast he hastened to his vigil in the turret, doing his duty to the Canadian Government and to humanity with unflinching devotion. In the second season his daughter, who had lived through the fever, took turns with him in the light-room.

This man may have saved a thousand lives. He died in 1872, and his deed has never until this day been chronicled. Well would it be for the world if the followers of Jesus were as anxious to save souls from perdition as this man was to prevent the loss of life. He knew that to keep his light burning properly was the only safeguard for the storm-tossed mariner, and he spared no pains to do that. “Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven” (Matt. 5: 16).

“RING THE BELLS OF HEAVEN.”

A WAITER at a large tavern in Bishopsgate Street, London, was won to a saving knowledge of “the truth,” and became a member of a Christian church. Soon afterwards his wife also gave her heart to the Saviour, and together they united in prayers for the salvation of their children. At a recent meeting he relates how other souls were blessed through his influence. He said: “Some time ago I bought a concertina, and learnt to play ‘Ring the Bells of Heaven.’ One Sunday night we all struck up with our music and singing, when, to our sorrow, our lodger and his wife came down stairs, and said, ‘If you're going to kick up that row with the concertina, we shall give you a week's notice on Monday, as we won't stand it.’ This was a disappointment to us, and so we tried to make things smooth, and shut our doors and windows to keep in the sound. But the lodger's wife opened the door to listen, the singing brought conviction to her heart, and to ease her conscience she felt obliged to go to a place of worship. Her husband quarrelled with her for doing this, and went to a public-house to spite her. However, they did not leave the house, as they had threatened to do. Many importunate prayers were offered for them; and now they are both communicants and tract-distributors.”

On the Lord's Day the concertina is still played, and instead of being interrupted, all in the house unite together in singing,— > “Ring the bells of heaven! there is joy to-day,

> For a soul returning from the wild.”

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Political Crisis in France ended on Monday, January 20th, with a vote of confidence in the Ministry, as modified by President MacMahon. The majority was a decisive one; no less than one hundred and two in a house of three hundred and forty-four. The event has produced a feeling of profound satisfaction throughout the country, and it is believed it indicates a period of quiet and moderate measures. The deputies were inundated with despatches from their constituents, previous to the division, urging them to support the Government. It is thought that M. Gambetta is averse to taking office, as he refrained from taking an active part in the attack on the Government. Had he done so and the Ministry have been defeated, he would have been expected to form a Ministry himself; an attempt for which he considers the state of the country is not yet ripe. M. Gambetta, by his patience, prudence, and moderation, is winning for himself a name and a reputation that will give him great power in France.

Don Espartero, Duke of Vittoria, whose death was lately announced in the cable dispatches, was one of the remarkable men of this age. For the past forty years he has played an important part in the affairs of Spain, and is inseparably identified with her history. His career is remarkable. He was of obscure origin, being the youngest of the nine children of a cartwright of La Mancha, in which province he was born. At the time of Napoleon's invasion of Spain in 1808 he was studying for the priesthood; that event caused him to change his avocation, and he became a soldier. He rose rapidly through all the various grades of promotion to be a marshal of Spain, and in 1841 he became the Regent of the Kingdom. In 1854, in conjunction with Marshal O'Donnell, he was intrusted by Queen Isabella with the formation of a ministry. The two military chieftains could not agree, and Espartero was dismissed in 1856. After a retirement of about ten years he was again brought into prominence by the proposal of his name as King of Spain, and although he was not chosen he continued to exercise more or less influence upon the politics of Spain, and at his death was reckoned one of the foremost men of the nation.

The Battle for Universal Dominion.—Under this heading a contemporary asks: "To whom is Afghanistan ultimately to belong? If it is, as some of our savants tell us, not worth our keeping, Russia will certainly absorb it sooner or later. All the larger states are either absorbing their smaller neighbors or being absorbed themselves; while no small states are being created. Meanwhile, as the Standard points out, the disease of Social Democracy is eating out the very life of most of the large European states. Nihilism is at work in Russia, Socialism in Germany; Austria, if not a sick man, is certainly not a healthy one; France may be said to be always ready for revolution at a week's notice; Italy, the spoilt child of Europe, is fretting for a toy she cannot get, and the symptoms of the throes of 1848 are everywhere discernible."

A Chinawoman's Dying Vision.—A missionary of the London Missionary Society in China in a recent report relates the following circumstance: "One of our female converts, who had been long sick, was evidently drawing near to death. About the middle of the night she awoke her husband by saying, 'Rise and pray. the Lord is calling me.' He rose and prayed, then asked her if she saw any thing, as her eyes were looking in a fixed manner in one direction. 'Yes,' she said; 'oh, how beautiful! don't you see it? I never saw any thing so lovely! They are all clad in white! Look at them!' She continued in this state during the day, full of happiness, and asked her little boy to repeat the hymn, 'All hail the power of Jesu's Name,' being particularly pleased with the lines, 'Lift up the royal diadem, and crown Him Lord of All.' She died in the evening. The manner of her death, as may be supposed, made a happy impression on the members of the Mission Church.

Mrs. M. Baxter in Germany.—One of the places at which she recently had large meetings was Heilbronn, a large manufacturing town, and one of its leading pastors is a nephew of the well-known missionary, Rev. J. Weitbrecht. The healing of the sick by the prayer of faith (James 5) has been long practised in this neighborhood. At the town of Canstatt, the late Baroness Sochendorf's Institution for healing by faith is still carried on.

At Stuttgart Mrs. Baxter's meetings were held in a large hall, which had been used by the Social Democrats; most who came were the working classes. It is hoped many found peace in Christ, and among others a father, mother, son, and daughter. Meetings were also held in December in Goeppingen, a manufacturing town of 11,000. The journey thence to Wilhelmsdorf, a Moravian settlement, was in intense cold—by train, and three hours of a freezing carriage drive. Here the welcome was most hearty, and meetings were held twice every day.

Wilhelmsdorf is a cruciform village, with the church in the middle of the square from which four streets branch off. There is a large girls' school in it, and it is believed that almost every pupil has previously or recently found peace. The whole school came out to say farewell at her departure on December 18th. The journey was then made over the Lakes of Constance and Zurich to Gurzelen, in Switzerland, and meetings were held there, and also at Thun and Berne, in January. Prayer is asked for a blessing on these meetings.

A woman died from destitution in the streets of London on Christmas Day—Matilda Cole, an industrious woman, the widow of an artisan. The deceased could not earn a remunerative livelihood, and losing her home bit by bit gradually sank under extreme penury and exposure, and at last was without a settled home. Mrs. Wyld, needle-woman, of 23 Princes Row, Newport Market, her mother, sometimes relieved her as well as her straitened circumstances would allow; but deceased would not accept relief from the Union. On Christmas morning she was found lying in the snow, dead.

Another Theatrical Tea Meeting was given at Exeter Hall, London, by Mr. Forbes, of Holloway, on Jan. 2d. The attendance was larger than on any previous occasion, about 150 ballet-girls and theatrical employés being present. The hour of meeting was four o'clock, and that of departure seven. During tea several hymns were sung. After tea the assembly was addressed by the Rev. Denham Smith, who related an interesting circumstance in connection with the life of the Princess Alice, whose loss they so much deplored. The Princess not very long ago called on a friend, and was informed of a social gathering of persons beneath their own rank. She expressed a desire to see them, and went. On their way the lady asked her if she felt she would like to speak to them. The Princess said, "Yes; but don't tell them who I am." The lady during the conversation said, "Would your Royal Highness excuse me if I asked when you first felt that you were saved?" "Well," the Princess replied, "a poor Scotch Christian talked to me about the Gospel, and since then I have been able to say I am saved." And so he trusted that, by talking to them of the Gospel, they might also feel that they were saved. He trusted that God's blessing might rest upon them, and that they might come, like their own Princess, to feel that they were saved. He concluded by expressing a wish that God might give them a happy new year.

The Dancing Festival at the tomb of St. Willibrord (whose special forte is supposed to be effectual intercession for sufferers from epilepsy and St. Vitus's dance) takes place annually on Whit Tuesday at Echternach, a town and railway station in Luxembourg. It has been described as "one of the most extraordinary spectacles that religious fervor could devise, or ignorant fanaticism perpetuate.' It begins with an open-air sermon; then follows a procession all round the town, headed by the clergy, followed, first, by several hundred men singing the Litany of St. Willibrord, and then by all the boys, and after them the girls, of Echternach, from the age of ten to fourteen, dancing three steps forward and one backward, or five steps forward and three backward. Most, if not all, of these youngsters act a vicarious part, being hired to dance for the benefit of other persons. Then comes an endless crowd of men, women, and children—five or six or more deep—holding a stick, or umbrella, or pocket-handkerchief between them, and dancing or hopping to a jig tune, played by numerous bands of wind instruments, or by drums and fifes, which at intervals form part of the procession. The affair finishes by the processionists dancing up the sixty-four steps which lead to the church, hopping round the altar (where their chaplets or crucifixes are brought in contact with the statute of the saint, to be thus endowed with special virtue), and then emerging into the churchyard." A spectator of Testimony of Reclaimed Inebriates.—Dr. Walter Moxon, a physician of some eminence, having remarked lately, in an article in the Contemporary Review, that "Experienced persons say that they have never known a drunkard permanently reclaimed," the Rev. G. M. Murphy resolved to refute the statement. So on Christmas Day he called a meeting of reclaimed drunkards at the Lambeth Baths, London, and gathered from them, as a daily paper puts it, so much evidence of the kind desired that a good deal might be taken from it, as a measure of caution, without affecting the result." Mr. Murphy read fourteen written testimonials from reclaimed men, and gave the names and addresses of fifty persons whom in his capacity as minister of Borough Road Chapel he knew to have permanently emancipated themselves from the slavery of intemperance. But this was not all. Out of the congregation present thirty-five men came forward to declare the abiding strength of their resolution to avoid the drunkenness into which they once fell, and it was further discovered, on show of hands, that thirty-nine, in addition to the speakers, had abstained over ten years, thirty-two over five years, and twenty-eight over two years.

Effect of a Few Words on Two Lads.—The Rev. Richard Knill was once preaching at Bideford, after his return from Russia, and he observed two lads lingering behind the rest of the congregation. Taking them aside, he spoke to them with great earnestness about their pe sonal salvation. When they became much a fected, he summed up his instruction by requesting them to repeat the prayer, "O Lord, conver my soul to Thyself, for the sake of Jesus Chris Amen," until it was impressed on their memor and then charged them to continue to offer tha prayer until it was answered. They did so; an both became ministers of extensive usefulnes One of them, when preaching in the same tow after Mr. Knill's death, made known the circun stance.

Sitting under His Shadow.—One stormy wi ter day the Rev. Mr. Young was visiting one his people—an old man—who lived in poverty a lonely cottage a few miles from Jedburgh, En land. He found him sitting with the Bible op upon his knees, but in outward circumstances great discomfort—the snow drifting through t roof and under the door, and scarcely an emb of fire upon the hearth. "What are you abo to-day, John?" was Mr. Young's question entering. "Ah, sir," said the happy saint, " am sitting under His shadow with great d light." Oh! wondrous consolation in Christ, t river which, from the beginning of time to t end, "maketh glad the city of our God!"

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, the famous Artist and Moralist.

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, the world-famed artist, who died February 1st, 1878, at his residence in the Hampstead Road, London, was of Scotch parentage, but born in London in the year 1792. His father was also an artist.

He commenced his artistic studies early in life, and so numerous have been his drawings that in 1863 a "Cruikshank Gallery" was opened at Exeter Hall, London, and the title of the catalogue ran,—"A Catalogue of a Selection from the Works of George Cruikshank, extending over a Period of Upwards of sixty years, from 1799 to 1863."

George Cruikshank grew up to manhood during the fever of the French Revolution, while George the Third was king. Through his father's connections he had no difficulty in obtaining work. His pencil became rapidly famous as a scourge of fashionable vices and political corruption. The earnestness which had taken a patriotic turn during the Napoleonic wars now grew didactic; as soon as Cruikshank was able to think and draw for himself, the follies, the miseries, the meannesses of "London life" became the quarry that he hunted down through their Protean forms with unsparing severity and unsleeping vigilance.

He applied for admission to the Royal Academy, but the school at that time was so restricted for space that Fuseli, to whom young Cruikshank sent his application, though conceiving a high opinion of his abilities, was unable to extend the privileges of the institution to him. "The young man might attend," Fuseli said, "but he would have to fight for a seat." George Cruikshank was not of the kind that fights for seats, and so he never attended the famous school of painting.

He first became known to the public through his caricatures, which were published in the various periodicals of the day, and were brimful of wit and humor. At the same time he occupied himself with the production of a series of plates to illustrate life in London, with the object of warning young men against the consequences of what is called seeing life. Among the more celebrated of the works he produced in these days were pictures of "Mornings at Bow Street," one of the police-courts of London where some of the most eccentric characters of the city are to be seen in the persons both of prosecutors and defendants. These the artist depicted with a fidelity to life recognized by every one who had witnessed one of these matinees, and they at once made the fame of the young genius.

In 1838 he acquired fresh fame by illustrating Charles Dickens's popular publications. He smote vice with a deadly hail of blows, and the vice that he struck at most hotly and incessantly was drunkenness. In this vehement campaign he ranged himself side by side with the Total Abstinence party, who were very proud of finding such an ally.

He was a late convert to teetotalism, which he so enthusiastically upheld. For a good fifty years of his life George Cruikshank, although he had long "spells" of abstemiousness, was certainly not a total abstainer; yet long before he became one of the most conspicuous of English temperance confessors he preached occasional pictorial sermons against drinking. His forcible etchings of the "Gin Trap," the "Gin Juggernaut," and the "Devil's Frying-Pan" were only the preludes to his well-known series of eight prints, executed by the glyphographic process—a kind of etching in relief—called "The Bottle." Impressions from these prints were sold by tens of thousands.

It has surely not been equalled since the publication of the plates of Hogarth's "Harlot's Progress." The foundation of the Magdalen Hospital has been ascribed to the last-named work; and it is to be hoped that some practical results have followed George Cruikshank's powerful attack on the Demon of Drink. "The Drunkard's Children" was a sequel to "The Bottle." The veteran, however, stuck bravely to his text, and during nearly a score of years poured forth teetotal etchings, drawings, and writings. He even pressed into the cause of total abstinence our old friends Cinderella, Jack the Giant Killer, and Hop o' my Thumb, and wrote and illustrated a series of temperance fairy tales.

As a painter in oils George Cruikshank was by no means undistinguished. At the Academy, as at the British Institution, he frequently, within his later years, put in a creditable appearance. Among his oil pictures may be mentioned with applause "Disturbing the Congregation," a deliciously racy picture of a little boy in church dropping his pegtop, and catching at the same moment the minatory eye of the beadle, from whom, in another sense, he is certain to "catch it" before he is many hours older.

In this department his chef-d'œuvre was the gigantic picture of the "Worship of Bacchus"—it might more appropriately be styled a cartoon, slightly colored in oils—now at South Kensington. This work, on which he bestowed an immensity of time, labor, and thought, was submitted to Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle, in 1863. Nor was Her Majesty, on beholding it, chary of words of gracious encouragement to the aged artist. An engraving from it has been published.

Looking at the amount of sheer labor in the picture, the wellnigh incredible multiplicity of figures, and the extreme care with which the minutest details have been delineated by a hand following the eye of a man past threescore years and ten, the "Worship of Bacchus" must be regarded as a phenomenon, when we remember the painter's purpose, and the tremendous moral lesson he sought to teach. It is an eloquent protest against the drinking customs of society, and a no less eloquent—and terribly ghastly—exposition of the evils wrought on that same society by the vice of drunkenness.

So far as physical health went, George Cruikshank for at least a quarter of a century seemed to thrive marvellously well on teetotalism. He neither smoked tobacco nor drank fermented liquors in his old age; but he was a hearty eater, an early riser, and a vigorous walker.

During the frenzy of the Paris Commune in 1871, he published a cartoon denunciatory of the ferocious democratic license of the Parisians, with which his stern morality admitted no sympathy. The pictures he has left behind him are enormous in amount and wonderfully various in quality. Nowhere in them is there any thing base, any thing loose, anything in the largest sense of the word immoral. It is something remarkable that a satirist who chastised fashionable and popular vice for more than sixty years almost without intermission should have left not one drawing behind him that might not be handed round in the family circle of any Christian household. He maintained a noble stand against strong drink, which he justly conceived to be the curse of his country.

George Cruikshank was as true a Londoner as John Gilpin, and, like him, "a trainband captain eke was he." He was a volunteer among the numerous battalions enrolled to resist a very seriously-meant invasion of these isles by "Boney," that "Corsican Ogre" he detested so heartily. Fifty years afterwards he again became a volunteer; the object of the English preparations in 1859 being to withstand an invasion on the part of the Corsican's nephew, Napoleon III., and which invasion was, in all probability, never meant at all. For some years Cruikshank occupied the proud position of Lieutenant-Colonel of the Havelock, or 48th Middlesex rifles. He and his officers did not, unfortunately, agree; and at length the veteran was persuaded, to sheathe his sword, and in retirement make of his helmet "a hive for bees."

He was very benevolent and liberal in giving away money, and has not left much property behind him. In his latter days he was poorly pensioned by the State, and a small annual stipend was allowed him by the Royal Academy; but a subscription started for his benefit scarcely produced as many hundreds as it should have alized thousands. A new generation had aris and they knew not Cruikshank; but to such man poverty was as noble as that of Capt Coram, "who had spent all he had in doi good, and in his old age was not ashamed confess that he was poor."

In personal appearance Cruikshank was a markable man no less than in his works. Ra er below the middle stature, and thick-set, w an aquiline nose, piercing eyes, a mouth ful lurking humor, and wild elf-locks flowing ab his face, he at once attracted attention and nounced the presence of a man of genius, ener and character. Up to a late age he was a muscular man, and was always famous for c age and spirit. In his earlier years he had tured alone into the worst dens of criminal L don, and when quite elderly he captured a bur on his premises with his own hand.

As an artist his name will live in the est of the world. He drew low life to perfec whether in its ludicrous aspects, or in its s or, violence, pathos, or tragedy. He wa admirable illustrator of stories, seizing the dramatic incidents for realization, and crow the design with life and action. He must be remembered as one of the finest etche his time. In many other ways he contrib to the public amusement and the public g and the gratitude of his countrymen wi everlastingly associated with his memory.

"Spent, but Charged."—Upon a su dial, two hundred years old, in All Souls' llege, Oxford, England, is the Latin motto, Pe nt et Imputantur, of which the English is Sp t, but charged. The shadow glides over the fac of dial silently; there is no pendulum beat whir of wheels; the hours have been spent, b they are recorded, charged, in the books of lasting remembrance. That record whi God keeps must one day be faced. Young m, you spend your hours carelessly, as the spe thrift flings away his money. You make no count of them. But God does. SUNRISE OVER THE CITIES.

An Exploration Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached February 2d.

"Joseph laid up the food in the cities."—GEN. 41 : 48.
"And pitched toward the sunrising."—NUM. 21 : 11.

The Cities are Granaries of Blessings—What the Cities Spend in Education—Hope in the Gospelization of the Masses—The Stupendous Tread—The Cities to be Saved by Religion—The Best Sermon ever Preached—The Couple St. James Married—The Churches should be spiritual Apothecaries—There have been Great Improvements—But not yet on the Right Track—The Morning Cometh—Louisville's Heroism in the Yellow-Fever Trouble—The Church must Swing Open Wide its Doors.

JOSEPH gathered the food in the cities, because the best way to supply a country with any thing worth having is to make the city the channel. In this case they were the granaries of corn, but now the cities are the granaries of thought, of religious expedition, of educational force, and of world-wide beneficence. If this country is ever brought to God, saved for morals and religion, it will be by a grand movement on the part of the cities. They will open a fire all around the sky, and then move in toward the centre until all the forces of iniquity now rampant will surrender to law and order and Christianity.

While preparing this sermon I had in my room the maps and histories of all our great cities, the police reports, and the sketches of charitable institutions; and I come from that investigation with a heart full of exhilerant hope, and my sermon this morning, like the tent spoken of in the text, is "pitched toward the sunrising."

The long night is going away to the pallor that precedes the dawn, and the pallor is flushing into crimson, and the crimson reddening into a conflagration that will hoist all its banners of flame on the spires of our cities, until the sun shall rise so high it can pour illumination into darkest cellar of poverty and deepest haunt of crime.

If you present me the statistic that in Boston in one year there were twenty-six thousand arrests for crime, I only make that statement the background to a beautiful picture in which I see that that city last year gave one million seven hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars for common-school education, and through the power which Horace Mann, the chief apostle of education in this country, projected, has exerted upon every school-house in the land an elevating influence. Do you tell me that in one year in Philadelphia there were forty-six thousand arrests for crime? I only make that statement the background to a beautiful picture in which there are improved academies, and large churches, and magnificent charities, which make that city in some respects the most delightful residence on this continent.

People laugh at what they call the Quaker guns; but those Quaker guns are loaded with an ammunition with which all guns will yet be loaded—"Peace on earth, good-will to men." I know by blissful experience what is residence among her happy homes, and to her cemeteries I have committed a charge for the resurrection. Beautiful Philadelphia! I cannot pronounce her name without arousal of deepest and best emotion.

Oh! what a high hope for our great cities in the sublime statistic that Chicago spends annually in education $604,000; Baltimore spends in the common-school education of the people $702,000; San Francisco expends $732,000; Cincinnati expends in the common school education of the people $775,000; New York expends in common-school education $3,518,000. Some have said that St. Louis increases more rapidly in population than in morals; but such persons forget that she has some of the most remarkable charitable institutions in all the world, and that she is making almost unprecedented effort for the evangelization of that city, which is the prospective capital of this nation.

It may not be in our day, but in the days of our children, when the cities on the Pacific coast will balance the cities on the Atlantic coast, and the table-lands of the West will be as populous as are the farm fields of New Jersey and Pennsylvania—then the President of the United States may write his message on the banks of the Mississippi, and members of Congress, before the opening of the day's session, take a morning walk on that almost miraculous bridge which hovers over the great Father of Waters.

But, my friends, my hope is not so much in the mental culture of the schools, and the advancement of the arts, and in the worldly enterprise of the people: my hope for the cities is not so much in these things as in the gospelization of the masses that go tramping on through the great thoroughfares of these cities.

HARK TO THE STUPENDOUS TREAD!

Two hundred and sixty-five thousand people in San Francisco; two hundred and seventy-five thousand in Cincinnati; three hundred and thirty thousand in Baltimore; three hundred and fifty thousand in Boston; four hundred and twenty thousand in St. Louis; four hundred and twenty-five thousand in Chicago; five hundred thousand in Brooklyn; seven hundred thousand in Philadelphia; one million sixty thousand in New York—marching on, marching whither! Eternal God! help us in this theme.

When I say to you that these cities are to be saved by religion, I want to make a distinction. There are two kinds of religion which will never save these cities. One is a humanitarian religion, which makes a man honest and pure for this life only, and does not propose any inward reconstruction by which he shall be prepared for the life to come; and the other is a dead orthodoxy which puts every thing on belief and nothing on practice. The one religion proposes every thing for this life; the other religion proposes every thing for the next life. I would not give a paper of pins for either religion, for who wants a religion that stops midstream, or starts midstream? What you and I want is a bridge of two spans—one arching this life, the other arching the life to come. The humanitarian religion is a bridge too short, for it stops at this side the grave. The dead orthodoxy of the Church is bridge too short, because it proposes to start at the other side the stream.

The best sermon that was ever preached was reported in the book of Matthew. In that sermon Christ denounced uncleanness, hypocrisy, pharisaism; told how to treat one's enemies, by ornithological and botanical illustration; promised plenty to eat and plenty to wear; and wound up by telling the importance of a belief which shall be a rock to hold you up instead of the sand to let you down.

My recent reading of that Sermon on the Mount reconstructs my theology in one point. I used to have the theory that if a man believed right, his life would be right. Every day demonstrates that fallacy. During the past few years, some of the most notorious counterfeiters and defrauders in all the land have believed in the Heidelberg and Westminster Catechisms, or had sat down at the Methodist love-feasts, or have gone clear under the wave in the baptistries. On the other hand, you will find men whose lives are pure and whose behavior is a model of good citizenship yet making no preparation for the eternal world. The one bridge too short, because it stops at the grave; the other bridge too short, because it proposes to start at the other side the grave. Now, a man may have Calvin's Institutes in one pocket, and John Wesey's sermons in another pocket, and an Episcopal liturgy in one hand, and a Bible in the other hand, and walk straight into perdition; an accurate belief does not put a man one inch heavenward. A communion table and a church record are a poor plank to swim on when the floods of death come in.

St. James, in his Epistle, married a couple that ought never to be divorced. The one he called Faith, and the other he called Works. "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." It is this practical religion for two lives and for two worlds that is the religion that is to save our cities.

Sometimes I am asked how long I will continue in this style of preaching. Well, about forty years, if I live so long. That is, I am going to devote the rest of my life to preaching for both worlds, for this life and the life to come. We must keep things in the Church of God stirred up. It may be very beautiful for two or three hundred people, well dressed, to come into a beautiful church, and have a choir at one end of the church to furnish the music, and a minister at the other end of the church to do the praying, while they for an hour and a half are filled with dreams about heaven. But what right has a gilded yacht to go sailing ahead, singing "Life on the ocean wave" when there is an awful shipwreck near by, and all hands are going down? The Church of God must save the people for both worlds, or it has no excuse for existence. If it does not do that, turn it into a lyceum, or a reading-room, or a ten-pin alley, or a bakery. If our churches are to bring the people to Christ, it will be because they are spiritual apothecaries affording medicine for every kind of sickness of soul. The simple fact is that the vast majority of people have trouble. Take a thousand of this audience, or out of any audience, and nine hundred and ninety-nine of them want consolation and encouragement. They get abused, get set upon, get flayed, get excoriated, get found fault with, get kicked, but do not get blessed. Some of them are physicians, and they are denounced because they cannot effect a cure, when the simple fact is that through parsimony they were not called in until it was too late.

They are mechanics, and are everlastingly found fault with about their style of work. They are merchants, and their goods are maligned by customers who expect through that depreciation to get twenty per cent off. They are journalists, who work until their nervous system is shattered and their eyesight fails, and get no thanks. They are workingwomen like Ann Follet, in New York, who made crochet work for $2.10 a week, and then got cheated out of that, until Christian philanthropy took the case into the courts; like Eunice Winters, of Fourteenth Street, New York, who made four fashionable hats for $8, but could not get her money until long after those hats had been admired in the churches and in the theatres—aye, never would have got the money if it had not been for the Protective Women's Association of New York that came to the rescue. O my friends! there are a great many people who look placid in church who are making a supernatural struggle to hide their woes; and the Church of Jesus Christ, if it proposes to save our cities, must perform omnipotent panacea.

If our churches are to bring the great masses of the people into the kingdom of God we must make them more attractive than any other buildings. Bring flowers. Bring the best of music. Bring the brightest of good cheer. The churches of Christ must be brighter than concert-halls and opera-houses. In order to that, we need some Martin Luther to come forth and smash the frigid conventionalities of the churches. Why is it that people leave their naturalness behind when they come into church, or into prayer-meeting, or into the pew, or the pulpit? Why are you so lugubrious when you talk religion? Why do you whine when you make religious exhortation? Why not have the churches of God the brightest places on earth, where you will give a hearty grip and enthusiastic welcome to a man when he comes in, and have your religion shine out through your face, and have the churches the sunshiniest buildings in all the world. Why do you stand on the shore of some hymn or song in the church, dipping the tip of your foot in the wave, when you ought to wade into the Atlantic Ocean of hosanna, and have the eternal surges roll over you?

But there have been GREAT IMPROVEMENTS.

One was the demolition of the box pulpit—the old-style box pulpit—reached by a long flight of stairs, up which the minister went, height above height, until he got into another climate, opened a door, locked it, and then sat down out of sight. Great improvement [illegible] the fact that there is no pew door. What an absurdity, a pew door. What do you want a pew door for? To keep people out? [illegible] do not want to keep them out. The absurdest thing on earth is a pew door. Let there be no door at all, and let the people come in when they want to come in. And so there has been [illegible]t advancement in the building of circular churches. Why build a square church? God builds almost every thing in a curved line; the [illegible] branch bent, the wave curved, the sky arched, the world round, God Himself, according to the Scriptures, seated on the circle of the heavens. Why then defy the Divine intimation and build a square church?

The time will come when the churches will be the most attractive buildings in all the world. A man will say, "I am tired; I must go to church and get rested." A man will say, "I have been so lonely since the funeral hour, I must go to church and hear of the day when the grave will surrender; I have lost my property and I must go to church and hear of the palaces I am going to inherit; here are my children coming up; I must go to church and have them consecrated." And the Church of God will be placed in glorious rivalry with other institutions, and eclipse them. Its architecture more grand. Its music more inspiring. Its gladness more uplifted. Its audiences more tremendous. Its outlook more ecstatic. Its sympathies more enfolding.

But, my friends, if the church saves the cities, she will have to take a different tack. Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine years since the church organized, and yet we have only ninety million professed Christians to one hundred and fifty million Mahommedans, three hundred and forty million Buddhists, and four hundred and fifty million Pagans. The Gospel is mighty enough, but we do not give it a fair chance. The banquet is large enough, but we are busy engraving the gilt-edged cards of invitation while the people are starving for a slice of the Gospel loaf. [illegible] is sharp enough; but we spend our time in trying to swing it gracefully, or in cut- [illegible] men that do not cut the way we cut. [illegible] friends, [illegible]URCH WILL HAVE TO WAKE UP [illegible] I tell you what will happen after a while. If we ministers do not [illegible] enthusiasm and fire into our work, [illegible]an doctors, Christian lawyers, Christian [illegible]ters, Christian masons, Christian plumbers, Christian shoemakers, will get a bap[illegible] of the Holy Ghost, and they will go forth to save their own occupation and profession; and it will be as in the late war when the militia [illegible]sed the West Pointers, and these Christian laymen will outpreach and outpray and outsave the multitudes. The time will come when it will be acknowledged in the churches that any man who can preach may preach.

Oh! what improvement, however, in this di[illegible] the time when there was a book writ[illegible] "Pulpit Guard against Lawrence Williams, the Tailor, preacher; Thomas Palmer, the baker, preacher; James Hine, the plough[illegible]her; Humphrey Rodgers, the baker's boy, popular preacher." I do not know so much difference between the old-fashioned stage[illegible]e modern lightning-express train; [illegible] much difference in war between the clumsy [illegible]-axe and the modern needle-gun, or Hotch[illegible]; not so much difference in husbandry [illegible]a's crooked stick as a plough and the modern steam plough, as there will be a [illegible]ween the way things are done now [illegible]e churches, and the way they will be.

The wheel of Christian work now turns once a [illegible]. The time will come when the wheel of Christian work will make a thousand revolutions [illegible]nute. Mark you, no new Gospel, but the old Gospel put to new uses. Just as there is no [illegible] the same that broke at the creation, but now it paints photographs; just as [illegible] new style of electricity the same that which thundered over Mount Sinai, but now through the electric wire it becomes the optic nerve of the nations; no new style of fire or water, but now they are harnessed into the steam-power; so no new Gospel, but the old Gospel through new processes for new uses of speed and power and grandeur and glory and salvation. Do we recognize these facts?

The best thing we can do with our old sermons is to burn them. The best thing we can do with our old prayers is to forget them. The best thing we can do with our conventionality is to bury it. Get out of the way with your sanctified stupidity and your holy dulness and your snivelling cant, and let the Gospel of Christ have full swing, and pure as the water, clear as the light, arousing as the archangel's trumpet, until it bathe and irradiate and resurrect all these great cities. As far as I can tell it is about five o'clock in the morning.

THE NIGHT OF CRIME AND SIN IS GOING AWAY, and I pitch my tent toward the sunrising. The tears yet on the eyelids of the suffering are only the morning dew. The croaking of the owl of the night will soon be hushed, and the lark will dip its wing in the daybreak. The morning cometh. All our cities are to be saved. Why was it that the telegraph wires were put down all over this land and all under the sea? You say, for commercial purposes. I do not believe it. I think the grand idea was that the whole world might celebrate the final jubilee in deliverance from sin and death and hell. There will be sometime great excitement at the telegraphic centres, and the news will come some morning: Cincinnati, and Chicago, and New Orleans, and Charleston, and San Francisco, and Boston, and London, and Paris, and Rome, and Madras, and St. Petersburg, and Canton, and Peking, are all evangelized. Nations born in a day. It is no whim of mine, but a statement of the Lord God Almighty.

A gentleman on board the cars near Pittsburg said to me the other day, that

THE BEHAVIOR OF THE CITY OF LOUISVILLE, Kentucky, was very remarkable this last summer, while the yellow-fever was raging at the South. It is a story more thrilling to me than any thing I have seen in romance or in history. You know all our cities were quarantined against the South. You know how we watched every vessel that came up through the Narrows. All the cities of this land watchful to keep back infection and keep back the victims of that dreadful disease. Louisville, Kentucky, assembled in mass meeting, and resolved to swing open her doors and let the sufferers come in. In her resolution she practically said: "Come in, and we will nurse you while you are sick, and we will bury you if you die, and we will mother your children after you are gone." And all the trains coming in came loaded with the victims. Some came in wild delirium. Some lay on the floor of the car. Some were in coaches. Some died at the depot. Others lifted into wagons and taken to the hospitals and private residences.

They came so fast, thousand by thousand, that the baggage was sometimes piled up in the street. All the doctors busy. All the sisters of charity at work. All the ministers of religion giving comfort and condolence. The mothers, the wives, the daughters of beautiful Louisville bending day and night over the sick and the dying and the dead. Not one sufferer thrust out. Not one orphan unsheltered. Not one bereaved soul uncomforted. Great surges of pain beating in hour after hour, day after day, week after week, until the city became one great groan of distress, and one great benediction of charity. The blessing of God Almighty will be on that city forever.

Well, now, my friends, the Church of God must swing open its doors, and swing them open very widely, to let all the plague-stricken nations come in, come in to be nursed of Gospel comfort and to be saved. Room for all. Come in, ye sick. Come in, ye suffering. Come in, ye lost. Come in—ye dying. Come in! Come in! The great heart of a sympathetic God waits for you like an illumined palace for a weary guest.

A STREET ARAB.

JOHN BRADY was a street Arab, dirty, frowzy, and ragged. By day he wandered about New York, picking up a living by hook or crook, and keeping clear of the policeman. At night he slept under a cart, or in a doorway, always on the alert lest his perambulating enemy should carry him off to the station-house.

One day John was taken by a policeman, and the magistrate sent him to Blackwell's Island, as a street vagrant. John didn't know it, but that was his first step to a better life.

An agent of the Children's Aid Society, going to the island to do good to the vagabonds there confined, saw John. Something about the stree Arab attracted his attention.

"There's the making of a man in that boy," said he, "if he can have a fair chance."

John was sent out West to work on a farm That was his second step in the right directio His good work won the confidence of the farme and he was sent to the district school thre months in a year.

In that school-house John's vocation dawne upon him. He became ambitious to become scholar. To study was to gratify a passion f learning. Even mathematics, so hard and u attractive to ordinary boys, seemed to whet h mental appetite.

He continued to do good work for the farme while doing better work for himself. When h time of service was out, he wrote to Preside Porter, asking if there was any method by whi a poor boy, anxious for an education, could p his way through Yale College. The Presiden reply brought John to Yale. He rang the colle bell to pay for his tuition and board.

John made friends by hard work and brillia success. Under the religious influences in whi he was placed, he was led to give himself to t service of a divine Master. When he graduat he had determined to become a minister, a support was offered him for three years at Un Theological Seminary, New York. He went the city where he had been a ragged vagabo as a student of theology.

Last summer, twelve years from the day agent of the Children's Aid Society found h on Blackwell's Island, John Brady left N York as the first Presbyterian missionary to Eskimos of Alaska.

So much for benevolent Christian work. waif saved from a life of shame and made a me of untold good to others! Who will say t this will not repay all the time and money sp by the noble men who were the agents in godlike work?

The Death of Mr. J. Blair Scribner, the h d of the eminent publishing house of New Yor at the early age of twenty-eight years, has caus a sensation of profound regret throughout the ty and the country generally. The house of S b-ner is known all over the world as a firm o sought to disseminate pure and wholesome l r-ature, and who were exceedingly careful n to allow a book of the opposite tendency to e from their press. The deceased gentleman as universally respected, and is sincerely lame d. His great-grandfather was a Presbyterian pa r, and he graduated at Yale College in 1775, st before the outbreak of the Revolution.

The Question of Wages is ust now a tal question with the community in every cou try of the world. On this subject a leading so ty journal in England remarks: "This questi of the legitimate rate of wages is one of the st difficult of the age. In Germany it has l to the spread of Socialism, in America it has l to attempts to crush out Chinese labor, and is now brought home to our own doors. C an English artisan live for what supports a fo gn artisan? Without attempting to answer his question, I limit myself to asserting the elf-evident truth that if he cannot he shall b n-dersold by foreign nations, and, as an inev ble result, we shall be driven out of all open ar-kets and cease to manufacture."

THE VOYAGE OF THE EGLANTINE.

Who sailed in her—and why.

A Story of an English Merchant Vessel.

(Concluded.)

CHRISTIAN HILLIARD and Captain Thorpe t ned away from the door of the house where C irns had lived, feeling solemnized by the tid-is they had learned there of his little girl's c ath.

They could not feel grieved, for they had a indistinct sensation of pleasure in the t ught that Cairns was with her beyond the r er. Had he returned with them what grief v uld have filled his heart to hear of her death. it was, she had probably stood on the shining s re ready to welcome with outstretched arms t storm-tossed traveller from life's troubled s.

'It is all for the best," said Christian, as t y walked away. "He is with her now, and was at least spared that sorrow."

'Yes," said the Captain, "that would have most broken his heart. He was a brave man d a strong, but his heart had that weak place. e all have one somewhere. I hope it will not wrenched to-night in our case; we are going me like men risen from the grave, and to tell e truth I feel a little nervous as to what the xt hour will bring forth."

'So do I," said Christian, "but I learned a son of faith and cheerful confidence when I s on that raft that I think will drive away ute anxiety from my breast for the rest of my e."

They passed on, and at the cross-roads parted; orpe going towards his own home, Christian wards Mr. Ingleton's. There was a light in e little sitting-room, and he stopped and looked rough the venetians. By the fireplace sat aud, with her hands idly folded on her lap. e was in deep black, and the sweet face looked rer than ever in its quiet sadness.

For a few minutes he stood and watched, de-ting within himself whether he should go in once, or break the news in some other way st; but the temptation to see for himself the ightening of the wistful eyes was too strong, d he went in. He knew the ways of the use, and where everybody was likely to be at at time. The door of the room was not osed, and with a gentle push it opened noise-ssly.

As he stepped across the floor she looked up quick surprise, wondering at the heavy foot-ll. There was one moment of agonizing doubt, d then the light of a joy too great for words. ever till then had Christian known and realized w dear she was to him.

The wondering family soon gathered round, arcely able to believe that it was really Chris-an in the body.

"But I don't understand," said Mr. Ingleton, his bewilderment. "Didn't the Eglantine ring a leak and go down? That's what they ld us."

"Papa, don't you understand?" said Maud, r face glowing with proud happiness. "Tell m from the beginning, Christian."

"Yes, sir, the vessel sprang a leak, and we nt the men off in a boat. Then we got a spare il, and weighted it, and passed it over the side, d that partially kept out the influx of water. hen we made a raft and ventured our lives on at, and by the kind providence of God floated til we sighted the American brig and were ought home safely. We have only just landed, d I feel as one brought from death to life."

"Did the Eglantine go down, do you think?" ked a younger sister, with breathless interest.

"Yes," said Christian, "we were only just in ne. She went down like a stone while we were sight of her."

"And you floated about on that raft for five ys?"

"For five long weary days."

He then in simple but pathetic words told the ory of Cairns. He spoke of his love for his little girl, and described the scene on the quay before the voyage, when Cairns had carried the wee little thing down "to see father's ship." The picture Christian drew of the death on the raft touched the hearts of the listeners and the hot tears fell freely.

"Christian," whispered Maud, as she wished him good-night at the door; "perhaps he was really talking to his little girl."

"Perhaps so, darling; we cannot tell. We cannot know at what moment the veil was lifted."

He turned away from the brightness and light into the cold dark night. They had told him of his father's illness, and he could not stay away from him. Mr. Ingleton overtook him at the gate.

"I'll walk with you, Christian," he said; "it's a dreary walk alone." They walked on, talking of the unfortunate Eglantine, till they came to the lodge gate.

"Miles will think it's your ghost: he'll have a fit," said Mr. Ingleton, as the old gate-keeper appeared with his lamp.

"Be it the doctor," he said, peering into the darkness. "Be the master worse?"

"Don't you know me, Miles?"

At the sound of the familiar voice, the old man started.

"Who be you?" he asked fearfully. "Not—— why, it is! Mr. Christian!"

"Are you sure it isn't his ghost, Mr. Miles?" said Mr. Ingleton, jokingly.

"Ghost, sir! not it, sir! I know him too well. Come in, Mr. Christian! bless you, sir! This is a night, sure-ly!"

In his delight he seized Christian by the arm and held him fast.

"Then you wasn't drowned, after all? I can't scarcely believe my old eyes. Won't the old master be glad."

"How is he, Miles?"

"He was sinking fast the last time as I heard, sir. Do'ee come in and let my old 'oman see you, sir; it'll do her such a power o' good."

"I'll come and see her to-morrow," answered Christian, kindly. "I will bring her something that will cheer her up. Go in and go to bed, Miles: you will increase your rheumatism out in this cold."

Wishing Mr. Ingleton good-night, he went up to the house. The man who opened the door almost shrieked in his fear. Like many of his class, he was superstitious, and thought it was a ghost. The other servants came flocking round, overwhelming him with their simple, honest joy. Not one among them but loved Mr. Christian, and they could scarcely realize that he was once more amongst them in perfect health and strength.

He spoke to all and each, and then passed on up the broad staircase. At his father's door he paused. "Go in," he said to the housekeeper, who had followed him. "Go in and see if he is awake."

She went in, and in a minute returned. "Am I to tell him you are here, sir?" she whispered.

"Yes, you had better. Tell him very gently."

She went back, and he heard the low murmur of her voice within. But though he listened intently, he could not hear his father's. After what seemed to him an interminable time, she again appeared.

"He don't seem to understand, Mr. Christian! I've told him over and over, but he only looks at me as if he didn't hear. Will you come and speak to him yourself, please?"

He went into the silent, darkened room, with a curious sensation, as if he were walking in a dream, and would by and by awake to a reality. How would his father meet him? There came over him with a rush the memory of that last meeting, when he had been so curtly refused an interview. Would he meet with similar treatment now? He advanced to the bedside, and stood looking down upon the worn, haggard face on the pillow. So altered—so strangely altered, he scarcely knew it.

The sunken eyes looked up into his with a glaring, questioning gaze, but the pale lips made no movement.

"Father," he said gently, bending low; "I have come safely back, you see." He did not know what to say, so spoke the first words that presented themselves. Mr. Hilliard made no reply.

"The brig Columbus—picked us up——"

"Whom?" interrupted his father, in a low whisper.

"Thorpe and me," answered Christian, with painful reluctance.

A sharp spasm of pain caused his father's face to darken.

"Where is he—Cairns?"

"He died at sea."

"Did he—did he curse me first?"

"Father!" cried Christian, unutterably shocked, more by the tone than the words. "He died at peace with all, both God and man."

"Ah! he didn't know?"

"You did not know Cairns, father! he was so true, and good, and brave. If he had known all he would have forgiven you."

"Why?"

"Because he also had had much forgiven."

Mr. Hilliard closed his eyes with an impatient frown.

With weary, saddened heart, Christian sat in the desolate room. Glad of an excuse to get down among the servants, the nurse had gone out when he came in, and he was alone with the dying man. That he was dying he could not doubt; there was the seal of death on the sunken mouth and in the dimmed eyes. He spoke to him several times, but there was no response, and at last he sank into a reverie.

There came before him a striking, painful contrast—that of Cairns' last hours with their glad going home, and the sad and hopeless waiting now before him. His heart ached as he recalled the peaceful words, "All is bright, beautiful light in the West," and pictured the opening of the "Gate of Glory." He would gladly, freely have given up all his father's wealth to insure for him such an entrance into the hereafter. But while that entrance is so free as to be without money and without price, no money, no sacrifice of money, can purchase the right for those who have it not.

The night passed away, and daylight came once more, bringing with it the congratulations of friends and acquaintances. They crowded round him, as he rode into town on Lucrece, shaking his hand as if they would shake it off. People he had never spoken to before came up to him with welcoming looks and words.

"It is really worth being drowned, to come back and find how kindly disposed one's neighbors are," he said.

"Ah! yes, if we could only come to life again, sir," said a man, standing near.

"What, Lucas! is that you?" cried Christian. "When did you get here?"

"We got picked up, and brought straight away home, sir. Is it true, sir, about Cairns?" he added, hesitatingly.

"Only too true, Lucas! he died a noble death."

"Will you tell us all about it some day, sir? Me and my mates wants to put up a stone or some'ut, about it, and perhaps you'll tell us what to put on it."

"I'll help you, certainly," said Christian, sadly.

"How's the old master, sir? He ain't agoing too, is he?"

"I'm afraid so, Lucas."

The news of Christian's safety spread like wildfire over the town, and people flocked to the doors to see him as he passed. It was very pleasant to him to hear the many heartfelt congratulations on his escape from an ocean grave, and to see the smiling faces of those who rejoiced in his return to home and his friends. He had not known till then how many knew and loved him. On his way home he met the doctor who attended his father, and stopped to speak to him.

"Well, Mr. Christian, this is good news I hear; the place is full of it," said the old man, heartily. "I am only sorry you find your father so ill; the shock was too great, too severe, for his nervous system."

"The nurse tells me you give no hope, is it so?" asked Christian, anxiously. "I have been to your house to see you; but, of course, you were out. I could not gét back sooner; so many have waylaid me. You have seen my father?"

"Just come from him. No, Mr. Christian, I'm afraid to give you any hope; he is sinking fast," answered the doctor gravely, and with evident sympathy. "If you had come back sooner, he might—but I don't know; he was never strong, you know. I will call again this evening."

Still lying in half-unconsciousness, Christian found his father. Even in that short time there was a change in the pallid face; a deeper sinking of the eyes and mouth.

"The end cannot be far off," he thought, as he stood and watched with heavy heart. "If he would but speak!—if he would but give some sign of repentance for the past!"

But the hours slowly wore away, and still he lay in silence. Now and then Christian thought he was going to speak, and bent over him with eager waiting, but each time he was deceived, and returned to his seat in bitter disappointment.

At last, night came once more with its darkness, and the quiet moaning of the wintry wind. Within the sick-chamber, all was mournful desolateness; without all was dreary, melancholy blackness. Within was no ray of glorious light from the golden gate, shining upon the dying eyes; without, no star shone out from the cloud-covered sky.

"Father," said Christian, touching the cold hand on the coverlet; "Father, can you hear me? Can you speak one word?"

The old man slowly opened his eyes, gazing with dull, meaningless expression into the anxious face above him.

"Father, tell me one thing! you did not knowingly send the Eglantine out——"

He stopped suddenly, startled by the rush of life into the haggard face.

"It—it—" The repeated word came in heavy gasps from the parched lips.

"It is what?" asked Christian, soothingly. "What do you mean, father?"

The sunken eyes full of agony looked up to him in mute entreaty.

"It is a—fearful thing—to die."

Again the gasp for breath, the struggle for speech.

"With the memory of those curses." A deep silence fell upon the night. There came no sound from wind or sea, no sound from the cold, dead lips.

"Father!" cried Christian, with a shuddering recollection of how and where he had written those words. "There came no curse from the Eglantine."

Too late! Silent and motionless, in the quiet sleep of death, lay Richard Hilliard, gone to his final account. A sad, a terrible death-bed. One never to be forgotten by the eyes that looked on it. Retribution sat there in awful guise, and the wealth won by sin and treachery had no power to drive away the dread visitant.

. . . . . .

A change came over the associations of the name of Hilliard under the new régime. It was no longer a synonym for hard bargains and unscrupulous practices; in fairness and considerate kindness, uprightness and high principle, the house held its course under its young leader and prospered.

In his private life he was equally happy, and no table was surrounded by a circle of more sincere and faithful friends than those that surrounded the table of Christian Hilliard and his gentle wife.

THE END.

THE DAYS OF NOAH AND THE DAYS OF THE SECOND COMING OF THE SON OF MAN.

By the Rev. Horatius Bonar.

The False Cry of Progress—The World is Advancing Downward and not Upward—The Last Days to be Evil—Their Similarity to Noah's Days—God's Method the Same at Both Periods—Coming Fiery Deluge—Job's Reference to Noah's Flood—Intense Wickedness of those Days—God's Long-suffering—The Spirits Striving with Man—We are to Testify of a Coming Judgment as Well as of Christ—The Eastern Question.

YOU remember the solemn words of the beloved disciple, "We are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness." I introduce the subject which I have undertaken to speak upon today—"the days of Noah"—in these words, because they seem exceedingly suitable. Noah might well have used them—"I am of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness." But, brethren, one special object which I have in view in speaking of those days of Noah is this—that we may have a right apprehension of the present condition of our world.

We are so apt to underrate the evil, and exaggerate the good—not that I would for a moment be unthankful for the way in which God is working in the midst of us, by gathering in thousands, tens of thousands everywhere; yet still we find evil advancing, infidelity advancing; we find atheism growing bold; we find men telling us that all religions are equally right, or equally wrong; we find philosophic men levelling up the false religion and levelling down the true, in order to make one vast plain of all religions together. We find men calling the good evil, and the evil good—the sweet bitter, and the bitter sweet; putting light for darkness, and the darkness for the light. We find men alive to the gross crimes and immoralities around us, but not in the least alive to the fountain-head of all these evils—the want of the knowledge of the true God; for, by want of understanding the people perish.

We actually find many amongst Christians congratulating themselves upon the progression the human race is making, and imagining that now by means of civilization, science, and the like we shall succeed erelong in regenerating our race and in regenerating the earth. We find amongst Christians men with strange forms of faith and strange forms of unbelief—men professing to believe in Christ, and yet there seems to be very much of Antichrist in their creed. We find men believing in science, believing in philosophy, believing in literature, believing in the illimitable power and progress of our race,—we find them believing in all this, but setting aside the Gospel of the grace of God, setting aside the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ, by means of which God purposes, in His own time and way, regenerating this fallen world. We are apt to be deceived as to progress. The cry of modern times is, Progress, progress.

Brethren, what can the progress of a man who knows not God be? It must be downward, not upward; and in all this we see Satan, as an angel of light, deceiving the sons of man. In some parts of the world, and in many parts of our land, we see him in his grosser forms as an angel of darkness, the prince of the power of the air,—we see him as such, exercising dominion, and leading men into all the grossness of lust and sin; and we see him in other parts leading men captive. He is still far more subtle as an angel of light, putting on a fair appearance, making error so like truth that it deceives the sons of man, and so leading them on, step by step, till they have left the cross behind them, and left Christ behind them, left the blood behind them, all the while proclaiming there is no religion like Christianity, and never was there a character upon the earth like Christ. Satan as an angel of light is doing all this.

I mention these particulars as an illustration of what is taking place in our own day, and as bringing out some of the characteristics of the evil by which our own times are assimilated to the days of Noah. It was our Lord Himself who gave us the comparison between the two, and we take the words, then, we take the comparison as we find it given by His own self: "As the days of Noe were, so shall the coming of the Son of man be." The days before the flood and the days before the coming of the Son of man are to resemble each other, and if the days before the flood were evil—only evil—if men's hearts during that time were evil—only evil—and that continually, we are quite sure that that same huma heart will be found speaking out to the last, an that the days before the Son of man—the day in which we live—these days will be found evil wholly evil, like the days of Noah, or like th days of Lot; and our Lord distinctly lays dow the comparison between those two periods That which gave such prominence and such i terest, we may say, to the days of Noah, H said Himself was their termination—they term nated in the flood. That which gives such in portance and such solemn interest to our day this,—that it is to terminate in the coming the Son of man. The similarity of the two te minations mark the likeness of the two period

What a profound solemnity the deluge thro over the days of Noah, as we read in past h tory! what a profound solemnity the prosp of the coming of the Son of man throws over o days as we read of that coming, and of the days in the record—the sure prophetic wor for as certain as that the days of Noah ended the drowning deluge which swept all men aw from the face of the earth, so surely shall days end in that more terrible consummatio not a deluge of water again, but a flood of fir a fiery deluge in which this earth and its wo of wickedness are to be destroyed; for "He co eth in flaming fire, taking vengeance upon th that know not God, and obey not His Gos who shall be banished with everlasting dest tion from the presence of the Lord and from e glory of His power." The days of Noah, th we may say, were exclusively evil and not go and they ended in that day of judgment. Th e is one remarkable passage in the Book of which I fear we may often overlook, to whi should like to turn your attention before ceeding further (22d chapter). You will how it refers most manifestly to the day of Noah.

There are various references in the Boo of Job which show that when that was writter flood had not long since gone by. There are erences to the patriarchal time before the fl d; as, for example, at the 15th verse of this chapter. What were the two characteristi of these men? They said together, "Depart us!" They said to the feeble remnant of N "What can the Almighty do for them—that remnant?" You see the two characterist of Noah's days given out in this very passage nd they are very remarkable. The scoffer is the despiser of the good is here. They sa to God, "Depart from us." They said to and his believing remnant, "What can th Almighty do for them?" Then these wer the days of Noah as remembered in patriarcha tradition in the days of Job—evil, thoroughly vil. And in connection with all this, I would r mind you of one or two passages which bring ou this. "When the Son of man cometh, shall H find faith on the earth?"

And you remember the 3d chapter of 2 Imothy, "In the last days perilous times hall come." That whole chapter is just a reca ulation of the evil of the days of Noah, as c ried out in the last days. Then in the 24th c pter of Isaiah you have a similar scene—darkne and desolation, and crime and judgment—th days of Noah repeated upon a larger scale. Th have in the 3d chapter of 2 Peter a scene: "Scoffers shall come, walking afte th own lusts, and saying, Where is the pro se His coming?"

These passages—and there are several ilar ones—bring out the likeness in the two t es—the days of Noah and the days immediat before the coming of the Son of man. ask now, What were the characteristics of t days of Noah which assimilate them to ours nd I ct your attention briefly to the following things. I want to show you how, in reference t men, the two periods are like each other ; and ten, secondly, how, in reference to God, the to periods are like each other.

First, in reference to man. On man's side we e evil, as I have noticed already. We see increasing worldliness ; we see forgetfulness of od ; we see crime and violence multiplied. We ar the voice of the scoffer speaking. We see od set at naught ; we see righteous men despised ; we see the judgments of God set aside. nd whereas in our day they say, "Where is e promise of His coming?" so, doubtless, in ah's days they said, "Where is the flood that u are speaking of, and for which you are preparing by this ark?"

There were many characteristics of special evil emplified in the days of Noah which have repeated themselves in our days ; and I do not ow a more profitable study—a study by which ght is cast upon modern times, modern scenes, odern habits, and modern principles—than the udy of the days of Noah. You see, in the rm or in the root, all the evils which are now lly expending themselves, especially in the rge cities, throughout England and throughout Europe. There you see the days of Noah on a far larger scale than it was possible r them to have been exemplified in the days efore the flood ; evil multiplying ; evil ripening, and ripening to a most alarming extent ; il refusing to be checked ; evil which not only keeping pace with all the good that is done, ut evil rapidly increasing and outstripping and ermastering all efforts for good.

I do not mean to dwell upon these characteristics of evil further. I wish you to study them r yourselves ; and if you will study them in onnection with 2 Timothy 3, you will understand more fully what I mean. But it is not erely on the part of man that the characteristics of the days of Noah are exhibited. We find ome very striking characteristics of those days rought out in the way in which God dealt with ll this evil in those days. We find on the part f God, for instance, this most strikingly manifested forbearance and long-suffering—"his days hall be a hundred and twenty years." The ng-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, hereunto eight souls were saved. It was a period of long-suffering on the part of God—long-suffering which has only found its parallel in our wn day. Noah's hundred and twenty years of ng-suffering on the part of God are, we may ay, lengthened out largely in our day.

We in England have not only had a hundred nd twenty years, but we may say twice that already, since the Reformation, when God seemed more especially to manifest His power and His ong-suffering ; and it is still long-suffering to he sons of men.

What keeps God from executing judgment? What keeps Him from letting loose His anger, and whetting His glittering sword and bringing it down upon the inhabitants of earth? It is His long-suffering—not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

What stayed His vengeance for one hundred and twenty years in the days of Noah? It was ong-suffering ; and it is the same long-suffering hat is staying His vengeance still. And then, along with this long-suffering, we see His striving with the sons of men.

What a memorable passage this is: "My spirit shall not always strive with man"! Here s one of the characteristics of the days of Noah. It was the period of God's striving with man—doing battle with men in order to win them over ; doing battle with men, and at last retiring from the conflict and allowing Himself to be defeated! God striving with the sons of men, His spirit striving with the sons of men is a very remarkable feature of Noah's day, and it is just the same in our own.

As wickedness increases it seems as though this striving increases—God's striving with the sons of men, God pleading with them and saying, "Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die?" Then, again, the days of Noah were days of testimony for God. God sent out His witnesses in a most remarkable way. He sent out, first of all, Enoch. "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints," and then He sent righteous Noah.

He sent him to proclaim grace and to proclaim judgment, and thus His testimony was presented to the sons of man in the most forcible manner during that long period. And it is thus still. God in these last days is sending out His testimony in a new form. He is bringing out His truth more strikingly than He has done for many a day ; and I do not know that ever the Gospel was preached more fully and freely than in these last days.

I do not know that God ever had so many faithful witnesses, so many Noahs and Enochs, because before God proceeds to smite, He sends His message that men may take warning and repent. And this is the day of testimony on the part of God. It is the day in which He is sending out His ambassadors of peace. "As though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God." And then it is not merely of Christ that these witnesses are to testify, but also of a coming judgment ; and do we not often lose sight of this?

We forget that grace is indeeed only a part of our testimony. We forget that in Enoch's testimony there was not grace only, but judgment. "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints." But in our days we begin to think God is so (if I may use the expression) soft-hearted that He has departed from His purposed judgments, and that we have, therefore, only to proclaim grace, not the coming judgment. O brethren! if judgment be really coming, if the Lord be really coming, if fire be really coming, if the last trumpet is to sound, and in such a way as shall alarm and awaken the whole earth, then it is time for those who believe to proclaim that coming judgment ; and is not Satan specially engaged in putting it aside?

He is telling us that there is no future punishment, and no hell. He is telling us there is no judge—no judgment—that God is far too kind to punish the sins of man, at least for any lengthened period of time. He is telling us these things—in other words he is putting away that which God raised up Enoch to proclaim in the days of Noah, "Behold, the Lord cometh to execute judgment." We shall be unfaithful to our testimony if we only proclaim the grace, and forget the coming judgment. We shall be unfaithful to ourselves ; we shall be unfaithful to the Gospel ; we shall be unfaithful to our God ; we shall be unfaithful to our testimony ; and, above all, we shall be unfaithful to the dying souls of men. We shall allow the world to go down to hell with a lie in its right hand, so that it shall say to us in the day of judgment, "You never told us of the coming judgment. You never told us of the devouring fire. You never said, 'Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints.' You told us of a Christ that had come to die, but you never told us of a Christ that was coming to execute judgment."

Brethren, shall we not seek to be faithful in all points—in these two things, the grace on the one hand, and the judgment on the other? That on that day when we shall be asked an account of the testimony we exhibited in these last days, we shall be able to say, "Lord, I preached Christ unto them, and I preached judgment unto them. I told men that there was grace to the uttermost, salvation to the uttermost, pardon to the uttermost. And I told them also to flee from the wrath to come."

And now, brethren, I would close with just reminding you of another similarity between the periods in this very termination. The flood came and took them all away. "They were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, . . . until the flood came, and took them all away." Eating and drinking. Now our Lord does not specify any crimes against them in that statement of his. They were eating and drinking—quite harmless things—marrying and giving in marriage. I suppose He referred to the Book of Genesis that "When the sons of God saw that the daughters of men were fair, they took to themselves wives." They were doing these things until the flood came, and took them all away. The flood came suddenly—the flood came overwhelmingly—the flood came after a long warning, the flood came in terrible power: so is the coming of the Son of man to be (Gen. 6 : 2).

As a thief He is to come, and as a thief comes upon a slumbering house, all unawares, so upon a slumbering world shall its Judge and Redeemer come. When men are saying peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh, and they shall not escape. When statesmen are trying to build together, or to weld together the iron and the clay, then the end shall come, and the stone shall descend and break the image in pieces. When men, trying by diplomacy to settle the Eastern Question,—to settle it finally, so that it shall disturb Europe no more, they are oblivious of the fact that that question contains elements, both in east and west, which can only be settled by the coming of the Lord, which can only be settled by the restoration of His own Israel and the rebuilding of His own Jerusalem, for there is no settlement of the Eastern Question till then. Read the word of prophecy—there is no settlement till then.

No settlement till Gog and Magog, let loose, rush down upon Israel, overflow the land, and are made to perish upon the mountains of Israel. Not till then is the Eastern Question settled. Then Gog and Magog will have a hook put into their jaws—till then Gog will not be able to descend and overflow Israel ; but then the overflow will not be over Turkey, but all Syria ; but then after that a greater than he comes, and he perishes in his own ambitious invasion—and then the Eastern Question is settled, settled by the arrival of the great King. And when statesmen are thinking to settle the question they little know what God has in His purpose concerning these nations with which they are dealing—they little look unto this sure word of prophecy, and know what is coming on the earth. They do not know the world's wants, the world's desire, the world's deep sickness, that is wasting away.

They do not know what evil means, what sin means, what all this misrule, this Socialism, this infidelity, this atheism arise for. They do not know that the departure of the heart from God is the real root of all the evil that they are trying to repress before God. They do not know, and they take no remedy accordingly. They see little evil in the departure of the human heart from God. What does that mean? It is nothing to them ; nothing to statesmen or kings, or the great captains of the earth, that the heart is gone away from God ; but the departure of the heart from God is sufficient to account for all the evil.

It will account for the days of Noah, for the days of the Son of Man, for the loss of Paradise, for the miseries that have overflowed the earth, for death, for the grave, for judgment, for hell ; and I say that statesmen at present, in their ambitious aims, take no notice of this. We know it, "For we are of God, and the world lieth in wickedness." We know that the Son of God hath come and given us understanding, that we may see the truth and believe in His Son, Jesus Christ. We know that this is the only cure for the wicked world, and it is for this cure, believing our days to be as the days of Noah, it is with this cure that we go forth in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, in the name of Him who is the Lord of heaven and earth, to bring to dying souls everlasting life, which can be the only remedy for its diseases.

Brethren, as the days of Noah were, so are the days of the Son of Man now ; and it is believing this that adds energy to our belief, that makes us feel that whatever our hand findeth to do we must do it with our might, "for the night cometh when no man can work," and the judge who is to arrest the works of the sons of men,

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to disseminate the glorious truths of the Word of God, and thus to aid in carrying on the work of the Saviour on the earth.

It contains every week a sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached the Sunday morning previous to the day of publication.

By arrangement with the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, a report of his Sunday-morning sermons is taken every week, and after it has been revised by him, is mailed in advance sheets and published in this journal prior to its publication in any other paper in the United States.

Articles by eminent ministers and others who have made the subject of prophecy their especial study also appear week by week, and review current events in the light of prophecy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a journal that can be introduced with confidence by any minister to his congregation. It will second and support his labors in the cause of Christ, and will be the best counteraction possible to the pernicious and dangerous periodicals now so widely circulated.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a packet of specimen copies to any minister desiring them for distribution among his congregation.

The REV. C. H. SPURGEON desires strongly to commend to the American public and readers of his sermons THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only paper publishing his sermons in America from which his institutions derive any aid. His Orphanage, containing 260 orphans, his Pastor's College, and his Colportage Society cost over $1500 every week, and the American readers of his sermons, by helping to circulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be co-operating in rendering assistance to these institutions. Any pecuniary donations for them may also be forwarded to ~~his cousin, Mr.~~ Joseph Spurgeon, manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, who will transmit them to London.

Dr. Talmage says, in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES: "I am in constant receipt — almost every mail brings me, letters from readers in Great Britain to whom my sermons published in the HERALD have been the means of comfort and salvation. From my knowledge of what the HERALD has accomplished in Great Britain in behalf of evangelical religion, I heartily commend it to the American public."

The subscription price is $1.50, payable in advance.

Remittances should be by registered letter, post-office order, or draft payable to Joseph Spurgeon, 63 Bible House, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS

Among the Bills now before Congress is one, a bill to reform the Gregorian Calendar, which provides as follows: Beginning with the first day of January, 1882, each year will consist as now of 365 days, except every fiftieth year, which will contain 377 days, and be called "a year of jubilee" until the five hundredth year arrives, which will be called "the great jubilee," and contain 378 days. The second section provides that the third, sixth, and ninth months of every year shall each contain 35 days, the twelfth month 36 days, and the other months 28 days each, except in the years of "jubilee," when one day shall be added to each month, and in the year of "great jubilee," when the last month shall have 38 days. The third section prescribes that the twelve extra days of the "years of jubilee" and the thirteen extra days of the "great jubilee" shall be Sabbath-days, and that in these years every month shall begin and end with a Sabbath-day. It is remarkable that the year 1882 should have been the date fixed upon, as many prophetical students believe that all the lines of the prophetical writings converge on that year.

The Board of Experts, authorized by Congress to investigate the yellow-fever epidemic of 1878, submitted their report to the Joint Congressional Committee at its meeting on January 30th.

After quoting the several questions which were laid before them by the joint committee, upon which they were to base their inquiries, the report sets forth that a great number of facts have been gathered respecting the history of the late epidemic of yellow-fever, which have guided the board in arriving at the conclusions they submitted in reply to questions of the Congressional committees on epidemic diseases.

It is recommended that the necessary steps be taken by Congress to secure the co-operation of the Spanish and other foreign governments in an earnest effort to ascertain the cause or causes which perpetuate yellow-fever from year to year in the West India Islands, and to devise ways to remove the causes, or to lessen the chances of transporting the poison to the United States or other countries. Yellow-fever should be dealt with as an enemy which imperils life and cripples commerce and industry. The committee suggest the appointment of—

First. Medical officers of health to serve in foreign ports from which we receive importations of yellow-fever and cholera.

Second. Medical officers of health to have charge of quarantine stations, and to supervise inter-State travel and traffic from infected places in times of epidemic.

It is now known that the poison is not susceptible of long vitality when exposed to open air, but it is not yet determined how long its infectious properties may be preserved in closely-shut chambers, or in compartments of vessels, or when confined in the folds of clothing or goods. It consequently follows that ships are especially dangerous carriers of these diseases, and also that they remain sources of infection for months after having been infected with the poison.

Dr. Talmage, in his review of the week at the Friday-evening prayer-meeting, said:

"But the most startling event of the week is national—the remnant of a tribe of Indians swept off the continent into eternity. As near as I can tell, the Indians were fighting against the outrages of the infamous white man's Indian Bureau. Our hottest indignation is for the infernal politics which have allowed the perpetual swindle and exasperation of the red men. The negro slaves of this country were never so mercilessly treated as have been the Indians. The fight was to keep the negro in bondage, but here the fight is to annihilate and exterminate the Indian. The fact is that the Indians have as much right to live in this country as you and I. There is something awfully rotten in that state of American politics which exterminates Indians but fosters Mormonism by allowing its representatives to sit in the councils of the nation."

A Remarkable Deliverance from suicide as related last week at the Fulton Street pra r-meeting. We were asked to pray for a fr id who, from want of work to provide himsel in honest support, has become greatly discoura d. A few days since he was wellnigh in despair, id though a Christian (for he found Christ in is chapel three years ago), he resolved to th w himself off the docks and so end his life. ut the Lord prevented such a sin on the pa of one professing His name. The man some w wandered through the streets till he cam to Fulton Street, and turning into it, he cam on down till he had reached the prayer-mee ng building. He entered, and taking up one o he Bibles, to be found in the seats, he open it and caught sight of a promise of God that d ve away his despair and made him happy.

The Report of the Prophetic Conference ld last October in the Church of the Holy Tri y, New York, is about to be published in ok form. Each minister who took part in the o-ceedings has, we understand, had an opport ty of revising his work; and in some cases w e owing to the lack of time, the papers were b-ridged at the meetings, the entire paper i n-serted in the book. It is edited by Dr. N. W st, of Cincinnati; published by F. H. Revel of Chicago. The price is $1.50.

The Governor in the Cell.—The followin n-cident is related by Mr. Moody: "When Ir. Pollock was Governor of Pennsylvania, re was a man whose death-warrant he had sig d. He felt that he could not let him die, bei a Christian man himself, without going dow to tell him of a Saviour's love,. He went t he prison where the man was that was to be hu , a few days before the time fixed for the execu n. He said to the sheriff, 'I wish you would tal ne to his cell; do not tell him who I am.' He nt in, and talked and prayed with the man. He told him of Christ and heaven; how Goc ad sent His Son into the world to save sin rs. He read him some portions of the Word of d, and got down and prayed with him, and m-mended him to the God of all grace. me little time after that, the sheriff was passi by the condemned man's cell, and he said: ' ho was that man that talked with me so ki ly, and prayed with me?' The sheriff answ ed, 'That was Governor Pollock.' The cond n-ed man turned deadly pale, and lifting up th hands he said: 'O sheriff! was that G er-nor Pollock? Why didn't you tell me? h, if I had known it I would have fallen at hi et and cried Mercy! I would have asked h to save me. Why didn't you tell me that wa he Governor?' He wept and swung his har in agony to think that the Governor had been ght in his cell, and the sheriff did not tell him i was the Governor.

"Sinner, I bring you good news to-r ht. There is one greater than any Governor. e is here to-night, and He is here for a purpose. He is here to save sinners. He is here to pa lon you; He does not want you to perish and be st. He came to give you a pardon. Do you w t a pardon? Take it. It is for every one."— L. Moody.

Mr. Moody's Work at Baltimore is thu de-scribed by one who has assisted in the v k: "There are now being held six religious et-ings where all denominations can go and eel that it is their meetings—one at 12 M. an an-other at 4 P.M., at Dr. Leyburn's; a reli ous temperance meeting, conducted mostly b he ladies of the Orthodox Friends; a meetin for women exclusively, held at the First M E. Church. The first meeting of the eveni is held at the High Street Baptist Church, an the last is held at Monument M. E. Church. he first and last two are conducted by Mr. M dy. When we say that all these meetings are c wd-ed, we are only using the ordinary expres n; but they are all crowded to overflowing. or is it idle curiosity that takes people ther for they feel that their souls' salvation is at s ke, and are asking the Lord, 'What shall we d to be saved?'"

Aaron Burr's Irreligion.—During a revival many years ago in Princeton College, one of the students was deeply impressed with the importance of religion. He sought religious advice, and his friend told him that the interest in the College was fanatical, and not truly religious. He went away relieved, and his anxiety about his soul ceased altogether. That youth left college, became a conspicuous man in the nation, nd occupied prominent offices. He fought a uel, in which his antagonist lost his life, and from that day his influence and happiness were one.

At the age of seventy he was a resident of New York City, where he practised law. A society of hristian ladies made the condition of this old man the subject of conversation and special rayer. As he had descended from an ancestry ho had been prominent in the Christian Church, hey came hopefully with his case to the God of rayer. They secured the services of a minister o converse with him, and to assure him of the nterest of the Christian ladies in his salvation.

After all these efforts he remained in his hard- ned condition, and after a few years died in ob- curity. That old man was Aaron Burr, and he key to his apostate career, it is said, were he few words spoken in disparagement of the evival which impressed him so much in his outh. A few words may bring joy or sorrow to whole lifetime—yea, for all eternity.

"Go out into the highways and hedges and ompel them to come in," was the instruction ven by the lord in the parable to his servants. Christians generally obeyed the injunction, ow many a miserable home might be made appy! An instance of what a timely invitation ay effect is among the records of the Fulton treet prayer-meeting this week:

"I must tell what my Master has done for e," exclaimed a very happy-looking brother. It will be a month to-morrow since I found rist. I was wandering through the streets hen a gentleman invited me to a mission meet- g. I said yes, I would come, though I did not tend to. But conviction of sin seized me, and could not stay away. At that mission meeting sus revealed His saving mercy to me. Now want you to pray for the conversion of my wife d child. They left me two years ago, because my rascality and drunkenness. I think God ll let me find them."

Missionary Success in Japan.—At a recent ssionary meeting at Worcester (U. S.), Bishop oster said: "I did not expect to live to see a tion born in a day; yet that seems to be out the case with Japan. I know of no other se in the history of nations where a nation s so turned around, in a manner which is ore than a revolution, as has Japan. The ster of a school under royal patronage came the prince and said, 'We must teach moral ilosophy.' 'What is that?' On being in- med, he said, 'We will teach it.' 'The best xt-book,' said the teacher, 'is the Christian's ew Testament.' 'Get it, then.' 'I cannot ch it.' 'Then get a Christian teacher.' And Methodist man, converted under Methodist ssionaries, is teaching the Bible there to-day. is is only one of the facts which might be oted. When we remember that the four hun- d million pagans of China, and the two hun- d millions of India, and the thirty-five mil- ns of Japan are open to receive the grace of d, and that we can, in preaching the Gospel, almost as much protected there as anywhere, re comes to us the call to help in this great tle of God with the powers of darkness."

Brownlow North as a Tract Distributor.— arly a year after his conversion at Dallas, he ongly felt impelled to do some work for the d. For two months before this he had shut nself up in his own room reading the Bible and ying. He then said to himself that he must something for God, but felt that he could . The thought suggested itself to his mind t he might at least distribute tracts. So put- g a number of tracts into his pocket, he went o the most secluded part of Elgin, where he was then living. The first person he met with was an old woman, who amazed him by accepting his tract without laughing at him. To another old woman, whom he saw coming down the road, he presented another tract, and she received it with thanks. The third he gave to a policeman, who said, "Thank you, Mr. North." He always continued the practice of tract distribution, although to the last he often found it a trial to do so. After he had served the Lord for years, it sometimes cost him half an hour's internal struggle before he could muster courage to offer a tract to a gentleman travelling in a railway carriage with him. Once, on arriving at Ramornie, to visit his friend Sheriff Maitland Heriot, in crossing the ferry to Tayport in the steamer he saw a group of gentlemen talking. His conscience told him that he ought to embrace the opportunity and speak, or give a tract to them; but then it would be much more pleasant and easy to do nothing. This went on for some time, but at last the feeling that it might be a matter of eternal life or death gained the victory. Approaching them, he offered each of them a tract, which was accepted quite politely; and he found that some of the company had recognized him, and would rather have been surprised if he had remained quiet.

A Woman's "No Surrender."—A few years ago the Presbyterian Church at Quincy, Illinois, had so run down that it was considered dead, and the Presbytery sent a committee to disband it. The committee arrived at Quincy and inquired for the church—there was none; for the elders—there were none; for the deacons—there were none; for the male members—there were none; for the female members—there was but one. They searched her out, and told her their business. She fired up, and gave them a piece of her mind, somewhat as follows: "I am ashamed of you. You go back and tell the Presbytery I will not be disbanded, and that what it should do is to send a man here to preach and build up the church." They expostulated with her, but she was firm, and returned but one answer: "I will not be disbanded." They returned and reported, and Presbytery had the wisdom to see the hand of the Lord in it, and sent a man to preach. The results were a blessed revival of religion and the reorganization of the church. It is now a self-supporting church, with a settled pastor and one hundred and thirty-three members.

A Child's Faith.—A little boy sat beside his mother, repeating the hymn, "There is a fountain filled with blood," and when he came to the verse,

> "The dying thief rejoiced to see
> That fountain in his day,
> And there have thousands, vile as he,
> Washed all their sins away," his mother asked: "Have you washed all your sins away, my dear son?" "No, mamma, I have not, but the dear Lord Jesus has washed all my sins away." He saw his mother's lips move, and said: "Whom are you talking to, mamma?" She replied: "I was asking the Lord to bless the word your papa is now preaching." "I will ask Him too," he said; and kneeling down he prayed: "Dear Lord Jesus, bless the words papa is speaking about you to poor sinners." Is it too much to believe that the Lord heard that simple prayer? This much is certain—the word spoken that evening was blessed in a very remarkable manner, and souls were saved.

"How Great a Matter a Little Fire Kindleth."—Some fifty years ago a gang of Belgian miners angry with another set of underground workers, set a mass of coal on fire to smoke out their comrades. How well they succeeded let the record of half a century tell. Years have passed away, a generation has faded, the angry passion of those who thus sought revenge has become a thing of the past; but the fire started in that mine long ago blazes on, and no earthly skill has yet found the way to extinguish it. Burning on, ever consuming, it is a fitting type of the unceasing power of sin and passion, and of the never-ending fire which they kindle.

"THIS YEAR ALSO."

A Short Sermon for the New Year, from the Sick Chamber of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"This year also."—Luke 13:8.

The Shot of a Wounded Soldier—The Lapse of a Year—I. A Retrospect—Youthful Years—Early Manhood—Prime of Life—Past Mercies—Opportunities for Usefulness—II. A Merciful Delay—To the Wicked—To the Believer—III. A Limit Implied—The Certainty of Death—Christ's Second Coming.

THE following short address was written by Mr. Spurgeon on his sick-bed. He sat up to write when he was able, but some of it was written with his head on his pillow.

At the opening of another year, and at the commencement of another volume of sermons, we earnestly desire to utter the word of exhortation: but, alas! at this present the preacher is a prisoner, and must speak from his pillow instead of his pulpit. Let not the few words which we can put together come with diminished power from a sick man, for the musket fired by a wounded soldier sends forth the bullet with none the less force. Our desire is to speak with living words, or not at all. He who enables us to sit up and compose these trembling sentences is entreated to clothe them with His Spirit, that they may be according to His own mind.

The interceding vine-dresser pleaded for the fruitless fig-tree, "let it alone this year also," dating as it were a year from the time wherein He spoke. Trees and fruit-bearing plants have a natural measurement for their lives: evidently a year came to its close when it was time to seek fruit on the fig-tree, and another year commenced when the vine-dresser began again his digging and pruning work. Men are such barren things that their fruitage marks no certain periods, and it becomes needful to make artificial divisions of time for them; there seems to be no set period for man's spiritual harvest or vintage, or if there be, the sheaves and the clusters come not in their season, and hence we have to say one to another, "This shall be the beginning of a new year." Be it so, then. Let us congratulate each other upon seeing the dawn of "this year also," and let us unitedly pray that we may enter upon it, continue in it, and come to its close under the unfailing blessing of the Lord to whom all years belong.

I. The beginning of a new year SUGGESTS A RETROSPECT. Let us take it, deliberately and honestly. "This year also;"—then there had been former years of grace. The dresser of the vineyard was not for the first time aware of the fig-tree's failure, neither had the owner come for the first time seeking figs in vain. God, who gives us "this year also," has given us others before it; His sparing mercy is no novelty, His patience has already been taxed by our provocations.

First came our youthful years, when even a little fruit unto God is peculiarly sweet to Him. How did we spend them? Did our strength run all into wild wood and wanton branch? If so we may well bewail that wasted vigor, that life misspent, that sin exceedingly multiplied. He who saw us misuse those golden months of youth nevertheless affords us "this year also," and we should enter upon it with a holy jealousy, lest what of strength and ardor may be left to us should be allowed to run away into the same wasteful courses as aforetime.

Upon the heels of our youthful years came those of early manhood, when we began to muster a household, and to become as a tree fixed in its place; then also fruit would have been precious. Did we bear any? Did we present unto the Lord a basket of summer fruit? Did we offer Him the firstling of our strength? If we did so, we may well adore the grace which so early saved us; but if not, the past chides us, and, lifting an admonitory finger, it warns us not to let "this year also" follow the way of the rest of our lives. He who has wasted youth and the morning of manhood has surely had enough of fooling: the time past may well suffice him to have wrought the will of the flesh: it will be a superfluity of naughtiness to suffer 'this year also" to be trodden down in the service of sin.

Many of us are now in the prime of life, and our years already spent are not few. Have we still need to confess that our years are eaten up by the grasshopper and the canker-worm? Have we reached the half-way house, and still know not whither we are going? Are we fools at forty? Are we half a century old by the calendar, and yet far off from years of discretion? Alas! great God, that there should be men past this age who are still without knowledge! Unsaved at sixty, unregenerate at seventy, unawakened at eighty, unrenewed at ninety! These are each and all startling. Yet, peradventure, they will each one fall upon ears which they should make to tingle, but they will hear them as though they heard them not. Continuance in evil breeds callousness of heart, and when the soul has long been sleeping in indifference it is hard to arouse it from the deadly slumber.

The sound of the words "this year also" makes some of us remember years of great mercy, sparkling and flashing with delight. Were those years laid at the Lord's feet? They were comparable to the silver bells upon the horses—were they "holiness unto the Lord"? If not, how shall we answer for it if "this year also" should be musical with merry mercy and yet be spent in the ways of carelessness?

The same words recall to some of us our years of sharp affliction when we were, indeed, digged about and dunged. How went those years? God was doing great things for us, exercising careful and expensive husbandry, caring for us with exceeding great and wise care,—did we render according to the benefit received? Did we rise from the bed more patient and gentle, weaned from the world, and welded to Christ? Did we bring forth clusters to reward the dresser of the vineyard? Let us not refuse these questions of self-examination, for it may be this is to be another of these years of captivity, another season of the furnace and the fining-pot. The Lord grant that the coming tribulation may take more chaff out of us than any of its predecessors, and leave the wheat cleaner and better.

The new year also reminds us of opportunities for usefulness, which have come and gone, and of unfulfilled resolutions which have blossomed only to fade; shall "this year also" be as those which have gone before? May we not hope for grace to advance upon grace already gained, and should we not seek for power to turn our poor sickly promises into robust action?

Looking back on the past we lament the follies by which we would not willingly be held captive "this year also," and we adore the forgiving mercy, the preserving providence, the boundless liberality, the divine love, of which we hope to be partakers "this year also."

II. If the preacher could think freely he could wherry the text at his pleasure in many directions, but he is feeble, and so must let it drive with the current which bears it on to a second consideration: the text MENTIONS A MERCY. It was in great goodness that the tree which cumbered the soil was allowed to stand for another year, and prolonged life should always be regarded as a boon of mercy. We must view "this year also" as a grant from infinite grace. It is wrong to speak as if we cared nothing for life, and looked upon our being here as an evil or a punishment; we are here "this year also" as the result of love's pleadings, and in pursuance of love's designs.

The wicked man should count that the Lord's longsuffering points to his salvation, and he should permit the cords of love to draw him to it. O that the Holy Spirit would make the blasphemer, the Sabbath-breaker, and the openly vicious to feel what a wonder it is that their lives are prolonged "this year also"! Are they spared to curse, and riot, and defy their Maker? Shall this be the only fruit of patient mercy? The procrastinator who has put off the messenger of heaven with his delays and half promises, ought he not to wonder that he is allowed to see "this year also"? How is it that the Lord has borne with him and put up with his vacillations and hesitations? Is this year of grace to be spent in the same manner? Transient impressions, hasty resolves, and speedy apostasies—are these to be the weary story over and over again? The startled conscience, the tyrant passion, the smothered emotion! Are these to be the tokens of yet another year?

May God forbid that any one of us should hesitate and delay through "this year also"! Infinite pity holds back the axe of justice, shall it be insulted by the repetition of the sins which caused the uplifting of the instrument of wrath? What can be more tantalizing to the heart of goodness than indecision? Well might the Lord's prophet become impatient and cry, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" Well may God Himself push for a decision and demand an immediate reply. O undecided soul! wilt thou swing much longer between heaven and hell, and act as if it were hard to choose between the slavery of Satan and the liberty of the Great Father's home of love? "This year also" wilt thou sport in defiance of justice, and pervert the generosity of mercy into a license for still further rebellion? "This year also" must divine love be made an occasion for continued sin? Oh do not act so basely, so contrary to every noble instinct, so injuriously to thine own best interests.

The believer is kept out of heaven "this year also" in love, and not in anger. There are some for whose sake it is needful he should abide in the flesh, some to be helped by him on their heavenward way, and others to be led to the Redeemer's feet by his instruction. The heaven o-many saints is not yet prepared for them, because their nearest companions have not yet arrived, and their spiritual children have not yet gathered in glory in sufficient number to give them a thoroughly heavenly welcome; they must wait "this year also" that their rest may be the more glorious, and that the sheaves which they will bring with them may afford them greater joy. Surely, for the sake of souls, for the delight of glorifying our Lord, and for the increase of the jewels of our crown, we may be glad to wait below "this year also." This is a wide field, but we may not linger in it, for our space is little, and our strength is even less.

III. Our last feeble utterance shall remind you that the expression, "This year also," IMPLIES A LIMIT. The vine-dresser asked no longer a reprieve than one year. If his digging and manuring should not then prove successful he would plead no more, but the tree should fall. Even when Jesus is the pleader, the request of mercy has its bounds and times. It is not forever that we shall be let alone, and allowed to cumber the ground; if we will not repent we must perish, if we will not be benefited by the spade we must fall by the axe.

There will come a last year to each one of us: therefore let each one say to himself—Is this my last? If it should be the last with the preacher, he would gird up his loins to deliver the Lord's message with all his soul, and bid his fellow-men be reconciled to God. Dear friend, is "this year also" to be your last? Are you ready to see the curtain rise upon eternity? Are you now prepared to hear the midnight cry, and to enter into the marriage supper? The judgment and all that will follow upon it are most surely the heritage of every living man, blessed are they who by faith in Jesus are able to face the bar of God without a thought of terror.

If we live to be counted among the oldest inhabitants we must depart at last: there must be an end, and the voice must be heard—"Thus saith the Lord, this year thou shalt die." So many have gone before us, and are going every hour, that no man should need any other memento mori, and yet man is so eager to forget his own mortality, and thereby to forfeit his hopes of bliss, that we cannot too often bring it before the mind's eye. O mortal man, bethink thee! Prepare to meet thy God; for thou must meet Him. Seek the Saviour, yea, seek Him ere another sun sinks to his rest.

Once more, "this year also," and it may be for this year only, the cross is uplifted as the pharos of the world, the one light to which no eye can look in vain. Oh that millions woul look that way and live! Soon the Lord Jesu will come a second time, and then the blaze of Hi throne will supplant the mild radiance of Hi cross: the Judge will be seen rather than th Redeemer. Now He saves, but then He will destroy. Let us hear His voice at this moment He hath limited a day, let us be eager to avai ourselves of the gracious season. Let us believ in Jesus this day, seeing it may be our last These are the pleadings of one who now fall back on his pillow in very weakness. Hear ther for your souls' sakes and live.

WAS LOST AND IS FOUND, OR TH STORY OF FELICIA CUFFE.

An Original Story by Mr. Henry Martin.

A Captive in the Nunnery—The Lady Superior—Conve Treatment—Felicia Grows up as a Nun—The Narrat Shifted to a Distant Catholic Church—Reason why R mish Church Buildings Often Remain Uncompleted—T Priest, Father Kirby, his Scholarship and Eloquence, h Perusal and Reproduction of Dr. Chalmers' Sermons.

AND this nunnery was the paradise I ha left my honest nurse Peggy to see, and f which I had thrown away my charming bun of wild flowers. I lifted up my voice and cri aloud, and asked the grave nun beside me (t Convent Superior, as I soon was made to kno to take me home at once to my mother. would not do for loud weeping to be heard any outside the garden wall; therefore, though she were about to meet my request, t Lady Superior, taking me by the hand, led back into the building. With a lightened he I accompanied her. My mother's welcome ho beamed up before me in a rosy hue, and I seem to feel already her warm kisses.

My aunt had deceived me, but all would so be put to rights; the carriage at the outer co vent door would soon bear me back to my eartl heaven. Vain delusion! I was in the grip of c inexorable as fate. The Lady Superior took to the innermost room of the establishment, a then coolly told me that where I was I must fr that hour consider my new abode; that my au was gone, leaving me in charge of her, the La Superior, for education and religious trainin and that under the roof of St. A——'s Nunne overshadowed as it was with angel wings, I to know privileges unknown to the highest b in the land.

Child though I was, I felt at once that aunt, if these words were true, had far excee her powers, and I firmly protested. "But mother," I cried; "I have a mother; she given, I am certain, no such injunction; would never put me under the care of such you, madam. Let me go back to her arm I said, weeping. And I loudly declared I wo not submit to the will of another.

The Lady Superior was tall and self-possess with close-set lips and black-beaded eyes, c and pitiless, and I was but a little child, yet l and hard was the struggle between us. She c told me that my mother had given her cons to what had been done by my aunt. That, father dead, she felt the charge of me to be great a responsibility, and besides, in hono his memory, she wished me to be brought "Catholic."

It was a lie—my conscience instinctively me that it was. I could feign believe, howe that she only reported what my aunt had s In aunt's soul the wish would be father to thought, and would prompt the falsehood in interview with this woman. When her Ch could be advantaged she had no scruples.

It would occupy too much space to giv our readers all the details of Miss Cuffe's na tive; all we can here state is, that, whee and threatened by turns, she was out-manoeu nd conquered. By a studied system of dealing, ometimes kind, but oftener stern—a system ounded upon a long observation of female huan nature—she was gradually brought under he yoke of the convent régime. All impulse to pontaneous action was held in check; the inellect as a thinking power was kept in abeyance, nd by every means was sought to be weakened; deed, it was declared a sin to think, that is, to ink independently; to question was to doubt, nd to doubt was to be "damned." Inane leends of male and female saints, many of them ot much more than dreaming idiots, was the nly pabulum in the way of reading her mind and eart were given to feed upon.

As she grew up menial tasks of the convent ousehold were imposed upon her; her diet as of the scantiest measure and of the most ninviting kind; she lay at night, even in winer, under a single covering; and sleep was roken each day at midnight and again three ours after to attend service in the chapel below. n existence the most unnatural and useless, d in its essence the most intensely selfish, was orced upon her. To save her own soul, to esape purgatorial fire or eternal woe, to reach a lorious and ambitious place in heaven—that is, o benefit and exalt self, forgetful of all the orld beside—was the central idea ever held beore her. Jesus Christ came to heal and help the orld, to bless and gladden it by His pure and eautiful presence; and David, whose Son He as, "according to the flesh," served his generion.

But Miss Cuffe was instructed to consider at she had no duties towards her fellows, no arthly relationships to fill, no home affections cherish; that she was to live as one dead, to ove in a fixed, severe, and mechanical routine, nd, save of the ecstatic kind, was to keep down her breast any kindling emotion. Nuns are eclared to be the brides of Christ; can those ho say so believe it? If so, what blasphemous otions they must have of the heavenly Brideroom, for as pleasing to him they enforce upon is brides a rule of life more cruel than the civil ower enforces on its felons.

As a matter of course, Felicia Cuffe's name as changed, and she was forbidden ever to ention that of her mother. "It was the Virin Mother, the Divine Mary," she was told, that now bore to her that relation." "Vain ommand," said Miss Cuffe afterwards. "They ight suppress my darling mother's name upon y lips, but it was spoken within at almost every ulse-beat.

"At morning, noon, and night, at midnight ass and early vigil, amid the notes of matin ng or vesper hymn, oh! how that dear name ould come forth to memory before me! Even my acts of adoration would her beloved face ine forth among the angels as in glorious een they bowed around the throne of God."

Catholic doctrine, as it is called, formed for ng a regimen hard of digestion to the Protstant child. Between direct access to God rough Christ, and of simple trust in Jesus the aviour alone for eternal life, and the Romish stem, and priestcraft, there was such a differce that it struck with surprise and questioning e mind of the nine years' old child. Her other had never insulted her dawning reason putting such incredible dogmas before her for od's living truth. The Bible, too, had been e lesson book of her earliest years, and a soul d upon its wholesome verities will find the usks of superstition unpalatable food.

Time, however, works wonders. Unable sine-handed to resist the influences around her, onstantly in the presence of a power that was o strong for her, shown the helplessness of y thought of escape from the convent walls, erceiving that now for its own sake "the sisrhood" must keep her capture forever a seet, she bowed to her fate. Seeing, too, that y show of rebellion upon her part only renered more harsh her treatment, she gradually ccumbed to be ruled by those about her. As ars passed on, her whole nature, indeed, became more passive—she yielded to the subtle manipulation of her ghostly advisers.

Breathing year after year the atmosphere of a convent life, she at last was pervaded with something of the convent spirit. She became a novice, and in due time a professed nun, putting off reunion with her mother, whom she never ceased to love, to another and a better world. A nun we must leave her for a while, to introduce upon the scene another actor.

L—— Street is the main thoroughfare in the town of ——, in the North of Ireland, and were you to walk down it you would observe, after a time, upon your left hand a fine ecclesiastical structure. It stands in some distance from the public pavement, from which it is divided by a high and massive railing. The building is not completed—as are few Roman Catholic chapels in Ireland. These structures are erected by means of subscriptions, gathered for the most part from the many and the poor, who over all the sister-land, to their honor be it told, are very generous towards their church.

Working-men and small traders, and servant-maids in thousands, devote week after week and month after month considerable sums of their hard-won earnings for the erection of, not seldom, superb Gothic churches. Since, however, the money wherewith to pay the artificers comes slowly in as to sum, after the roof is on and worship within the edifice is possible, slowly, too, are completed mouldings and gargoyles, spires and pinnacles. In fact, all is put off to a more convenient time that can be looked upon as mere ornamental "addenda" to the building.

It has been asserted that another reason obtains for delaying the finishing strokes upon these structures, and if the assertion be true, it is not a little curious. It seems that it is a law of "the Church" that every completed chapel, and we suppose also free from debt, shall pay an annual impost to His Holiness the Pope. So long, however, as an ecclesiastical building is unfinished and in the workman's hands, it is of course exempt from this tribute; and to keep thus free, hundreds of fine church buildings are kept year after year with some portion of them all encumbered and unsightly from a roughly constructed and weather-worn scaffold.

Could any practice more loudly proclaim the strange inconsistency of poor human nature? No adherents of so-called Mother Church are more devoted to the Papacy than the Romanists of Ireland, both priests and people. Witness the purses frequently made up for His Holiness in addition to the regular tribute remitted every year to the Vatican treasury. And yet the above practice is an underhand manœuvre to keep from the same pocket annually large sums of money. Perhaps one sees in it an effort of the principle of "will" to maintain for itself a field of action free from the principle of "must" in the iron kingdom of obligation.

North of the fine chapel in —— which has been mentioned stands the priests' house; it is a plain, but solid and comfortable-looking building. It accommodates several ecclesiastics, for the parish is large and densely populous. Many sermons have to be conducted both on Sabbath and during the week. Countless confessions have also to be heard, and daily some have to be anointed for death and others buried.

Could you have looked, upon a certain day, into an upper room of the chapel home, you would have seen a Father Kirby sitting pensively on his study chair. He is a young man, tall, clear-complexioned, with dark hair and open brow; his lips are finely cut, his nose slightly aquiline, and his head sits well upon his shoulders. He is a thinker and a scholar; that he is fond of books you may see from the well-filled shelves which line the walls of his chamber. A glance at their titles, too, would show you that he does not confine himself to patristic lore; not only has he at hand the writings of St. Jerome and Augustine, Tertullian and Ambrose, but the works of general historians and philosophers, men of science, and of poets.

He is also a fine preacher; the natural gifts of a clear and sonorous voice and of a commanding presence have been enhanced and improved by careful elocutionary training. He has stirred the emotions of thousands by his eloquent and fervid appeals in the adjoining chapel; but his own soul is moved to its depths now, and by the words he has just been reading—words some of which he had uttered lately in the hearing of a vast congregation in the adjoining church building.

The fact is, certain volumes of the renowned preacher, Robert Hall, and of Dr. Chalmers, especially of the latter, have got into his hands, and the thoughts he has found there are penetrating his whole being. Ambitious to be a great preacher, he had studied and largely used many of the famous pulpit orators of his own Church —the great sermons of Fénelon, Bossuet, Massillon, and others he had recourse to. But when a good deal of the material for his own sermonizing found there had been pretty well used up, and his mind was on the stretch for new pastures, his attention was called to the fame of Chalmers, whose reputation at that period was blazed forth in the newspaper press in connection with the Free Church movement.

It is true Chalmers was a Protestant divine, and of that most heretical of sects, the Presbyterian; but still his genius was great, and one day, when on a visit to his bishop, the young priest had seen among the books in the library of his diocesan a volume of the heretical divine. It was, he could remember afterwards, a copy of Chalmers's great astronomical discourses. The difficulty was to get the volume into his possession without much notice from his fellow-clergymen in the house. He managed, however, to succeed in this, for none of them took much interest in books, and were no readers.

As the young priest followed with his eye the glowing sentences of the eloquent Scotch divine, he was arrested, absorbed, and penetrated. Uplifted and awed by the sublime and massive thoughts, and enraptured by the splendor of Chalmers's imagination, and subdued at times by his infinite pathos, the young man's soul was all taken captive. Vistas of truth were opened up to his mental vision such as hitherto he had never as much as dreamt of; principles which once he had rejected were enforced with a logic which there was no resisting. His preconceptions were put to flight and his convictions were taken as by storm.

He found out how the theological professors in his college had misstated, misconstrued, and caricatured the reformed doctrine. That Luther's great postulate of justification by faith in Christ alone—his criticism of a standing or a falling Church—was not that absurd and unattainable dogma which it was pronounced to be by the so-called "irrefragable" doctors of his Church; but that, on the contrary, it was instinct with "sweetness and light," and lay at the very core of the Gospel system.

All this, in its complete form, came upon Father Kirby's mind by degrees—indeed, he was led to give an especial attention to Chalmers's words by noticing their effect upon others. He had used on two or three occasions certain passages from his work which had caught his attention when perusing them in his own room, and he observed that the rolling sentences of Chalmers, uttered with his own powerful voice, electrified, as it were, the people in the chapel. He often failed to give the great Scotchman's exact words—it was not his object—sometimes to do so would put too great a strain upon his physical powers; but oftener memory would fail him.

Yet, however modified his rendering might be, well delivered the thoughts embodied ever seemed to produce a marvellous consequence. The crowd in the chapel swayed to and fro as a field of corn, every breath was hushed, while at times the thing seemed as though it would break forth into audible expressions of delight and admiration.

THE CHRISTIAN'S MARK AND PRIZE.

Sermon by Rev. W. M. Punshon, D.D.

"Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."—PHILIPP. 3: 13, 14.

Teaching by Example—Examples must be Perfect—Jesus—Paul—Their Grace Ours—I. The Image of the Text—The Christian must Aim at Continual Progress—Grow if he would Live—Approximate to Perfection—A Selfish and Dishonorable Policy—The Fruit of the Spirit—II. "This One Thing I Do"—Necessity for a Determinate Purpose in Life—You Need Never Pause—All Events of Life may be Helpful—III. "In Christ Jesus"—Life and the Capacity for Growth.

THE best teaching is the teaching of example. Exhortations look well on paper and sound well in eloquence; but they are most forcible when accompanied by the exhibition of a consistent life. But certain conditions are required before our minds can acknowledge an example. There must, for instance, be sympathy of nature. It were of very little use for us to read the diary of an angel. He knows nothing of our infirmities, and therefore can sympathize neither with our trials nor with our joys. There must also be similarity of circumstance. He who has only seen the ocean from the cliffs of a watering-place can have but a very sentimental sympathy with the seaman's hazards. He who has only seen a battle on canvas or in letterpress is no authority on matters of war.

If an example is to be put before us then, and if our minds are to be prevailed upon to follow it, these two conditions are indispensable; but even where these conditions exist we are apt to shrink back when a spotless character is presented for our imitation, and to deem it a mark too high for us. Partly from an erroneous notion that high moral purity is inconsistent with common life, and partly from a morbid aversion to the effort necessary to obtain it, we fail to be influenced by the pattern as we ought.

But this is quite wrong—a part of our yet remaining perverseness and depravity; and if we would evolve for ourselves the lustre of a better character, and obtain the mastery over our corruptions, we must look, not at those examples which are blemished and unworthy, but at those which display consistency in a full-orbed brightness, and holiness that is altogether lovely. And Scripture certainly has done its best to reassure us by presenting all its characters, even the Divine Man Himself, in circumstances and conditions of experience which can hardly fail to happen to ourselves.

Hence Jesus was in all points tempted like as we are; and if we shrink as we think of His superiority to all worldly motive, of the constancy and closeness of His fellowship with the Father, and of the mysterious divinity enshrined in His human soul, we see Him, for our sakes, involved in very different surroundings—coming in contact with abhorred evil, enduring the contradiction of sinners, wrung by the desertion of traitors, agonized by the loss of friends, and groaning beneath the mysterious bitterness of the soul's winter when the light of the Father's countenance forbore to shine.

In like manner, when we look at Paul there is something in the first sight which seems to dishearten us utterly in our attempts to follow him. He seems so fast wedded to the right, and so nobly scornful of the wrong, so self-forgetful, so brave, so superior to the prides and jealousies which sweep through common human bosoms, that our eyeballs ache with gazing at him—just as we cannot bear to look upon the sun—and it seems as if our utmost efforts to overtake his purity were as impotent as the tyrant's to lash the ocean, or the child's to grasp the sky; and yet this holy man was a blasphemer once.

Of all the revilers of Christianity you could not have found one consumed with a madder rage or scorn. He had no natural advantage, no original superiority, by which he shot a league ahead of us in the Christian race. Not only was he a man of like passions with yourselves, but his passions were fiercer and more untamable than any that have possessed you. He did not glide, in almost imperceptible transition from the good and amiable up into the Christ-like and the godly. With him the struggle was something terrible. He had to wrench himself away from habits which had been tyrannous over him for years. His conversion was a crucifixion to the quivering flesh of the old man that would leave scars for life.

He does not hesitate, in his deep conviction of personal guiltiness, to call himself the chief of sinners, and many a time did the remembrance of his impiety haunt him in his after-life, stimulating him to diligence if haply he might atone for his former wrong, and subduing him, even in his most ecstatic moments, down into a pensiveness of spirit. You cannot, therefore, refuse to acknowledge Paul as an example, because he inherited the same nature and strayed into the same perverse practices as all sinners.

By the same grace—your grace and mine, if we like to ask for it—he obtained mercy; by the same grace he was strengthened for self-conquest, and was elevated into heavenly communion; and he presents himself before us to-day as on our own level, still a wrestler against evil, still a pilgrim toward Zion. "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; . . . but this one thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of my high calling, which is of God in Christ Jesus."

I. The image of the text, as I need not remind you, is taken from the Grecian games. The course is thronged with gazers; the prize for the fleetest glitters full and bright in the runners' view; the judge waits to crown and to welcome the winner. But the runner must be free from every incumbrance; he must lay aside every weight; he must not look behind him; he must persevere with integrity of purpose and with unflagging steps unto the end.

And so, if a man would be a Christian after Christ's type of Christianity, he must aim at making progress continually. His life must be a continual endeavor from the well to the better, from the better to the best. The summit of his attainment of yesterday must be but the starting-point for his venture of to-morrow. He must not go to his rest upon the reputation of old victories, or beneath laurels won so long ago as to have absolutely faded from their greenness by the lapse of time. Every morning of his life must light him to a fresh battle-field; every evening of his life must set upon some vanquished lust or slain desire. He must fix his eye on Jesus, and long and strive to be like Him. He must trample upon every sin, and he must exhibit every grace which was formerly lacking, until he stands out as the new creature in Christ Jesus the Lord.

Brethren, this must of necessity be the aim of every Christian's life. He must grow if he would live. If he would ascertain his sense of the Divine favor, he must constantly aim at conformity to the Divine image. The mark which the Apostle set before him, and at which, during a protracted lifetime, he aimed with untiring ardor, was perfection in the knowledge and in the fellowship of Christ. "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect"—do not be frightened at it; it is his word, not mine—why should I be ashamed of it, when he has chosen to use it? "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect."

If we follow him, therefore, we must follow him as he followed Christ. If nothing short of perfection would satisfy him, nothing short of perfection must be the ideal standard after which we aim. And we cannot possibly select a finer or more inspiring one. In the world around us, you know, the selectest models are uniformly chosen. The young sculptor and the embryo poet are thrilled with high emulation; but it is to wield a Phidias's mallet, or to sweep a Homer's lyre. The young soldier gazes at reverent distance upon some hero of a hundred fights; but it is that he may be brave and honored as he. Visions of fame and fortune flit before the young aspirant's eye, only to be embodied in some renowned statesman or some wealthy millionaire.

And why are all these models chosen but tha each, in his own sphere, may reach or approximate to perfection? Worldlings would scorn t aim at a mark less high, or to set before them standard inferior to themselves. Let then shame you, Christians, into a holier ambition to day. What is that you say? That, for you part, you will be content with just as much religion as will ward off from you the curse, an bring upon you the recompense of the reward that in your mock humility you will be satisfie if you get just within the portals of heaven that you would have the lowest and most meni place by the threshold there; that, rejoicing i your sense of the Divine favor, you will be car less about your life's entire holiness, and abo your heart's complete renewal?

Surely I have mistaken you! A Christia would never lend himself to such a selfish a dishonorable policy—a policy which must be disastrous as it is confessedly unworthy.

What! gather all the benefit from the dea of Christ you can, and yet not be consecrated God's service, and conformed to God's imag Oh how miserably do we belie our profession we harbor such thoughts as these! How f have we fallen from apostolic precept and pa tern, and how surely do we entail upon ourselv disappointment here, and a heritage of wra and shame hereafter! But I hope better thin of you, and things that accompany salvatic though I thus speak. You have taken t great Apostle of the Gentiles as your mod and his aim you know was to be perfect Christ Jesus.

THE PRIZE GLITTERED BEFORE HIM; during a long lifetime it was never absent fr his thoughts, but during that long lifetime never once lost sight of the mark. It was h ness he wanted; not to be delivered from righteous consequences of his sins, but to delivered from the sins themselves; not be screened beneath the wing of the cov ing cherub from deserved condemnation, to have the lambent fire coming down, shre ing off the paralysis from his moral manho and uplifting him into the fulness of the stat of a man in Christ Jesus the Lord.

He was not satisfied with going immeasur beyond the foremost man of his time; he not satisfied with going far ahead of the hig standard of the age in which he lived; he not satisfied with being surpassingly beyond former self; nothing would satisfy him but like Christ. "Let that mind be in you"— other, no, not even an archangel's—"let mind be in you which was also in Christ J the Lord." To this his every struggle tend to this every circumstance of his life was m subservient.

Just as the bee distils only one essence f its bright, wild wanderings amid a thous flowers, so every struggle of his nature every journey of his spirit only filled the of his soul with the fruits of the Spirit, w were by Jesus Christ unto the glory and the praise of God. My brother, thou that anxious to be right, it is this to which I sum thee to-day; there is the mark—holiness; t is the prize—heaven. If thou press toward mark, thou shalt not be disappointed of prize. Not as in the earthly race, where one can win; all who start in this heav course, and who persevere to the end, can g and wear the crown.

We know, then, so far, what was the Apo object; let us look for a moment or two at effort which he made to attain it. The mea this attainment, as they are presented in the before us, are these—determinate singlene thought, and determinate looking forwa the future.

II. Take this one grand thought for a ment. "This one thing I do;" not ings. There is no fretting away of the soul on a multitude of discordant objects, to the s of concentration, and the consequent loss power. "This one thing I do." Here is the itude of a soul that is determined after a rthy purpose; the attitude of quiet strength, ich will suffer nothing to deter it from the complishment of its deliberately-planned de- n.

"THIS ONE THING I DO."

nd thus alone can excellence be attained in any rsuit which may invite the attention of men. the man be but faintly impressed with desire, if he hesitate between rival claims, or if he rsue the object which is chosen only in spasms activity, the result will inevitably be disap- intment and shame. "A double-minded an," it is true all the world over, "is unstable all his ways"—like a wave upon the streamlet, sed hither and thither with every eddy of its le. The recognition of a determinate purpose life, and a sturdy adhesion to it through all sadvantages, are indispensable conditions of ccess.

The outside world understands this matter ll. Hence, in the great life-race, the vacillat- g are outrun by the steady, although the for- r may be fleet of foor as Asahel upon the ountains of Israel. Hence, also, setting aside ose contingencies which make all mortal ings uncertain, the battle is not to the strong, cept his determination and his perseverance e at all events equal to his bravery. There st be no contradictory play of purpose in the nd, if there is to be the symmetry of the per- t character.

If a man follows after many and different rposes he may pile up, in course of years, a ad of gold, a breast of silver, thighs of brass, d feet of clay; but it is nothing but a great age after all. There must be one worthy pur- se, and that worthy purpose fully carried out constitute the man. Those great names ich the church has canonized, your Howards, thers, Wesleys, Pauls, were their hearts, m recreant or traitor faculties within them, sloyal to the great purposes of their lives?

Did Howard blanch in his circumnavigations charity because of the curl of the official lip the shrug of the official shoulder? Did Wes- turn cowardly because the scorn of mobs as- iled him? Did Luther linger after Rome, as t's wife lingered after Sodom, enamored of the auty that he had left behind? Did Paul swerve hair after he had once plighted his troth to e Redeemer? These men, world-uplifters as ey were, had one purpose, and kept at it rough the hazards and the ventures of years. nce their heroism; hence their success; hence eir immortality.

Brethren, if you would emulate their attain- ents, you must emulate their singleness of aim. —I know what your hearts are saying, and I just going to answer it—no, emphatically no, ey are not marks too high for you. There is not e of them that is a mark too high for you. In any respects you have a mighty advantage over em, such as they knew not how to possess.

The most laborious worldling must pause some- nes in his work. The warrior must come into nter quarters now and then; he cannot al- ys be on the offensive, manifesting the strata- m and the skill of war. The student cannot ways—though, by the way, he ought not to it—let the rays of the morning sun fall aslant the fevered brow that has been at work all ght. The most laborious worldling must use now and then. The merchant may rise early and sit up late, and eat the bread of refulness for a number of years, but he must st at some time; if he does not, the maddened ain will take it into its own hands, and, like a ntic slave, work a terrible, terrible revenge. it the work you are doing you may go on con- ually. You are not to achieve a task, you are grow into a character; you are not to do many ings, you are to become like Christ. Your work may be carried on as well, and sometimes a great deal better, when weariness seizes upon the limbs and sorrow darkens upon the house, as when strength couches in the frame and joy sparkles in the dwelling. Every circumstance of your life may be made subservient to this great purpose. You cannot pass a solitary day without the experience of something either to help or to hinder you. Every temptation as it is tampered with or trampled on makes it likelier whether in the long-run you will be the conqueror or the conquered.

The least noteworthy of the events of daily history are worth something in the great record of your life. In your work you may show your bravery as well in the closet as in the camp; as well when the principalities and powers are marshalled without as when the combatants are fighting within Nay, every vicissitude of your history, the joy that makes the spirit jubilant, the anguish that wrings the soul, the blighted harvest, the grief-inspiring stroke, the slanderer's lie, and agony's fierce baptism and fire—all by God's grace can be made subservient to this one grand design.

It is impossible that you should pass through life without subordinating every thing, either to the shaping of your character for evil or the shaping of your character for good. There is not a scorned trifle in the common routine of daily life which does not tell the likelihood of the issue of the contest in which you are engaged, whether you shall remain the trembling vassals of impiety forever, or whether, imperial in your conquest, you shall rejoice in the liberty wherewith Christ has made you free. There does not need, then, to be either pause or interval in your pressing forward to the mark.

III. Just another thought, for I can read your hearts here again. It is the mark of the prize which is in Christ Jesus—in Christ Jesus, and that is enough to answer all the misgivings of your hesitating and your rebellious spirit. This it is to which you are called, but you are called

IN CHRIST JESUS.

You have been saying, "Ah! but it is too high for me; it is something to which I shall never attain; there are oppositions, inveterate and terrible, with which I have to grapple; my flesh lusteth against my spirit; my passions are strong and powerful tempters; all the strength has been taken out of me by that paralysis under which I totter; and I shall strive vainly if I strive ever so much: that crown glitters very brilliantly, but it glitters all hopelessly for me." Well, any thing more? You have written many bitter things against yourself,—have you done? You have not said too much at all. It is hardly possible to put poor human nature so low as it is by nature and in itself; but all this that you have been talking about is in yourself as you used to be—is it not?—before you were in Jesus.

Ah! but God did not call you to this loftiness of attainment then, for the very simple reason that He knew you could not come, and God never calls any individual when He knows he cannot come. If there is a call there is power to obey it always and at all times. You were buried then; you were chained to the body of death then, as the living soldier to the dead one. Your Easter had not come then. The cocoon must be burst asunder before the buoyant wings can spread themselves and fly. The death-frost must be thawed away from the heart of Lazarus before Christ says, "Loose him, and let him go."

But you are in Jesus now, and in Jesus you live, and where there is life there is the capacity for growth; where there is life there is the susceptibility of expansion and of increase, to an almost unlimited degree. Swathed in death too long, you may arise and clear yourself from every vestige of the sepulchre; there may be the fetid and unwholesome odor of it about you, but you may rise up the first-born angel's peer and the Lamb's unspotted bride. "But temptation is adapted and incesssant:" I know that. "The world is a siren to seduce, and a tyrant to persecute:" I know that. "The flesh within lusteth against the spirit very sorely:" I know that, "Hosts of demons crowd and darken the air:" I know that.

But you are in Christ Jesus, and in Christ Jesus you have a captain of your salvation who is more than all that can be against you. Poor tempted heart, do not be frightened by this. Thou art like the young man of Elisha's, when the Syrian armies were round about the city; he saw the sheen of their spears glistening in the sun; his knees smote together, and his tongue clave to the roof of his mouth; and when at last it was partially loosened, he said, "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" Calm, kingly, high-souled, trustful, all the prophet prayed about it was, "Lord, open his eyes;" and as soon as his eyes were opened, he saw that round about him on the mountains there were chariots and horses of fire.

And is it not so with us? "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who are the heirs of salvation?" Above all, isn't He with us who "knows what sore temptations mean, for He has felt the same" Press forward to the mark; it is nbo eyond you; press forwar dto the mark, and as sure as? God lives you shall grasp and realize the prize.
